the hour had come for her little Bible-reading among the emigrants. She descended to fetch her Bible from the cabin which she shared with Juliet. Maria found the latter in a red petticoat (which, with a black jacket, was to pass for an Italian costume), busy in plaiting her long hair. Juliet was a little annoyed at her fellow-passenger's unexpected entrance—and perhaps her face betrayed this, but she took no other notice of Maria. The two were going to pass the next hour in very different ways.

"Why is it so much more difficult to speak on the subject of religion to those of our own class than to the poor?" thought Maria. "It is now a pleasure to me to go among the emigrant women, they listen so readily, and greet one so kindly. One is not afraid of offending them. I am ashamed, however, to remember what an effort it cost me at first to go among the second-class passengers below."

The effort had been made far more painful to Maria by the sympathy she showed to suffering fellow-passengers in a steamer being regarded as so much more strange than if shown to people in a village. It was a kind of matter-of-course thing, even in the eyes of the worldly, that a clergyman's daughter should have to do with Sunday-schools and clothing clubs, and occasionally visit the poor. But actually to descend into the lower parts of a steamer, amidst the bad odors, "crowds of dirty people, squalling babies, and coarse sailors," this, as Captain Fincham had observed, when Maria was near enough to catch some of his words, "showed a low, vulgar taste."

Mrs. Bates had openly remonstrated with Miss Selden. "It is not the thing to go wandering after the low emigrants; no one does it," she had said.

"I am certain that my dear parents would allow me to do it."

Mrs. Bates slightly shrugged her shoulders. "I am particular," she said, "and would not for the world let Miss Erle, who is under my charge, go to the second-class rabble below!"

And yet the particular Mrs. Bates did not object to her charge, in fancy costume, showing off her pretty person as an actress before the first-class passengers, some of whom chanced to be profligate young men.

Maria did not turn from her labor of love because it brought on her a little contempt. She loved the praise of God better than the praise of her gay companions.

With her gentle heart wounded by Juliet's coldness, what refreshment Maria found in going among the poor! She was already received as a friend. Yet by what trifles she had won her way! A fretful baby soothed to sleep; her own little private store of tea and soft biscuits given to the sick, who could not take the coarse ship fare, or the muddy compound called coffee; a few kind words to the sorrowful; a chapter read aloud to the ignorant—trifles, indeed, they might be deemed, but their motive gave them weight—they had been done as unto the Lord.

As Miss Selden sped on her way, the head and shoulders of a man, so begrimed that but for the white streaks on his face, where the heat-drops had rolled, he could hardly have been recognized as a European, rose from the deep place where the red, roaring furnace is fed. It is the stoker, Ben. Has he come up for a few seconds to breathe the fresh upper air, after his imprisonment in the stifling den below? Rather he has come to have one minute's talk with the "young Miss," who, to his great astonishment, had had a kind word even for him.

"That ere little book you gave me, Miss, is a blessed un," said Ben; "it shows us as there's a clean, bright home even for a poor fellow like me."

"I hope we shall meet there, my friend," said Maria.

Ben paused for a moment to look after her when she had passed. "There's not another of 'em jaunty folk abroad as would have come near enough to have touched me with a pair of tongs," he muttered. "But it's the sunbeams,

I take it, as ain't afeard of getting dirtied, let them go where they will."

While Maria, in her clear, sweet tones, was reading the Gospel to a listening group of emigrants, Juliet, in her ingeniously contrived costume, was laughing, singing, acting, and enjoying the applause which her performances won.

We will take a glimpse of the saloon of the Quebec at about nine o'clock on the evening of Juliet's birthday. The last of the meals, which form principal events in ship life, has been concluded; the tables have been cleared for various games; the swinging lamps have been lighted, and cast a yellow radiance on the various groups. Most of the passengers have come below; though a few, undeterred by cold, prefer the fresher air to be obtained on the deck, among such being Miss Selden. Yonder Mr. and Mrs. Bates and two elderly companions are having a game of whist. Near them are gentlemen engaged in chess, as much absorbed in the knight's check as if the fate of a kingdom depended on the next move. Some ladies are reading—chiefly novels from the library of the Quebec. An elderly dame in spectacles and mob cap is assiduously plying her crochet needle in a very elaborate peacock pattern. A party of younger passengers, Captain Fincham, with gold pencil-case in hand, Madame Lafitte, a lively French Canadian lady, Juliet, and a tall youth of good family, but not of particularly steady character, who is going out as a settler, form the party. They have been diverting themselves with "buried cities," and are now enjoying the amusement of composing rough rhymes, of a somewhat satirical character, descriptive of their fellow-passengers. Every now and then a burst of laughter is heard from this group, of which Juliet is the central figure. Very pretty and animated she looks in her pink silk dinner dress, "just brought to be worn out on board ship and at Canadian hotels," as she had confidentially told Miss Selden, "because, being last year's fashion, I could not possibly wear it in London."

Juliet's afternoon rehearsal has quite swept away from her mind any passing doubt of the desirability of ship theatricals. Her conversation on deck has only left a disagreeable impression; she is somewhat vexed with Maria, and has inwardly resolved to give her fellow-traveller no opportunity of lecturing her again.

"I'll always be sleepy when we are together in our little cabin," Juliet thinks to herself; "and I'll take my walks on deck with Captain Fincham or Madame Lafitte."

Captain Fincham, who considers himself a poet, takes the principal share of the rhyming, and with considerable self-satisfaction reads out his milk-and-water couplet:

"And there comes the fairy, whose eyes are so bright,
We do not need lamps on this midsummer night."

Every eye in the circle glances at Juliet, who can hardly help appropriating to herself the plagiarized compliment, which brings a heightened color to her cheek.

The captain lisps on:

"But the gray owl, solemnly flapping her wing,
Said 'twas shocking to laugh, and most wicked to sing."

"Now, that's too bad, Captain Fincham, too bad!" laughed Juliet; "every one will know whom you mean!"

"If a lady sets herself up for wiser and better than any one else, who so worthy to have Minerva's bird for her emblem?" said the captain. "As for me, I always say—"

A gentleman, who had just left the deck, here came up to the group, and addressing himself to Juliet, said: "Miss Selden thinks that you would like to come on deck, Miss Erle, to see the balls of electric light and the floating ice that is round us."

"Oh, I like to see everything!" cried Juliet, eagerly. "I must run and put on my hat and seal-skin jacket over my dress; don't you wait for me, Madame Lafitte; I will be on deck in two minutes."

Sea-life has such sameness in it, that a very small incident is hailed as a variety. Except the whist and chess-players every occupant of the saloon hastened up the companion ladder. Novel and croquet were deserted, and the captain's poetry was left on the table.

THE WORD MADE FLESH.

S. S. Lesson for April 4, John 1:1-18. Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Characteristics of the Respective Evangelists—The Descent of the Higher to the Lower Necessary—Christ Bringing Life—Spiritual and Physical—The Light in Him—Its Effect on the Heathen—His Reception—The Grace and Truth—John the Baptist's Testimony.

THERE is a marked difference between the commencement of the Gospel of St. John and that of the other three evangelists. St. Matthew, who represents Christ as the King, commences with His genealogy. Mark, who speaks of Him as the Servant and the Sacrifice, passes over this, as well as the events of His birth, and, after a short account of John the Baptist, tells of His temptation and His ministry. Luke, who speaks of Him as the Man, gives more details of His birth than any of the others, while John, to whom it was committed to tell of Jesus as God, begins far back in the past eternity of God—"In the beginning was the Word."

the expression of God, the translation of God into human thought. Jesus, "the Image of the invisible God" (Col. 1:15); Jesus, "the express Image of His Person" (Heb. 1:3); Jesus, the Word bringing God within the scope of man, so that it might be possible that the Creator and created might be united.

But Jesus was the Word before there were human beings to whom He should make God manifest—"the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God." "I and My Father are One" (John 10:30). Mr. Henry Drummond, in his book "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," very beautifully shows us how, in nature, a lower kingdom cannot cross the boundary which divides it from a higher, until the higher kingdom has come down to it. So that the mineral cannot imbue itself with the life of the vegetable, but the vegetable can reach down into the mineral world and absorb into itself the substance of the soil in which it is planted, and, so bridging the gulf which separates, can lift the dead mineral by that absorption into a kingdom of life. Just so "the Word was made Flesh." Jesus, God from everlasting, reached down into our human nature, our animal life, and "forasmuch . . . as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death—that is, the devil."

"IN HIM WAS LIFE."

"I am the Resurrection and the Life," and this for soul and body; "He breathed into [man's] nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (Gen. 2:7). "He breathed on [His disciples], and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (John 20:22). "He is thy Life, and the length of thy days" (Deut. 30:20). And that which is spoken of Him is equally spoken of His written Word, "For it is not a vain thing for you; because it is your life" (Deut. 32:47). "It shall be health to thy navel, and marrow to thy bones" (Prov. 3:3). "My words . . . are life unto those that find them, and health to all their flesh" (Prov. 4:20-22). "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life" (John 6:63). Now, if this is true, how foolish it is to seek for life, spiritual or physical, elsewhere! "With Thee is the fountain of life" (Ps. 36:9). Yet are not many seeking to obtain spiritual life from their own efforts, or to increase it when they have it by some struggling of their own, instead of coming straight to the Fountain? How many seek physical life and strength at some of the streams which flow from the Fountain, instead of coming to the Fountain itself! Men seek increased physical life from, not through, mountain air, sea breezes, tonics, or strengthening food. But none of these are the fountain of physical life. "In Him was life." Many believers seek increase of spiritual life from, not through, believers, as though they would draw life from them, instead of going direct to the fountain, to Jesus Himself. He may use these channels, but the supply must come, after all, from the Fountain; the channel is soon exhausted.

And the Life was

THE LIGHT OF MEN.

Just as Jesus dawned upon us all darkness disappears; He becomes the Solution of every problem, the Answer to every question, the Resource in every perplexity. Every thinking mind which has not Jesus for its light is involved in a complication of perplexities about men and things; but once accepting Him in Person to throw light on these questions, He lifts us up into the world of His thoughts, and then what we could not understand while we were on a level with it becomes clear enough as we see it from above on God's level. "In Thy light shall we see light" (Ps. 33:9). Again, Jesus is the Light that reveals us to ourselves. The Samaritan woman had no ground of self-righteousness to stand upon after she had met with Jesus; she said: "Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did;" she knew herself in knowing Him.

Truly of Jesus can it be said, "That was the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Thank God, here is a clear declaration that Jesus lighteth every man; that some way or other, by some means or other, or directly by the Holy Ghost, without any apparent means, every man who comes into the world has some light from God, some gleam which reaches him, and which brings God within his reach if he will. This may be some little comfort to us in thinking of the poor heathen; but God forbid we should rest upon it for a moment, as though there were therefore no need of sending the Gospel to the heathen. It is just this fact which makes it possible for a poor heathen who hears of God to lay hold on the truths of the Gospel, and therefore it should be an encouragement to us to go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature (Mark 16:15).

HIS RECEPTION.

How did the world receive her Creator? "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not. He came unto His own"—became, so to speak, a part of His own creation, a creature among His creatures, and "His own," even His own people, the Jews, "received Him not." But thank God there were, and there are at this day, exceptions. While the mass of the world receive Him not, and will not have this Man to reign over them, there is a little flock who do receive, and God says to them, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom" (Luke 12:32). "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God"—"As many as received, . . . even to them that believe." Receiving and believing are one and the same thing. The evidence that we believe a thing is whether we receive it and adopt it. The evidence that we believe in a gift is that we give thanks for it, enter into rest about it, and cease to ask for it. And thus the evidence that we believe Jesus is that we give thanks that He is ours—ours as a Saviour, ours as our Wisdom, our Strength, our Sanctification, the Lord our Healer.

He has received us into Himself by becoming flesh and dwelling among us. The higher has come down into the kingdom of the lower, the Divine has taken humanity into Himself. Oh, shall the lower, shall the human refuse to accept the Divine? Shall the creature shrink from receiving the Creator as his all? It is abject slavery for a man to yield himself up absolutely to a mere man, whether priest or mesmerist; but it is the noblest of things to yield ourselves up to God, to do His will and be His instruments, ready to His hand. Thank God, again and again, "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of

"God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. 4:6). What was the glory of God in the face of Jesus? Surely, grace and truth. The grace which is "kind to the unthankful and the evil" (Luke 6:35); the grace which "receiveth sinners" (Luke 15:2); which "died for the ungodly" (Rom. 5:6); which "though He was rich, yet for your sakes . . . became poor, that ye through His poverty might be rich" (II Cor. 8:9); which "bare our sins in His own body on the tree" (I Pet. 2:24); which "took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. 8:17); the grace which touched the leper because He was to bear His sickness on the cross; which pronounced the adulterous woman uncondemned, because He would bear her sin shortly on the tree; grace which comes down to the sinner just where he is, to the believer just in the very condition to which he may have come by unbelief. But full as He was, full as He is of grace, Jesus Christ is full of truth, too, full of the revelation of God, and of His purposes and will. But also truth in another sense: He gave no quarter to the hypocrites, He disclosed to the hearts of those who condemned the woman in the temple that they were not without sin, and were in no position to cast a stone at her. He made no excuse for Peter when he had denied Him, but turned His searching gaze upon him, so that His disciple went out and wept bitterly. In Jesus grace and truth are united.

John bare witness of Him, and cried, saying: "This was He of whom I spake, He that cometh after Me is preferred before Me; for He was before Me. And of His fulness have all we received, and grace for grace." It was the custom of John to divert the thoughts of those to whom he spoke away from himself to Jesus; he said later on: "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30). Thus it was with no air of resignation, but with joy that the forerunner said: "He was preferred before me, and of His fulness have all we received." In our very being we receive of Him, for "He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things" (Acts 17:25). And so in things spiritual He is "the Author and Finisher of our faith" (Heb. 12:2). He gives us grace for grace—i.e., grace in order to gifts of grace. The grace of salvation puts us into a position where we may receive sanctification, and sanctification brings us where we can ask and receive more of the grace of God, power for service, understanding of the Scriptures, discerning of spirits, etc. The laws came by Moses (yet from God), "but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." "No man hath seen God at any time," except in the face of Jesus Christ. God said to Moses, "Thou canst not see My face: for there shall no man see Me and live" (Ex. 33:20). But "the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him;" in Jesus alone can we see and know God.

ACQUIESCENCE IN THE DIVINE WILL.

BY REV. J. CLARK.

What know I of what is best
O my Father, kind and wise?
Thy great love is manifest,
Let whatever scenes arise,
Health or sickness choose for me;
As Thou pleasest, let it be.

What know I of what is best?
Who could always bear the light?
In Thy changeless love I rest,
Knowing well Thy ways are right.
Light or darkness choose for me;
As Thou pleasest, let it be.

What know I of what is best?
Human knowledge is but small.
Trusting Thee, my soul is blest;
Kept by Thee I cannot fall.
Pain or pleasure choose for me;
As Thou pleasest, let it be.

What know I of what is best?
Thou shalt choose my earthly lot.
Now of endless life possessed,
All is well—I murmur not.
Want or plenty choose for me;
As Thou pleasest, let it be.

What know I of what is best?
'Tis enough that Thou art nigh.
Since my hand by Thine is prest,
Who can be more safe than I?
Strength or weakness choose for me;
As Thou pleasest, let it be.

What know I of what is best?
Earth and heaven alike are mine.
Grace can stand the sternest test;
Living dying, I am Thine.
Life or death, Lord, choose for me;
As Thou pleasest, let it be.

The Rev. J. JACKSON WRAY, Pastor of Whitefield's Tabernacle—Scenes Illustrating his Works.

THE REV. J. JACKSON WRAY,

Pastor of Whitefield's Tabernacle, London.

Born in 1832—Early Life—Entered as a Student at Westminster College—Becomes a Schoolmaster—Conversion—Devotes Himself to the Gospel Ministry—Important Work in Africa—Dissolves his Connection with Methodism—Accepts the Pastorate of George Whitefield's Tabernacle—Quotations from His Works.

THE press has made the name of Jackson Wray familiar beyond the sphere of his personal labors, and it is probable that many of our readers will be glad to know something of the personal life and character of the man whose literary work has pleased them.

J. Jackson Wray was born in the year 1832, at Sancton, England, a small and picturesque village at the foot of the Yorkshire wolds. His father was a village carpenter, and Mr. Wray himself was taught the craft, and practised it for some little time, giving promise of proficiency. Providence, however, clearly indicated another career for young Wray, for which he appeared to have received special natural endowments.

Accordingly, very early in his teens, the brawny, bright-eyed Yorkshire lad was entered as at Westminster Normal College, where he devoted himself to study, and received the training which his natural gifts required. At the termination of his college curriculum, and with an ample equipment for the responsible position, he assumed the mastership of some schools at Madeley, in which he was the successor of the venerable and saintly John Fletcher, as he now instructs "children of a larger growth" in the historical chapel which once rang with the stirring words of the apostolic George Whitefield.

Mr. Wray was converted to Christ under the preaching of a Methodist local preacher, and at once, with characteristic resolution, consecrated himself to the work of winning souls for Him who had redeemed them, and whose servant he had now, through Divine favor, become. In a little time he was enrolled in the ranks of the Methodist ministry, and rendered valuable services to the circuits he served. But, again, his qualifications as a teacher forcing themselves upon the attention of the denominational authorities, he was selected to the arduous post of instructing native catechists and schoolmasters on the dangerous west coast of Africa, the "grave of Europeans," as it has been expressively designated. The deadly climate soon affected even Mr. Wray's robust constitution, and his ill-health compelled him to return home.

It was not long before he was in harness again, and engaged in the regular labors of the itinerant ministry, being appointed first to Crewe, where for three years he held the confidence of the shrewd artisans among whom his lot was cast, and where his success was marked; after which he was appointed to various places in the circuits of Macclesfield, Redruth, Exeter, Kilburn, London, and Wandsworth.

BECOMES A CONGREGATIONALIST.

Seven years ago he severed his connection with the Methodist Church, intending to take a preaching and lecturing tour round the world. The hand of Providence, however, seemed to point definitely and decisively in another direction. He accepted the charge of the Congregational church worshipping in the celebrated building in Tottenham Court Road, built by George Whitefield and Lady Huntingdon, where he has gathered a large congregation, and has been enabled to accomplish much good. He entertains a great affection for the church of his youth, and while cordially loyal to the principles of Congregationalism, finds one of his greatest joys in being the servant of all the churches, and readily accepting invitations for occasional service in churches of other denominations.

LITERARY WORK.

As a lecturer Mr. Wray is exceedingly popular; but it is as an author that he has won his widest fame. Mr. Wray is a novelist, and firmly believes in the beneficial influence of fiction when it is consecrated to Christ's service. Some of our readers, we know, hold an opposite opinion, but there is no necessity for argument on the subject with people who are disciples of Him who spake to the multitude in parables, and without a parable spake He not unto them.

Mr. Wray's first published novel is a grouping together of isolated incidents which, in the main, came under his notice while laboring in Yorkshire. It is entitled "Nestleton Magna," a story of Yorkshire Methodism. It is usually regarded as his best story, though he himself holds, we believe, that his second production, "Matthew Mellowdew," is in every way superior. Besides these he has written "Paul Meggitt's Delusion," "Honest John Stallibrass," "Garton Rowley," and several capital stories for young people. Last year he published a volume of sermons for the crowd, entitled, "Light from the Old Lamp; or, Homespun Homilies." These are marked by all the author's peculiarities of style; they are bright, breezy, and bracing. The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon says of them: "They will hold the reader fast, and must have rivetted the attention of those that heard them. Such vivid description must prevent a single eyelid from dropping." "The Man with the Knapsack" is also a great favorite; and besides these he has written "Widow Wimpenny's Watchword," "John Wyclif," "A Noble Vine," "Peter Pengelly," "A Man Every Inch of Him," "Chronicles of Capstan Cabin," "Simon Holmes, the Carpenter," "The Secret of the Mere," and also a monthly magazine entitled "Good Company," which is much liked by workmen.

The character of these works will be best understood by a few extracts, which are illustrated on the first page.

is of an incident in his book entitled "Nestleton Magna." It is the episode of Adam Olliver at the class-meeting. "As the clock strikes seven eight or nine members have arrived, and each, having bent the knee in silent prayer, sits silent until the patriarchal leader dons his glasses, opens at a favorite hymn, and says in his Yorkshire dialect: 'Let us commence t' worship ov God be singin' t' hymn on t' fottid payge, common measure.

" 'Jesus the neecame 'igh ower all,
I' hell, or 'arth or sky;
Aingels and men befoore it fall,
An' divvils fear an' fly."

"The first two lines are then given out again, and Jabez Hepton, the village carpenter, starts the tune. A few verses are thus disposed of, two lines at a time, and then the old man leads them at the throne of grace, in a quaintly earnest prayer. Adam always had 'a good time' on these occasions, and two or three of the more enthusiastic members interpolate their 'amens' and 'halleluias,' varying in number and vehemence according to the current character of their own feelings and experiences. Adam pulls off his glasses as the members resume their seats, and folding his hands on the open Book he says: 'Ah's still gannin' on i' t' aud rooad, an' ah bless the Lord 'at ah's nearer salvation noo then when fust ah beleeaved. Ah finnd 'at t' way didn't get 'arder bud ceasier as ah gan' on. Ah used te hev monny a tussle wi' me' neesmsake, t' 'Aud Adam, an' he's often throan ma,' but t' Stranger then he's aboot tonnd him eot, an' ae' feel 'at the Lord's will's mah will mair then ivver it was afoore. Ah's cummin' fast te d' end o' my joona, an' ah's just waitin' at t' Beautiful Gayt o' t' temple till the Lord cums an' lifts ma' up, then ah sall gan in as t' leeam man did, loupin' an' singin' an' praisin' God. Noo, Brother Hepton, hoo is it wi' your sowl te-neet?"

represents a pathetic incident in the story of "Matthew Mellowdew." It describes the return of a runaway son after many years of absence.

"Passing by a short cut, well remembered and often trod, through the Cathedral close, he crossed into the High Street, where the gilded horn of the pugnacious unicorn still threatened the equally gleaming head of the lion, both of which were glistening in the moonlight over Matthew Mellowdew's door. The shop was closed, of course, but in the upper window, just above the drawing-room, where Susan, his sister, after years of blindness, first saw the light of day, a light was burning, indicating that at least a part of the butcher's household was retiring to rest.

"Little did the traveller know that behind those snow-white curtains a fair young girl was at that very moment kneeling in earnest prayer to her Heavenly Father for a poor, wandering waif who had erred and strayed like a lost sheep, but who, nevertheless, was dearer to her than all the world besides.

"That fair petitioner the young scapegrace at the door regarded as a precious treasure, gone forever, through his own ill doings, from his arms and heart. Summoning all his courage and self-command, he knocked vigorously at the bolted door. In a few moments a light shone through the closed shutters of the shop and a loud and cheery voice was heard, a voice which the listener recognized full well, making the prudential inquiry, 'Who's there?'

"For the life of him the new-comer could make no reply. He placed his arm against the door-jamb, laid his head upon it, and uttered an unsyllabled but exceeding bitter cry. It was a cry of such real distress that tender-hearted Matthew made no further inquiry or pause. His big heart was full of sympathy with sorrow. He drew back the bolts, turned the lock, and opening wide the door, stood with lighted candle in his hand, gazing on a tall, handsome, dark-faceted stranger standing on the step.

"The stranger took off his hat and bowed his head, as he said: 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy—'

" 'It's Dan! It's Dan! Oh, dear Lord, it's my Dan!' exclaimed Matthew Mellowdew, and dropping the candle on the floor, the father's love flung wide the arms of welcome, and he fell on his neck and kissed him."

illustrates an incident in "Garton Rowley," which brings vividly before us the majesty of the sea, and the terrors of the tempest. Mr. Wray thus writes: "Old Dave Consett's prophecy of ugly weather coming up from the south was very soon fulfilled. It began while we were off Cape Horn, and for a full fortnight the question whether we should double the Cape or go down to the bottom seemed to be about as equally balanced as a pair o' scales. The wind blew from the south-east, and seemed to bring with it all the cold out of all the icebergs round the pole! 'It puts it too mildly to call it a wind. It was a reg'lar tearin' hurricane. Just as we thought we were going to be sucked down, up she went again like a rocket, to knock her head against that awful sky. But there! What's the use of seeking to describe it!

" 'I tell you what, I felt just then as though I had gotten a clear grip of God, and that's an anchor, mind you, that never drags. I went to the helm, and I said to Dave Consett, 'Cheer up, messmate! we shall be out o' this in twelve hours!'

"The old fellow smiled, and pointing upward, he said, 'Ay, ay, sir, please God.' My eye followed his finger, and there, just above us, was a break in the iron sky, a real rift of blue! I felt as if it was the smile of God Almighty, and I could not help shouting, 'There He is!' And there He was to me, as clearly as ever man saw the face of a friend!

"I tell you what it is, them that goes down to the sea in ships, and does business in great waters, have need to have faith in God. My dear old mother used to say, 'God's hand is always ready for a dead-lift,' and if ever that hand were stretched to save, it saved Bonnie Bessie in that hurricane off Cape Horn."

illustrates a scene in Mr. Wray's novel entitled "Paul Meggitt's Delusion." It is that of Dick Hodgson's mastery over his old enemy, liquor. These are the concluding words: "Heaving a sigh which to Hannah's anxious ear had a good deal of minor music in it, Dick took his seat. As is usual with toppers, he was dreadfully thirsty, and taking up the tankard, he lifted it to his lips, when he encountered the smell of beer. Uttering an exclamation of surprise, and poising it for one moment, he looked at his wife. 'Hannah,' said he, 'will you have it? It'll maybe do you good. You look fagged, my lass.' 'No,' said Hannah; 'I'm all right, and I'd rather have a cup of tea.' 'Then here goes,' said Dick, and going to the door he opened it, and threw the beer far out upon the garden path. 'Thank God,' whispered Hannah, and turned her head away to hide the tears that she felt creeping down her cheeks."

refers to an attempt at suicide by a lawless sailor, and his gallant rescue. This is how the story runs in "Honest John Stallibrass." "There was on board the Deucalion an ordinary A. B. sailor of the name of Alexander Muir. He was a man of much ability in his line of life; but he was given to drink, and under its fatal influence he had become sour, morose, and at times guilty of outbreaks of passionate self-will. On one occasion this man was grossly disobedient and disrespectful to a superior officer, who had to rebuke him sharply for his misconduct, and who threatened him with punishment.

"A few days after the same officer caught Sandy Muir doing the same thing for which he had been rebuked before. Again he was smartly rated, and was told that this time the threatened punishment should certainly take effect. 'You shall be put in irons!' said the angry officer. 'Never!' shouted the sailor defiantly. He was in a perfect passion of ungovernable rage. He suddenly put his hand to his side, and immediately struck the officer with all his force upon the breast. The officer felt that he was wounded, and at the same moment he saw the gleam of a knife-blade in the sailor's hand. He sprang forward to seize him, when Muir, who saw the probable fate in store for him, leaped upon the bulwark of the ship, and thence sprang into the sea.

"'Man overboard!' shouted the officer instantly, and flung out a life-buoy to the reckless would-be suicide. Then flinging down his hat and stripping off his jacket, he dived after the victim of his own bad passions, determined to save him if he could. It was a most daring deed. The sea was rough, the ship was moving through the waves, and there seemed little hope of saving either of them from an ocean grave. In another moment a boat was lowered, and a crew of strong men pulled hard toward the spot, and the ship was rounded to as much as possible to wait the result. 'There he is!' said the leader of the crew, and they saw the brave officer holding the drowning man with one hand, while with the other he strove to lessen the distance between them and the ship.

"'Let me drown, I tell you!' said Sandy Muir; 'I'm better dead than living! If you save me you'll put me in irons. Let me drop.' 'No, Muir,' said the officer. 'Fling away your knife into the sea,' for the man had sheathed it in his belt. 'Keep your tongue still about it. I'll save you, that you may live and be a better man!' By this time the boat had reached them, and the two men were pulled into it, and in a little while were safely hauled on board the ship."

illustrates a pretty little incident which Mr. Wray describes in his book "The Man with the Knapsack." It runs thus: "One fine morning late in the month of September, when the farmers in and about Burnham were busily engaged in harvest operations, Caleb Goodall, an ardent evangelist, was trudging along the Knutley high road, some half a dozen miles away from Burnham Mill. As usual, his knapsack was on his back. There was an evident weariness upon him as he plodded along the dusty way. By and by a miller's cart approached him, going in the same direction as himself. Caleb Goodall paused, and seeing that there was not much of a load behind the well-fed horse, he smilingly asked the driver if he would kindly give him a lift. 'Woa, Dobbin! old lass!' said the driver. 'Jump up, sir, you're heartily welcome.'"

As may readily be concluded, the evangelist made the best of his opportunity to speak of the love of the Divine Master whom he was serving, and with the success promised to those who sow the good seed.

By such stories as these, from which the foregoing extracts are taken, Mr. Wray is preaching the Gospel to numbers who, perhaps, could not be induced to attend church or to read a sermon. Stories they will read, and such stories as these leave useful lessons behind them which lead to higher things. We wish Mr. Wray God-speed in his good work.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Victim of Kleptomania.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Clarke said: "On one occasion I was urging a young man in Birmingham to close with Christ, and he said: 'It is no use speaking to me of that; I am a thief, and steal; I must, for I cannot help it. Whenever I see a thing, no matter how trifling, that I can steal without any one seeing me, I take it, for it captivates me, and I have no control over myself; so do not speak to me.' And the man clung to his sin, and rejected Christ, who would have freed him from the bondage of it all. Oh, most miserable man, to prefer sin to Christ!"

"Lady Huntingdon was once conversing with a brother of George Whitefield about the concerns of his soul. She was pressing upon him the great and the immediate need of salvation, when he turned to her and said: 'It is of no use; it's of no use; I tell you that I am lost, I am lost, lost for ever.' 'I thank God for that,' replied the lady, 'for Christ came to seek and to save that which was lost.' Oh, it is a good thing when a sinner becomes aware that he is lost, for Christ must be revealing Himself in that soul. Such it proved to be in this case. He was led through that lady's means to surrender himself to Christ. Oh sinner, if you do not know that you are lost, pray to the Lord that He may show you your awful condition ere it be too late, for 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of God.'"

Hundreds of Years too Late.—"One Night a young man came into a Gospel meeting, earnestly inquiring: 'What must I do to be saved?' 'You are too late,' said a friend to his anxious inquiry. 'Oh, do not say that!' exclaimed the young man, 'for I earnestly desire salvation; I would do anything or go anywhere to obtain it.' 'I cannot help it,' said the other; 'you are too late, for your salvation was completed many hundred years ago in the person of Jesus Christ, and it is a finished work; all you have to do is simply to accept it, for we have done nothing, and can do nothing, to merit salvation. It is a free gift to all who will accept it.' The anxious inquirer understood it all in a minute, and accepted the offered gift, seeing he was not worthy in himself, but trusting in Jesus who can 'save to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him.'"

A Music-hall Singer's Conversion.—Mr. J. G. Forbes related: "I recollect on one occasion a friend and myself visiting a widow. She was a singer in music-halls and theatres, and had steady employment, and one would think she might have had a comfortable home; but no; she was in the service of Satan, and she got her wages accordingly. Her house was as empty and filthy as it could be. She courteously asked us to be seated, but when we looked there was nothing to sit down upon. She had three little children, and each little white pinched face silently told a woful tale of its own. After we had been in a few minutes she asked them to sing to us, and those three half-clad, semi-starved children stood up and sang, very sweetly, the hymn beginning with 'Just as I am, without one plea.' After they had finished, we asked them where they had learned it. 'At Sunday-school,' they quietly answered, and we saw that in the midst of all their wretchedness and distress the mother had been endeavoring to bring up those little ones in the right way. We spoke to her of Jesus, and of the love of God for sinners, but she knew the plan of salvation well; and when we asked her if she would not accept Jesus, she sorrowfully shook her head, and said she dare not, for she could not serve God and Satan. 'No,' we replied, 'but you could give up Satan and all his works, and turn to Christ, and He will help you.' 'But,' she argued, 'I have to find food to keep my little ones from starving.' We told her to trust in God, and He would provide the means of living. At length, after a silent conflict within, she said: 'I will trust and not be afraid.' I need hardly tell you that the Lord did provide for that widow and her little ones, which He will do to all those who cast themselves entirely upon Him."

A Puzzle for an Aged Lady.—Mr. Fraser said: "An old maiden lady who lived in a mansion house did not feel at home when the Gospel was preached, and being determined that she would not come under its influence made a vow that no preacher should enter her dwelling. One said he would gain admittance, to the surprise of those who knew how averse the lady was to admit such visitors. Going to the gate of her house, he stood there until the lady came to inquire his errand. 'There is a friend of mine in your house,' he politely said, in answer to her query. 'There is no friend of yours in my house,' she said with surprise. But as he insisted that there was, she threw open the gate, bidding him enter and look for himself. He entered her drawing-room, closely followed by the lady. Going forward he lifted a Bible which lay upon the table, saying, as he did so: 'This is my friend.' And then he quietly opened the Bible, and read: 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' In her momentary surprise the lady had forgotten her vow. 'Are those words in the Bible?' she asked. 'Most assuredly they are,' rejoined the minister; 'read them for yourself.' Taking the offered book from his hand, she gazed upon that verse, which setmed specially directed to herself. There he left her alone with God and her newly awakened conscience. And His message was not in vain."

A Wife's Fruitless Intercession.—A Gentleman remarked: "When I was staying on the banks of the Mersey, there was a case brought up at the Crown Court of a young married man, who was charged with murder. When the morning of the trial arrived the court-house was crowded, as the prisoner, with a pale, haggard face, stood up before the judge. His counsel pleaded for him, and the jury retired. The court-house was still, not a sound was heard; every one was anxious to hear the fate of the young man. In three minutes the jury returned with their decision of 'Guilty, my Lord.' The poor shivering culprit stood before his judge, not daring to open his mouth. A woman rose from the back of the hall with a baby in her arms. She came quickly forward until she stood before the judge. It was the prisoner's wife. 'Oh, sir,' she exclaimed, 'can't you forgive him? can't you forgive him? if not for his own sake, for the sake of his poor wife?' The judge was seen to tremble, and the tears gathered in his eyes as he put on the black cap, to condemn him, for he had no power to clear the guilty if the law said he must die. And, unsaved friend, when you come to stand before the judgment bar of God He cannot clear the guilty, but will bring out his sins and set them before him. God cannot clear the guilty. Christ alone is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth on Him and to none besides."

MATERNITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached at St. Louis, Mo., last Sunday Morning, March 28th, 1886.

"Moreover, his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice."—1 SAMUEL 2:19.

An Intelligent Mother—Discriminating Parents—The Rod Not a Complete Compendium—III. A Christian Mother—Not many Prayerless Mothers—A Worldly Mother's Advice—A $500 Dress that Cost a Soul.—IV. The Rewarded Mother—The Old Christian Mother's Visions.

THE stories of Deborah and Abigail are very apt to discourage a woman's soul. She says within herself: "It is impossible that I ever can achieve any such grandeur of character, and I don't mean to try;" as though a child should refuse to play the eight notes because he cannot execute a "William Tell." This Hannah of the text differs from the persons I just now named. She was an ordinary woman, with ordinary intellectual capacity, placed in the ordinary circumstances, and yet, by extraordinary piety, standing out before all the ages to come.

THE MODEL CHRISTIAN MOTHER.

Hannah was the wife of Elkanah, who was a person very much like herself—unromantic and plain, never having fought a battle or been the subject of a marvellous escape. Neither of them would have been called a genius. Just what you and I might be, that was Elkanah and Hannah. The brightest time in all the history of that family was the birth of Samuel. Although no star ran along the heavens pointing down to his birthplace, I think the angels of God stooped at the coming of so wonderful a prophet.

As Samuel had been given in answer to prayer, Elkanah and all his family, save Hannah, started up to Shiloh to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving. The cradle where the child slept was altar enough for Hannah's grateful heart, but when the boy was old enough she took him to Shiloh and took three bullocks, and an ephah of flour, and a bottle of wine, and made offering of sacrifice unto the Lord, and there, according to a previous vow, she left him; for there he was to stay all the days of his life, and minister in the temple.

Years rolled on, and every year Hannah made with her own hand a garment for Samuel, and took it over to him. The lad would have got along well without that garment, for I suppose he was well clad by the ministry of the temple; but Hannah could not be contented unless she was all the time doing something for her darling boy. "Moreover, his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice."

I. Hannah stands before you, then, in the first place, as

AN INDUSTRIOUS MOTHER.

There was no need for her to work. Elkanah, her husband, was far from poor. He belonged to a distinguished family; for the Bible tells us that he was the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu, the son of Zuph. "Who were they?" you say. I do not know; but they were distinguished people, no doubt, or their names would not have been mentioned.

Hannah might have seated herself with her family, and, with folded arms and dishevelled hair, read novels from year to year, if there had been any to read; but when I see her making that garment, and taking it over to Samuel, I know she is industrious from principle as well as from pleasure. God would not have a mother become a drudge or a slave; He would have her employ all the helps possible in this day in the rearing of her children. But Hannah ought never to be ashamed to be found making a coat for Samuel.

Most mothers need no counsel in this direction. The wrinkles on their brow, the pallor on their cheek, the thimble-mark on their finger, attest that they are faithful in their maternal duties. The bloom, and the brightness, and the vivacity of girlhood have given place for the grandeur dignity, and usefulness, and industry of motherhood. But there is getting abroad in some of the families of Americans; there are mothers who banish themselves from the home circle. For three fourths of their maternal duties they prove themselves incompetent. They are ignorant of what their children wear, and what their children eat, and what their children read. They intrust to irresponsible persons these young immortals, and allow them to be under influences which may cripple their bodies, or taint their purity, or spoil their manners, or destroy their souls.

From the awkward cut of Samuel's coat you know his mother Hannah did not make it. Out from under flaming chandeliers, and off from imported carpets, and down the granite stairs, there has come a great crowd of children in this day, untrained, saucy, incompetent for all practical duties of life, ready to be caught in the first whirl of crime and sensuality. Indolent and unfaithful mothers will make indolent and unfaithful children. You cannot expect neatness and order in any house where the daughters see nothing but slatternness and upside-downniveness in their parents. Let Hannah be idle, and most certainly Samuel will grow up idle.

Who are the industrious men in all our occupations and professions? Who are they managing the merchandise of the world, building the walls, tinning the roofs, weaving the carpets, making the laws, governing the nations, making the earth to quake, and heave, and roar, and rattle with the tread of gigantic enterprises? Who are they? For the most part they descended from industrious mothers, who, in the old homestead, used to spin their own yarn, and weave their own carpets, and plait their own door-mats, and flag their own chairs, and do their own work. The stalwart men and the

of this day, ninety-nine out of a hundred of them, came from such an illustrious ancestry of hard knuckles and homespun.

And who are these people in society, light as froth, blown every whither of temptation and fashion—the peddlers of filthy stories, the dancing-jacks of political parties, the scum of society, the tavern-lounging, the store-infesting, the men of low wink, and filthy chuckle, and brass breastpins, and rotten associations? For the most part, they came from mothers idle and disgusting—the scandal-mongers of society, going from house to house, attending to everybody's business but their own, believing in witches, and ghosts, and horseshoes to keep the devil out of the churn, and by a godless life setting their children on the very verge of hell. The mothers of Samuel Johnson, and of Alfred the Great, and of Isaac Newton, and of St. Augustine, and of Richard Cecil, and of President Edwards, for the most part were industrious, hard-working mothers.

Now, while I congratulate all Christian mothers upon the wealth and the modern science which may afford them all kinds of help, let me say that every mother ought to be observant of her children's walk, her children's behavior, her children's food, her children's looks, her children's companionships. However much help Hannah may have, I think she ought every year, at least, make one garment for Samuel. The Lord have mercy on the man who is so unfortunate as to have had a lazy mother!

II. Again, Hannah stands before you as

AN INTELLIGENT MOTHER.

From the way in which she talked in this chapter, and from the way she managed this boy, you know she was intelligent. There are no persons in a community who need to be so wise and well-informed as mothers.

Oh! this work of culture in children for this world and the next! This child is timid, and it must be roused up and pushed out into activity. This child is forward, and he must be held back and tamed down into modesty and politeness. Rewards for one, punishments for another. That which will make George will ruin John. The rod is necessary in one case, while a frown of displeasure is more than enough in another. Whipping and a dark closet do not exhaust all the rounds of domestic discipline. There have been children who have grown up and gone to glory without ever having had their ears boxed.

Oh, how much care and intelligence are necessary in the rearing of children! But in this day, when there are so many books on the subject, no parent is excusable in being ignorant of the best mode of

BRINGING UP A CHILD.

If parents knew more of dietetics there would not be so many dyspeptic stomachs, and weak nerves, and inactive livers among children. If parents knew more of physiology there would not be so many curved spines, and cramped chests, and inflamed throats, and diseased lungs as there are among children. If parents knew more of art, and were in sympathy with all that is beautiful, there would not be so many children coming out in the world with boorish proclivities. If parents knew more of Christ, and practised more of His religion, there would not be so many little feet already starting on the wrong road, and all around us voices of riot and blasphemy would not come up with such ecstasy of infernal triumph.

The eaglets in the eyrie have no advantages over the eaglets of a thousand years ago; the kids have no superior way of climbing up the rocks than the old goats taught hundreds of years ago; the whelps know no more now than did the whelps of ages ago—they are taught no more by the lions of the desert; but it is a shame that in this day, when there are so many opportunities of improving ourselves in the best manner of cultivating children, that so often there is no more advancement in this respect than there has been among the kids and the eaglets and the whelps.

III. Again, Hannah stands before you as A CHRISTIAN MOTHER.

From her prayers and from the way she consecrated her boy to God, I know that she was good. A mother may have the finest culture, the most brilliant surroundings; but she is not fit for her duties unless she be a Christian mother. There may be well-read libraries in the house, and exquisite music in the parlor, and the canvas of the best artists adorning the walls, and the wardrobe be crowded with tasteful apparel, and the children be wonderful for their attainments, and make the house ring with laughter and innocent mirth, but there is something woeful-looking in that house if it be not also the residence of a Christian mother.

I bless God that there are not many prayerless mothers—not many of them. The weight of responsibility is so great that they feel the need of a divine hand to help, and a divine voice to comfort, and a divine heart to sympathize. Thousands of mothers have been led into the kingdom of God by the hands of their little children. There were hundreds of mothers who would not have been Christians had it not been for the prattle of their little ones. Standing some day in the nursery, they bethought themselves: "This child God has given me to raise for eternity. What is my influence upon it? Not being a Christian myself, how can I ever expect him to become a Christian? Lord, help me!" Are there who know nothing of the infinite help of religion? Then I commend to them Hannah, the pious mother of Samuel. Do not think it is absolutely impossible that your children come up iniquitous. Out of just such fair brows, and bright eyes, and soft hands, and innocent hearts, crime gets its victims—extirpating purity from the heart, and rubbing out the smoothness from the brow, and quenching the lustre of the eye, and shrivelling up and poisoning and putrefying and scathing and scalding and blasting and burning with shame and woe.

Every child is a bundle of tremendous possibilities; and whether that child shall come forth to life, its heart attuned to the eternal harmonies, and after a life of usefulness on earth go to a life of joy in heaven; or whether across it shall jar eternal discords, and after a life of wrong-doing on earth it shall go to a home of impenetrable darkness and an abyss of immeasurable plunge, is being decided by nursery song, and Sabbath lesson and evening prayer and walk and ride and look and frown and smile. Oh, how many children in glory, crowding all the battlements, and lifting a million-voiced hosanna, brought to God through Christian parentage!

One hundred and twenty clergymen were together, and they were telling their experience and their ancestry; and of the one hundred and twenty clergymen, how many of them, do you suppose, assigned as the means of their conversion the influence of a Christian mother? One hundred out of the one hundred and twenty! Philip Doddridge was brought to God by the Scripture lesson on the Dutch tile of a chimney fireplace. The mother thinks she is only rocking a child, but at the same time she may be rocking the fate of nations, rocking the glories of heaven. The same maternal power that may lift the child up may press a child down.

A daughter came to

and said she was anxious about her sins, and she had been praying all night. The mother said: "Oh, stop praying! I don't believe in praying. Get over all these religious notions and I'll give you a dress that will cost $500, and you may wear it next week to that party." The daughter took the dress, and she moved in the gay circle, the gayest of all the gay, that night; and sure enough, all religious impressions were gone, and she stopped praying. A few months after she came to die, and in her closing moments said: "Mother, I wish you would bring me that dress that cost $500." The mother thought it a very strange request, but she brought it to please the dying child. "Now," said the daughter, "mother, hang that dress on the foot of my bed," and the dress was hung there, on the foot of the bed. Then the dying girl got up on one elbow and looked at her mother, and then pointed to the dress, and said: "Mother, that dress is the price of my soul!" Oh, what a momentous thing it is to be a mother!

IV. Again, and lastly, Hannah stands before you

THE REWARDED MOTHER.

For all the coats she made for Samuel, for all the prayers she offered for him, for the discipline exerted over him, she got abundant compensation in the piety and the usefulness and the popularity of her son Samuel; and that is true in all ages. Every mother gets full pay for all the prayers and tears in behalf of her children. That man useful in commercial life; that man prominent in a profession; that master mechanic—why, every step he takes in life has an echo of gladness in the old heart that long ago taught him to be a Christian, and heroic and earnest.

The story of what you have done, or what you have written, of the influence you have exerted, has gone back to the old homestead—for there is some one always ready to carry good tidings—and that story makes the needle in the old mother's tremulous hand fly quicker, and the flail in the father's hand come down upon the barn floor with a vigorous thump. Parents love to hear good news from their children. Do you send them good news always?

Look out for the young man who speaks of his father as "the governor," the "squire," or the "old chap." Look out for the young woman who calls her mother her "maternal ancestor," or the "old woman." "The eye that mocketh at his father, and refuseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it."

God grant that all these parents may have the great satisfaction of seeing their children grow up Christians. But, oh! the pang of that mother who, after a life of street-gadding and gossip-retailing, hanging on the children the fripperies and follies of this world, sees those children tossed out on the sea of life like foam on the wave, or nonentities in a world where only bravery and stalwart character can stand the shock! But blessed be the mother who looks upon her children as sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty.

Oh! the satisfaction of Hannah in seeing Samuel serving at the altar; of Mother Eunice in seeing her Timothy learned in the Scriptures. That is the mother's recompense, to see children coming up useful in the world, reclaiming the lost, healing the sick, pitying the ignorant, earnest and useful in every sphere. That throws a new light back on the old family Bible whenever she reads it, and that will be ointment to soothe the aching limbs of decrepitude, and light up the closing hours of life's day with the glories of an autumnal sunset!

There she sits,

THE OLD CHRISTIAN MOTHER,

ripe for heaven. Her eyesight is almost gone, but the splendors of the celestial city kindle up her vision. The gray light of heaven's morn has struck through the gray locks which are folded back over the wrinkled temples. She stoops very much now under the burden of care she used to carry for her children. She sits at home, too old to find her way to the house of God; but while she sits there, all the past comes back, and the children that forty years ago tripped around her arm-chair with their griefs and joys and sorrows—those children are gone now. Some caught up into a better realm, where they shall never die, and others out in the broad world, testing the excellency of a Christian mother's discipline. Her last days are full of peace; and calmer and sweeter will her spirit become, until the gates of life shall lift and let in the worn-out pilgrim into eternal springtide and youth, where the limbs never ache, and the eyes never grow dim, and the staff of the exhausted and decrepit pilgrim shall become the palm of the immortal athlete!

NOTES OF FOREIGN MISSION WORK.

The Fiji Jubilee—A Contrast.—The Rev. Thomas Williams, now Missionary Secretary in Australia, writes from Levuka under date December 19th, 1885: "I passed a night at my old and horror-crowded station, Somosomo, where with the brethren Lyth, Hunt, Cross, and Hazlewood, and our noble wives, I endured sufferings of no common kind. But they are passed, and on the ground where once I walked among the slain, among open ovens and devil temples, I have addressed a neatly attired and attentive audience in connection with the celebration of the jubilee of the Wesleyan Mission in Viti. I witnessed strange scenes here from the year 1843 to the year 1849; and those which are daily passing before me, as a member of the deputation, are by contrast equally strange. Jehovah hath confounded the gods of the heathen and gotten to Himself a glorious victory. Hallelujah!"

A Visit to a King.—The Rev. J. A. Alley, of Port Lokkoh, writes: "On our return to Port Lokkoh in January, 1885, we found the Alikali, the late king of Port Lokkoh, had died, and the people were busy making preparations for the coronation of a new king. These were finished, and the governor from Sierra Leone came up on February 27th for the purpose of crowning the new king. Unfortunately we had to be away in Sierra Leone for the ordination when this important event took place. On our return, however, I visited the new king in company with the Rev. J. T. Asgill, from Sierra Leone, and the interpreter, to pay my respects and congratulations. The king gave us a hearty welcome, and said he was very glad to see me return from England, and as this was the first time he had seen me since our return, no doubt I had brought something good from my own country for the king. I told him I had. I had brought the Word of God, which could give the king true wisdom. If the king would accept of it, I would make him a present of an Arabic Bible, in remembrance of his coronation. This his Mohammedan friends might read to him. The king thanked me, and said he would accept of the Bible, but I must put something nice on the top of it, especially as I had just come from England. I replied the Word of God would give the king understanding, and that is one of the best gifts of God to man. However, to show our good-will to the king, I would send something with the Bible, on the understanding that he must regard the Bible the chief present."

A Chinese Christian Welcome.—The Rev. A. G. Jones, a missionary in China, much used of God, says: "Coming home from the station I had been to one Sunday, I made a detour of a mile or two to see a Christian family I had not visited since I came back to China. I knocked, and a child came. He called his mother, and she asked me in. The old couple I had come to see were out, but were sent for. First came the wife, a woman of over sixty. 'Oh, minister,' she said, 'I am so glad to see you! I heard you had come back,' and then she began to recount all that was uppermost in her mind. 'How good the Heavenly Father has been to you in bringing you back from England! Oh, what a hard-hearted people we are here! How little the people here realize the pains taken to send the heavenly doctrine to them! I exhort the people around me here to repent and believe the truth, that they may be saved; but they sneer at me, and ask me: "Will your minister support us if we become Christians?" "No," I say. "Who supports the missionaries?" "Why, God does, of course, and God will support you. God is supporting you (that is, the people she was exhorting) now, and much more will God support you then." Ah!' she continued, 'they don't know the Scriptures, the precious Scriptures, and they won't believe me. But,' she said, 'I read these Scriptures morning and night. I could not get on without them.' And so she went on for about a quarter of an hour, meantime sending out for this one and that one to come and see me."

Fire at a Mission Station.—The Following are extracts from recent letters from Rev. Harry George Whitley, of Stanley Pool, the Baptist Congo Mission, lately received by his father, Thomas Whitley, Esq., of Enfield: "Twice lately our premises here have been seriously threatened by fire. The dry season being nearly over, the grass is very high, ten to eighteen feet, and numerous fires are breaking out all over the country, and, knowing that sooner or later fires must come to our ground, I commenced clearing the long grass around our houses. One night about 11.30 I woke up with that peculiar feeling that there was something wrong. I listened intently, and heard another sound beside that of the wind and the roar of the falls. I got up and opened the windows, and immediately saw and heard a great fire close to us, marching like a destroying army. In less time than it takes to write, I was into my dressing-gown and boots only, and out of the house, starting my boys off to call up the work-people, whose house is some distance from mine. I put my people on various houses, and, as fast as blazing bunches of grass fell on the roofs or in the yard, we stamped them out. At the end of two hours' very hard work we were hot, begrimed with smoke, and greatly fatigued, but we had conquered, and not a building was lost. I stayed to see the last smouldering embers in the camp put out, while the fire raged on past us, and then returned with a thankful heart to bed; and so God preserved the Mission Station. What does God mean us to do? Are we attempting too much? When we hear of fresh men coming out, it is with a sensation of fear, for the majority of those who have gone on before were new men. Still we will hope on as well as pray, and will do our duty under all circumstances."

JERUSALEM THE GOLDEN.

AFTER having offered a few general remarks, we enter very briefly into matters of detail, in which are involved many questions which have puzzled students of this twelfth vision of the Revelation, always keeping before our mind the solemnity of the subject, and also our own ignorance. With the help and the guidance of the Holy Spirit we will dwell on the same expressions used in the Old Testament dispensation, which plainly speak of the state of redeemed Israel in the latter days—the days of the millennium.

RESTITUTION.

In verse 1 is said: "And I saw a new heaven, and a new earth for the first heaven; and the first earth were passed away" ("gone by," Young), "and there was no more sea," literally, the sea is no longer. And in verse 5 He that sat upon the throne said: "Behold, I make all things new."

Already we have called attention to the fact that Isa. 65: 17, 66: 22 speak of new heavens and a new earth at the restoration of Israel. We have also a parallel in the word "gone by." Bengel says "passed by;" yea, a more emphatic expression we read in II Pet. 3: 6, 7, in which is said "that the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished." That restitution is meant, and not annihilation is plain, verse 4: "For the former, or first things, are passed away;" and in Isa. 65: 17: "And the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" (Acts 3: 19-21).

"The sea was no longer" leads us to Gen. 1: 3: 14, 15. The land whereon the five cities stood were belonging to the gift and property incorporated in the Abrahamic covenant; and although afterward destroyed, they must and will be restored when Abraham shall be the heir of the world (Rom. 4: 13). The Dead Sea shall be no longer. The emblem of death cannot continue where life and immortality reigneth.

"I make all things new," Bengel says. A more ancient reading is: "I make new all things." And by this transposition of the same words, the restitution of all things (Acts 3: 19-21) is plainly stated.

NEW JERUSALEM.

In verses 10-27 is given a description of Jerusalem the Golden—a view of that city so unique and dazzling that it reaches a height and a breadth and a length far surpassing our narrow gaze; no wonder that John felt an ecstasy when he stood on the mountain-top, viewing that holy city descending out of heaven from God! And what shall it be to see Jesus as He is and to be like Him? (I John 3: 2). It will be a sight above all description; it will require an eternity of adoration and joy to fathom that sight and to enjoy that privilege.

The surroundings of the city are marked out. It lieth four square, had a great and high wall, had twelve gates and twelve foundations, a street (market-place), but no temple having the glory of God and of the Lamb to lighten it. The inhabitants are perfectly happy in body, mind, and spirit (verse 4), and the nations and the kings of the earth bring their glory and honor into it.

UNIQUE BUILDING MATERIAL.

Reading about the materials used in the building of the New Jerusalem we are perplexed indeed, and were it not that we find the same or like descriptions in the prophecies of the seers of Israel, we would not go further; but we are encouraged by the word of prophecy to proceed, and therefore we give a short oversight, begging the unbiassed reader to examine the following synopsis:

In both we have "the indwelling" of the "Most High" (Ezek. 43: 1-7; 48: 3; Jer. 3: 17; Zech. 2: 10-13, in connection with Rev. 21: 3, 5, 11; 22: 3). In both is said that "no curse, no tears, no pain nor death shall be known to the holy inhabitants of that city" (Isa. 25: 8; 35: 10; 65: 19; Zech. 14: 11, in connection with Rev. 22: 3). In both is recorded "that the nations and their kings enter through the gates, and bring their treasures and glory into it" (Isa. 49: 22, 23; 60: 3-11; 66: 12); the same words are found in Rev. 21: 24-26. In both there is made mention "of twelve gates" (Ezek. 48: 31-34; Rev. 21: 12, 13). In both is said "that the city had no need of the sun, and that the glory of God did lighten it" (Isa. 60: 19, 20; Rev. 21: 23). And, most remarkably, both are brought in connection with and in opposition to Babylon of old and to Babylon the Antichristian Hierarchy (Rev. 18: 10-20; Rev. 21: 10).

THE PEARLY GATES.

That we cannot fully explain the rich expressions found in this twelfth vision must be obvious to all who desire to give the true explanation to the word of God; but shall we therefore refrain from contemplating those precious words? We think not. If any of the scientists who lived prior to the nineteenth century had been asked, "Will this age witness the phenomenon that nations will speak by instruments and lines running along the deep caverns of the ocean, and annihilate time and space?" we venture to say not one would or could have solved that question in full. And if this is true in the scientific world, shall we demand an unravelling of deep secrets before we will accept the truth? Rather let us follow the example of the Prophet Daniel and "search the Book" (Dan. 9: 2).

That the Revelation speaks of pearly gates, or gates of pearl—"every gate was of one pearl"—we admit; and yet we do know that pearls, gold, and precious stones have no "real" value in heaven nor for the saintly soul "redeemed by the precious blood of Christ" (I Peter 1: 18, 19). The Greek word translated pearls in general means "precious stones." Michaelis II., p. 1012, and Herodotus, lib. 1, says of Babylon: "And it was adorned as was no other city, where the adornment is the ditch, the wall, and the gates."

Vitringa supposes that the gates should have a pearly color, white and beautiful, and his supposition seems to apply to the other precious metals found in verses 16-21.

We do not desire to cavil with those who foster other ideas; we rather contemplate other passages in Holy Writ where we may get some explanation of the above-mentioned mysterious verses.

The Prophet Isaiah speaks in Isa. 54: 9-12 about Israel's final return and the surety of the Noachian and Abrahamic covenant in the following mysterious words: "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones." It seems like an echo of the words found in Rev. 21: 16-20.

If we closely examine the texts in which those precious stones are referred to, we will find in many places that a special reference is made not to the value of the stones, but to their color. We quote Rev. 4: 3; Exod. 24: 3; Song 5: 14; Lam. 4: 7; Ezek. 1: 16; Dan. 10: 6; and in Rev. 9: 17, where we read: "And I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire and jacinth."

We also ought to observe that five of those stones are of a green color, three of a blue, two red, one white, and one of a rose-color. The renowned Vitringa, l. c., p. 68, says: "The apostle had more his idea concerning the color than on the intrinsic value of those precious stones." So Grotius and others.

It must also draw our particular attention that in verses 11 and 18 the Greek word like, resembling, is used, and that the original text has no verb of was or any other word. Verses 19 and 20 read literally: "And the foundations of the wall of the city with all manner of precious stones have been adorned: the first foundation jasper . . . the twelfth amethyst" (Young). It does not say that the foundations of the wall were built of jasper, but says "garnished" (adorned, N. V.). The same Greek word is used in Matt. 12: 44; 23: 29.

To speak about the measurement, the length, the breadth, and the height of the city would require more space than can be allowed in such an article as this. In conclusion, we say that Jerusalem the Golden belongs to our mundane regions, and shall be once the great and holy city, the metropolis of the globe. "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city" (Rev. 22: 14).

THE LATE REV. W. E. BOARDMAN.

THE death of this eminent clergyman, who was well known in America, which we mentioned in our issue of February 11th, has called forth the following remarks from some who loved him dearly, some of which we extract from Thy Healer, of March 15th.*

Miss Murray says: "As I am one of those who were permitted to share in the ministries of his last days among us, I write to give a few of the details which you will naturally wish to know."

"On January 27th, after a very blessed Wednesday meeting, in which he had spoken most precious words on becoming 'as little children,' he was during the night struck with paralysis, and entirely lost the use of his right side. After prayer and anointing, he recovered his consciousness, and, in great measure, his speech, and within two hours he was speaking of a book which he had been reading before retiring to rest. During the week he was spared to us; his mind was as vigorous and clear as ever, his interest in all the work at Bethshan was as keen as ever, he kept count of all the meetings held, and whoever came in after a meeting was asked all the details. Very blessed it was to see how deeply his soul was steeped in God, how cloudless and unbroken was the communion—his spiritual being so entirely responsive to Him. The sick room was full of the presence of God. One thing was very remarkable. He never seemed conscious that he was paralyzed, or was in the smallest degree occupied with his physical condition; he never saw his illness, he never saw death, he only saw God and God's faithfulness, and he rested on the certainty that all was for blessing."

"And so on February 4th he passed from among us into the glory which had been so near to him all through his life. Often of late the veil between him and it seemed so thin, we seemed almost to catch its reflection on his face and in his words. To him to live was Christ, and yet to die was gain—gain to him in the glorious possibilities of service within the veil, untrammelled by the limitations of the body, and in the increased capacity for knowing God. And even to us all, so intimately associated with him in his blessed work, and to the Church of God there is gain in this death. We have learned what God is, and what He can do, as never before; and glorious witness has been added to the completeness of the victory we have in Christ over death and the grave, and to the truth of the words, 'If a man keep My saying, he shall never see death.'"

Mrs. Boardman, the deceased minister's beloved wife, speaking the day after the funeral, said: "I must tell you how the Lord has led me from the beginning of these past days in a wonderful way. When my dear one was taken ill, He gave me the hope of his being raised up. I was full of it, and exulted over it. I did not know how much I was exulting in it. The first days it was so sure to me. I never had anything that seemed surer to me than that God had permitted him to be taken down with a disease which two physicians had pronounced fatal, that He might be glorified in healing him. I thought there would be more glory to God in having brought him to death, and then raising him up."

* Thy Healer: God's Dealings with Soul and Body, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, a magazine devoted to holiness and healing, published in London on the first and fifteenth of every month. Copies are sent to subscribers in America direct from Bethshan as soon as printed. Annual subscription, including postage, seventy-five cents. Subscriptions for 1886 should be sent to Mrs. M. Baxter, 10 Drayton Park, Highbury, London, England, or to Mr. Charles Walton, 63 Bible House, New York, by whom they will be forwarded to London.

And so I went on until I thought Saturday was going to be the day that he would be raised; I thought the Lord showed me Saturday would be the day. I think He permitted me to have this expectation and to be lifted up by it, because He saw that otherwise I might be crushed. I knew He permitted it for good to me. It did keep me up, and prepared me for what should follow. . . .

"I said, 'Lord, I do praise Thee, I will praise Thee, I will accept the praise Thou hast for me, and praise Thee that Thou hast taken him just in the midst of life and health, without anything apparently the matter with him. I will praise Thee because Thou seest that is the right way, because Thou wilt be more glorified by it, than if he had lived longer, because Thou seest how blessed and how glorious will be that death, and Thou hast the right to do it, and I will praise.' And He did fill with me with praise, He has just filled me with praise in Himself. And then He has come into my soul in such a way as I never before knew.

"Just as on February 21st, 1837, He united us, and made us one in heart and soul, and kept us one all the way through, just so He came after my dear one was laid out. He came between him, that body, and myself, and He has put separation from that body, separation now as complete as the union was in 1837; He made it so. And so, dear ones, we can just glorify God for what He has done, and can do. It is really marvellous. Those of you who know the oneness and union there was between us, know what God has done; those of you who know me best know what He has done to His glory, and what He can do, what He will do for every soul who will trust Him. He will bring them into oneness with Him, that they will choose with Him; whatever gives the greatest sorrow that can come to the soul, when we choose with Him, it becomes a great and glorious manifestation of Himself to take the place of everything. And so He has told me that He will keep me a little while longer to comfort others. So I know my work the remainder of my life is just to comfort others. The Lord enable me to do it."

CHILD MARRIAGE IN INDIA.

IN an interesting letter from Calcutta, India, to the Missionary Link, Miss Marston gives an instance of the unhappy effects of the custom of child marriage, the victim being one of her own pupils. She writes:

I have something to tell you which has been a very great sorrow and trial to me. My dear little Motee has been married. I have had hopes to take her to America and educate her under influences that could develop her Christian life. The dear child was so anxious for this plan of mine to be carried out, and the family even would have given their consent. In the holidays preparations were made for her marriage with a boy about fifteen years of age.

On my first visit to the house after the holidays I was informed that the marriage would take place the following week. She shrank from marriage as from something terrible, and clinging to me, she said: "Oh, let me go with you!" I felt very helpless; but the next morning, passing the house, I went in to ask for Motee, and was told the marriage was not to take place. The father of the bridegroom had demanded such an exorbitant marriage dowry that Motee's father refused to give it. I was very thankful.

All things went on very quietly for two weeks more, when another bridegroom was found; a more advantageous match in every way, especially that he was much older, more responsible, and better able to take care of a little wife. The marriage took place between my weekly visits, and must have been a doleful affair, for Motee cried all day and through the ceremony, begging them to send for her teacher; but the Babu was only too anxious to get it over without my presence, so I was not sent for.

Her husband is an orthodox Hindoo, and in the course of our lesson I asked her what she would do if he should insist on her bathing in the Ganges to wash away her sins. "I should tell him," she said, "that the Ganges water could not wash away my sins; that only the blood of Jesus Christ could do that." We can only pray for her that her faith may not be shaken, but I fear sore trial is before her.

A BRIDE OF TWELVE YEARS.

Miss Dutt, a native missionary, in a letter to the same periodical, gives another instance of the same evil. She writes: One of my best scholars was married the other day. If you had seen her how she cried when she was sent off with her husband to his house, you would have felt the oppression of compulsory child marriage. She cannot be more than twelve years old; her parents and others seemed almost at their wits' end because they could not get an eligible person to dispose of their burden. At last an offer came from the family of a young man of the suburbs of this city, who is the possessor of a small estate, but devoid of university education. His family did not demand much, and at once the wedding was arranged. The poor girl being old enough to comprehend that it was a question of life-long misery or happiness, felt dubious and timid. In the afternoon a covered palanquin came for the bride, and a barouche and pair for the bridegroom. The former was dressed in red silk saree and the latter in a brilliant tinsel suit. The bride was carried down by a female relative to be put inside the palanquin, when the bride lifted up her voice and wept. I tried to soothe her, but with no effect. She is one of my most advanced pupils, and well versed in Scripture knowledge.

THE DISCOURSE.

[The following or any other short discourse may be read. The reader may enlarge upon any sentence, or introduce other matter. The paragraph divisions and italics will assist.]

Text: "But then, face to face" (1 Cor. 13: 12).

We Christians now see but as by a mirror darkly or distortedly. The apostle referred in this passage to the metallic reflectors used among the ancients, which, however prepared and polished, reflected images inaccurately.

All that we now see of truth and God is seen that way. Enough is shown to teach us the direction in which the reflected object stands, and to enable us to recognize it when we see it "face to face."

The three mirrors from which God's truths are reflected on us are: external nature, the moral constitution of man, and the Bible. They are only mirrors; "but then," we shall see "face to face."

What an exciting anticipation!

We shall see the truth, not as dimly adumbrated in shadows and in types, but standing out clear, in the fine, rare atmosphere of the spiritual world.

We shall so see principles, relationships, spiritual existences, and God.

Even in natural things, how little we see of Him here! The air of the earth is so gross, the refraction of the rays of light so great, our organs of intellectual and spiritual vision so blurred!

Oh, to have these orbs purged, this air purified, and all things set in the white light of eternity!

Can I see God "face to face?" Moses desired that, and could not obtain the sight. No man in the flesh can see Him out of the flesh and live. But when removed from this human limitation we shall see Him "face to face," and become ourselves mirrors. "We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John 3: 2).

[The Lord's Prayer should be used somewhere in each service, and the service may be closed with the "Gloria" or other Doxology.]

AFTERNOON TALK.

[A service may be held, and the following discourse read:]

THE NEW NAME.

By an English Clergyman.

In Rev. 2: 17 the Lord says: "To him that overcometh I will give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." The giving of the white stone with the new name is the communication of what God thinks about the man to the man. It is the divine judgment, the solemn holy doom of the righteous man, the "Come, thou blessed," spoken to the individual.

In order to see this, we must first understand what is the idea of a name—that is, what is the perfect notion of a name. For, seeing that the mystical energy of a holy mind here speaks of God as giving something, we must understand that the essential thing, and not any of its accidents or imitations, is intended.

A name of the ordinary kind in this world has nothing essential in it. It is but a label by which one man and a scrap of his external history may be known from another man and a scrap of his history. The only names which have significance are those which the popular judgment or prejudice or humor bestows, either for ridicule or honor, upon a few out of the many. Each of these is founded upon some external characteristic of the man, upon some predominant peculiarity of temper, some excellence or the reverse of character, or something which he does or has done well or ill enough, or, at least, singularly enough, to render him, in the eyes of the people, worthy of such distinction from other men. As far as they go, these are real names, for, in some poor measure, they express individuality.

The true name is one which expresses the character, the nature, the being, the meaning of the person who bears it. It is the man's own symbol—his soul's picture, in a word, the sign which belongs to him and to no one else. Who can give a man this, his own name? God alone. For no one but God sees what the man is, or even, seeing what he is, could express in a name-word the sum and harmony of what he sees. To whom is this name given? To him that overcometh. When is it given? When he has overcome. Does God then not know what a man is going to become? As surely as He sees the oak which He put there lying in the heart of the acorn. Why, then, does He wait till the man has become by overcoming ere He settles what his name shall be? He does not wait; He knows his name from the first. But as—although repentance comes because God pardons—yet the man becomes aware of the pardon only in the repentance; so it is only when the man has become his name that God gives him the stone with the name upon it, for then first can he understand what his name signifies. Such a name cannot be given until the man is the name.

[The following poem may be committed to memory by the young people:]

NOT AS I WILL.

Blindfolded and alone I wait,
Loss seems too bitter, gain too late
Too heavy burdens in the load,
And too few helpers on the road;
And joy is weak, and grief is strong,
And years and days so long, so long;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That I am glad the good and ill
By changeless law are ordered still,
"Not as I will."

"Not as I will!" the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat.
"Not as I will!" the darkness feels
More safe than life when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness.
"Not as I will," because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all His love fulfil—
"Not as we will."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Edmunds Resolutions were Adopted by the Senate on Friday. The vote was a party one on all but the last, which pledged the Senate to reject nominations when information is refused concerning the conduct of officers removed to make way for new men in cases when the information is called for by the Senate. On that resolution three Republican Senators disobeyed the caucus, and voted against the resolution. It was, however, carried by a majority of one. The debate was marred by the delivery of a speech by Mr. Ingalls, of Kansas, which was unprecedented in the Senate. In attacking independent politicians he used similes so grossly indecent, and language so coarse and vulgar as to disgust every refined reader of his remarks. If the Kansas Legislature knew when they elected Mr. Ingalls, the character of his vocabulary, they certainly had little regard for the dignity of the Senate. The adoption of the resolutions has increased the prominence of Mr. Edmunds in the Republican ranks. There is curious evidence of the fact in an article published in the New York Tribune on the same day virulently assailing the Vermont Senator. The attack appearing in a Republican journal was a surprise to all who did not recognize its motive.

The Third Report of the Civil Service Commission was sent to Congress on March 26th, by the President. It is gratifying to notice that those concerned in its working—the President and the Commissioners—alike commend the law. We may hope that further experience will justify its extension to the higher grades of the Service. The President declared in the brief message accompanying the document that the results attained show conclusively that the reform system is "no longer an experiment," and that, on account of the actual working of the law and its "promise of increased usefulness," the "cause is recommended to the liberal care and jealous protection of the Congress." The Commissioners state in their report that they have received the hearty and unflinching support of the President and of the members of the Cabinet, and that there has not been permitted a single appointment in violation of the requirements of the law. The statistics of the report strengthen every favorable inference heretofore made. There have been one hundred and fifty examinations held during the past year, only five of which have been non-competitive. The number who have been examined is about seventy-five hundred, of whom a trifle less than two thirds have passed the minimum limit. The average age of all applicants has been thirty years. Only fourteen per cent of all examined were educated in part in colleges; eighty-six per cent were educated in the common schools or in business schools. The present system would cover the entire fourteen thousand offices to which it applies in from eight to ten years. During the last year there have been in the departments at Washington three hundred and fifty-eight appointees under the rules whose six months' term of probation expired. Of these only ten failed to give satisfaction as to character and capacity. Of permanent appointments there have been in all in the city of Washington seven hundred and twenty-five. Of this number, fourteen have been removed. This indicates that the methods of the Commissioners have resulted in the appointment of efficient men.

The Prostration of the Secretary of the Treasury on Tuesday, March 23d, by a stroke of apoplexy, has caused general anxiety throughout the country. The attack was very sudden. Mr. Manning attended the Cabinet meeting in the White House in the morning, and made no complaint of ill-health. He walked to the Treasury afterward, and in a few moments after reaching his private office his secretary found him lying prone on the floor. He was able to describe his sensations to Dr. Hamilton, who was summoned, but shortly afterward his utterance became indistinct, and he lost the use of his lower limbs. He was carried to his home, and his family, some members of which reside at a distance, were summoned. During the week his condition varied from day to day, but was at no time very hopeful. The physicians expressed the opinion that if he had no further attack he might recover. It is, however, improbable that he will be able to resume his duties at the Treasury.

The Famous Telephone Suit which has given rise to so much discussion by reason of the Attorney-General being an interested party, was commenced at Columbus, O., on March 23d, by the filing of a bill in equity against the Bell Telephone Company and other companies affiliated with it. The bill alleges that the telephone was not the invention of Professor Bell, and that consequently the patent was illegally and improperly procured. Judge Baxter, who is renowned for his judgments in patent cases, will try the case, and the vast interests involved, as well as the side issues that have been raised by it, will render it a matter of general interest.

The Close of the Great Strike in the Southwest was the welcome intelligence published on Monday morning last. At a conference between Jay Gould and T. V. Powderly, the chief of the Knights of Labor, which, we notice with regret, occupied nearly all day Sunday, an agreement was concluded under which the twelve thousand men who have been idle will resume work. Mr. Gould agreed to submit the points in dispute between the railroad company and the employés to a board of arbitration composed of three members of each side, the six to choose a seventh. Immediately this was conceded Mr. Powderly telegraphed the men an order to go to work. Mr. Gould also telegraphed to Vice-President Hoxie an order, in which he said: "In resuming the movement of trains on the Missouri Pacific, and in the employment of labor in the several departments of the company, you will give preference to our late employés, whether they are members of the Knights of Labor or not, except that you will not employ any person who has injured the company's property during the late strike." An important feature of this settlement is the recognition by Mr. Gould of the Knights of Labor. There is reason to hope that this concession, so long and stubbornly resisted, will tend to facilitate the amicable adjustment of differences in future, and the avoidance of strikes on the roads.

The Intensity of the Excitement in England on the subject of Mr. Gladstone's scheme for the pacification of Ireland increased last week. The suspense has become painful. Old men who remember the corn law agitation, half a century ago, say that though there were more popular demonstrations then, the general uneasiness did not equal that felt now. It was definitely announced on Thursday that in Mr. Gladstone's forthcoming declaration of his Irish policy the future government of the country would take precedence over the land question. This change of tactics is doubtless due to the opposition of the Radicals to the idea of expending a large sum in buying out the landlords. They insist that the landlords do not deserve to be bought out, but should be left to the mercy of an Irish Parliament. The tone of the press indicates that in proposing to give Ireland Home Rule to about the extent enjoyed by our individual States, Mr. Gladstone would have the support of his party with few exceptions. Even the Duke of Argyll, who was supposed to be unalterably opposed to Home Rule, is now reported to be in favor of it, providing Ireland is not represented in the Imperial Parliament. The land scheme, as far as it is understood at present, will divide the party, but the desertion of the Radicals may be offset by the support of landlords desirous of being bought out.

The Resignation of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Trevelyan, from Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet, was announced on Saturday last. Rumors have been in circulation for several weeks past that such an event was impending. It is understood that the two officials have resigned because they disapprove of the Premier's scheme for the solution of the Irish problem. Their defection not only weakens the Cabinet but increases public uneasiness. It implies that Mr. Gladstone's scheme must be open to serious objections or men so enthusiastically loyal to him would not take the grave step of resigning in a crisis. Probably Mr. Gladstone proposes to deal tenderly with the Irish landlords. A scheme involving a heavy expenditure would be one most likely to arouse Mr. Chamberlain's opposition. The prospect of passing the bill is now less hopeful than before. It appears to be too Radical to win Conservative support, and too Conservative to please the Radicals. Mr. Chamberlain's successor is Mr. James Stansfeld, a warm-hearted man, who is best known as the friend of the Italian patriot, Joseph Mazzini. It is rumored that Lord Dalhousie will succeed Mr. Trevelyan.

Prince Alexander of Bulgaria is Again at issue with Russia. The Czar insists that his term of office as "Governor" of the Bulgarians shall be limited to five years, while he claims that it is a life appointment. The prince is taking steps to convoke a general assembly of the people in the hope that they will confer upon him the title of king. It is believed that the prince has the support of England and Germany in his efforts, and that their countenance and protection will encourage him to defy Russia. The Eastern question is kept open on the other hand by Greece, which still persistently demands an accession of territory.

The Anarchist Disturbances in Belgium have assumed serious proportions. In Charleroi the damage done by the rioters exceeds two million dollars. This is partly borne by employers who are at issue with the men, and private gentlemen whose country houses have been sacked. The strike has extended from the miners and iron workers to other trades, among which the glass-workers are the most numerous. In the majority of cases the advance of wages demanded is twenty-five per cent. The ominous feature of the agitation is that foreign Socialists, principally Germans, have appeared, and are directing the movement. Under their guidance the agitation is assuming a more political form, in which the mere advance of wages is insignificant. The men are being incited to demand a redistribution of property, and to burn and ravage the cities. The gunsmiths' stores have been raided to supply the rioters with arms. Beggars and loafers have been pressed into the service, and arms have been supplied to them. Both Liege and Charleroi were all last week in the hands of the mob, the authorities having no force at their command capable of resisting the rioters. Even in Brussels the rioters held their demonstrations comparatively unmolested. They marched down to the king's palace, and there in a body sang the "Marseillaise." The cable reports say that the people generally do not sympathize with the rioters.

A Searching Inquiry into the Cause of the loss of the Oregon, of the Cunard Line, wrecked off Fire Island on March 14th, is to be made by the English Government. The inquiry will cover the general condition of Atlantic steam navigation. Several members of Parliament have questioned the Cabinet officers on the subject. The President of the Board of Trade, to whose department the inquiry belongs, said that the Oregon carried more boats than the law required, but by measurement they would hold only three hundred and sixty-five persons out of the eight hundred and forty-six on board. He thought the law needed revision, and said the commission of inquiry would consider the practicability of the use of rafts and floats. An opinion prevails that if the steamer was wrecked by a schooner and not by a dynamite explosion, as some contend, there must have been culpable negligence somewhere which the commission will be instructed to discover. It is stated that owners of property lost in the wreck may recover in the English courts from the Cunard Company, which will be reimbursed by the underwriters.

The Visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to Jacksonville, Fla. has been greatly blessed. Dr. Stephen Fisk, of that city, writes us that the services were a glorious success, resulting in the awakening of over three hundred souls. People came from all parts of the State to hear the evangelists. There was no audience-room in the city large enough to hold one fourth of them. Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church and Library Hall were both opened and densely crowded. The meetings were very solemn and earnest. The pastors of the various churches in the city co-operated with the evangelists, and will continue the services.

Major Whittle's Work in Kansas has been conducted under some difficulties, but has been remarkably successful. One practical outcome of it of an interesting character is related by a correspondent of Mr. Revell's Record. It occurred at Atchison, which has recently accepted the prohibitory law of the State after protracted resistance. One very cold morning Major Whittle suggested that, as the saloons were closed, it might be well to open a warm and comfortable place, with coffee and food for those who might need it. At once money was raised. A room that had been used as a saloon was offered, free of rent, for a week, and the ladies took charge of it. Major Whittle conducted a most interesting gospel temperance meeting there on Saturday evening. The resort was also a blessing to a number of storm-bound passengers in the depot.

Two of the Rescued Passengers of the Oregon related their experience last week at the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting. They said that for some time after the collision the prospect of safety was a dark one. They were on a sinking vessel, and death seemed very near. In that solemn experience they found Christ most precious, and His peace so filled their hearts their only wish was that the loved ones at home might know how calmly they faced possible death.

The Wetmore Home for Fallen and Friendless women in New York has just issued its twentieth annual report. During its existence 1635 girls and women whose ages average seventeen years have been rescued from a life of sin and shame through its means. Of these 438 have been restored to their friends, and 503 have been provided with situations. A number of the younger inmates of the Home have been adopted by Christian families. During the past year 121 were admitted to the Home. The capacity of the institution is limited to thirty members at a time, and this is but a very small percentage of those who apply for admission, as there are about ten thousand dissolute young women in this city alone. The managers of the Home suggest to Christian people interested in the rescue work a plan for extending it in a way that their experience satisfies them would be successful. It is that of establishing a home in the country to which women desiring to reform might be sent. More accommodation is urgently needed, but the cost of establishing a home like that of the Wetmore is $25,000, while the same amount would secure a better place in the country. If worked in connection with the city homes it would be a valuable agency in the work of reform. The suggestion is excellent, and deserves cordial acceptance.

The Millionaire Tramp's Estate has been Depleted by his habit of hoarding. He died, it will be remembered, on December 23d last year in New York, in a dingy lodging-house in Bleeker Street. For some time after his death neither a will nor any property could be discovered, but ultimately an old trunk full of valuable securities was found, and in it was the will. Among the securities was a certificate of deposit for $40,000 and a package of bank-notes worth $12,500 which the miser received from a State bank twenty-five years ago. His executor presented both to the bank last week for redemption. The bank paid the $40,000 on deposit, but refused to pay the bills on the ground that it became a national bank in 1863, and that its liabilities as a State bank could be collected only within six years of that change. The old man had kept the bills until they were worthless. He would have grieved bitterly had he known the fact in his lifetime. Now, when the discovery is made, he is in a position in which, even if he could know of it, a money loss would seem unimportant to him. He knows now, as he did not know in his lifetime, what constitutes true wealth (Luke 12 : 15).

A Suit to Compel a Marriage was Dismissed by Judge Lawrence on March 23d in New York. A young lady of marriageable age was brought on that day into the Supreme Court Chambers by her father in compliance with a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was sued out by a young man, who claimed that the girl had promised to marry him. She had not fulfilled her promise, and the lover suspected that her failure to do so was caused by her parents, who, he believed, kept their daughter a prisoner in their house. He therefore obtained the writ. To the lover's surprise the young lady stated in court that she remained at home voluntarily, and did not intend to marry him. The complaint against the parents being proved unfounded, the lover prayed the court to enforce the fulfilment of the girl's promise. Judge Lawrence looked up in some surprise, and said that the request showed that the young man had made a mistake as to the court's power. "I cannot," he said, "ask a young woman to accept a young man. That is the lover's part." The suit was accordingly dismissed. The courts leave the young lady free to accept or reject her suitor, though possibly, if appealed to, they might compel her to pay damages for breach of promise. Whether men have the same freedom of acceptance or rejection in spiritual matters has been a fruitful subject of debate by learned theologians, but with barren result. Practically every man is conscious that he may reject the salvation of Christ if he will, and God will hold him responsible for what he does in regard to it (John 5 : 40).

The Fall of a Thunderbolt at Corning, N. Y., on March 20th, caused great damage and imperilled several lives. The thunderstorm was at its height just before dawn. A report which startled the whole village was accompanied by a bolt which fell on the house of a farmer. It demolished the chimney and passed through the roof to a bedroom occupied by two of the farmer's daughters. The fluid followed one of the bed-posts to the floor and scattered the bed and its occupants about the room. From that apartment it descended to a room where the farmer and his wife were in bed. The current seemed to have spread all over the floor, for the carpet was set on fire in several places. At that point it left the house, striking a wire clothes-line in the yard. It followed the line across the yard to a post, which it splintered to pieces, and then spent itself in the ground. Several of the villagers were aroused by the shock, and looking out saw the light of the burning carpets in the farmer's house. The fire-bells were rung, and villagers hurried to the spot in time to prevent the flames making headway in the house. Every inmate of the house was found unconscious. One of them remained so for two days, and is thought to have been permanently injured. The plaster was torn from the laths in the rooms entered by the lightning as completely as if it had been removed by workmen with tools. The fact that we no longer regard thunder as the voice of God, but have accepted the scientific explanation of it, does not rob it of its terrors. God controls it still, and will use it with terrible effect in the last crises of the world's history (Rev. 16 : 18).

A New and Ingenious Instrument Called the hyalophotype was patented the other day. Its chief feature is a hot pen, with which drawings can be made on glass or glassy substances with a waxy composition, which is solid and somewhat hard at ordinary temperatures. The pen is so contrived that it can be heated either by gas or by an electric current, and the waxy material flows easily from it, setting quickly on the glass. When the writing or drawing is finished the plate is etched with fluorid acid, and it is then ready for use. Every stroke of the pen, which left its tracing in soft wax, stands out clear and firm in hard glass. The plate may be used on the printing-press, or an electrotpe may be taken of it. Young men should remember that every day they are engaged in a similar kind of writing. At the close of life, looking back over the record they have made, the entries are firm and indelible, though at the time they were made they might have seemed to be easy of obliteration (Matt. 12 : 36).

A Buzzard's Mistake about a Drunken Man is described in the Youth's Companion. It states that a man in a state of intoxication was sleeping heavily in a fence-corner, when a buzzard in search of food caught sight of him and alighted to take an observation. The man lay motionless, and the bird drew nearer. At length, apparently satisfied that the man was dead, and consequently his lawful prey, the buzzard took a vigorous peck at the drunkard's nose. The man was roused instantly, and putting his hand to his bleeding nose, he looked around for his assailant. The bird was only a short distance away, and the drunkard readily understood the situation. "Look here, you buzzard," he said, "you're a mite too previous, don' cher know? I objec' to be eat up shust now. I hain't dead." The indignation of the man can be understood, but when he declared that he was not dead he failed to realize a spiritual fact. He and others who are living in sin and self-indulgence cannot be said to be really alive. All in them that raises them above the level of the beast is dead (1 Tim. 5 : 6).

Boston Society has been Shocked During the past few weeks by disclosures of private affairs which have been published in the papers. The Beacon says that several engagements were announced through the press before they had been mentioned to society. Then hints of scandals and family quarrels appeared in the same manner. Most annoying of all was the betrayal of a money transaction between two ladies, where one, failing to redeem her promise, delivered a diamond star into the other's keeping. Other family and social secrets were laid bare in the same unreserved manner, and as they affected the most exclusive circles of "the modern Athens" there was considerable perturbation and distress there, and a corresponding exultation among outsiders. It has now been discovered that a lady, whose artless, affectionate manner won the confidence of her acquaintances, has been writing a column of gossip for the press for a liberal remuneration. She is to be punished with social ostracism. Few people will pity her, for there is general contempt for the business she has been engaged in. Nevertheless, every one who does things secretly which they would be ashamed to have known should remember that a day is certainly coming when the secrets of all hearts will be revealed (Eccles. 12 : 14).

THE BLOOD OF SPRINKLING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

(Sequel to that published last week.)

"Ye are come . . . to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh."—HEB. 12: 24, 25.

Two Practical Questions—The Situation with Reference to the Blood—I. Where are We?—Come to the Hearing of the Gospel—To New Methods of Dealing—The Blood Shed and Sprinkled—Privileges to be Enjoyed—A Legend of a Hebrew Child—II. The Inference—The Blood Refused—By Indifference—By Prejudice or Misapprehension—The Freedom of Choice—The Implied Acceptance.

THIS morning, in preaching upon this passage, the text grew upon me so largely that it was quite impossible to express all its meaning. In as condensed a manner as possible I explained what was meant by "the blood of sprinkling," and I also enlarged upon the high position which this precious blood occupies in the Gospel dispensation; but I was obliged to leave for this second occasion two practical questions which the text is sure to raise if it be carefully thought upon.

Having touched, as with a swallow's wing, the surface of our great theme, I have now to speak with you upon the practical question involved, which is this: Where are we with reference to this blood of sprinkling? The text says, "Ye are come." We are not come to Mount Sinai, but we are come to Mount Zion; to angels and their God; to saints and their Mediator, and to the blood of sprinkling. This having had its share of our thoughts, we are to conclude with the question, What then? If we have come to this blood of sprinkling, what then? The answer is, "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh." Let us give to the wondrous truths revealed to us by the sacrifice of Jesus the most earnest heed, that our souls may hear and live.

I. My business under this head of my discourse is to answer the question,

WHERE ARE WE?

I have to explain what is meant by the expression which is found in the twenty-second verse of the chapter, "Ye are come." Link the twenty-second verse with this twenty-fourth, and read, "Ye are come to the blood of sprinkling."

Well, first, ye are come to the hearing of the Gospel of the atoning sacrifice. The Israelites left Egypt, and, having passed the Red Sea, they entered the desert, and at length came to the mount of God, even to Sinai, that terrible mountain. In the valley around that throne of God they were gathered together in their thousands. Israel crouched in the valley below, subdued by the terrible majesty of the scene, and overawed by the trumpet voice which pealed forth from the midst of the thick darkness. The Lord spake with them, but their uncircumcised ears could not bear His glorious voice, and they entreated that Moses might act as mediator, and speak in God's stead.

You and I have not come to such a terrible sight at this hour. Count yourselves happy that you are privileged to hear of the divinely appointed way of reconciliation with God. You are come to hear, not of your sin and its doom, not of the last judgment and the swift destruction of the enemies of God, but of love to the guilty, pity for the miserable, mercy for the wicked, compassion for those who are out of the way. You are come to hear of God's great expedient of wisdom, by which He, by the same act and deed, condemns sin, and lets the sinner live; honors his law, and yet passes by transgression, iniquity, and sin.

SELF-CONDEMNED.

In a better sense, going a little further, we have not only come to the blood of sprinkling by hearing about it, but we have come to it because the great God now deals with us upon methods which are founded and grounded upon the atoning sacrifice of Christ. If God were to deal with us upon the terms laid down at Sinai, He need not be long in finding the "two or three witnesses" to prove that we have broken His law. We should be ourselves compelled to plead guilty; no witnesses would be required. Truly, He hath not dealt with us after our sins. We are so faulty that we can draw no comfort from the prospect of judgment by law; we appeal to mercy alone; for on any other ground our case is hopeless. "This do, and thou shalt live" is a covenant which brings us no ray of comfort; for its only word to us is that thunderbolt—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Yet the Lord does not, under the Gospel dispensation, deal with us according to law. He does not now sit on the throne of judgment, but He looks down upon us from the throne of grace. Not the iron rod, but the silver sceptre, is held over us. The long-suffering of God rules the age, and Jesus the Mediator is the gracious

LORD-LIEUTENANT OF THE DISPENSATION.

Through our Lord Jesus sovereign grace and infinite love find a free way to the most underserving of the race. Through the divine sacrifice the Lord saith, "Come now and let us reason together: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow;" "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Thus the rebel is treated as a child, and the criminal as a beloved one. Because of yonder death on Calvary's cruel tree, God can invite guilty men to come to Him, and He can receive them to the bosom of His love. Oh, my dear hearers, do remember this! By virtue of the blood of sprinkling the language of boundless love is heard among our apostate race, and we are entreated to acquaint ourselves with God, and be at peace.

HOW IT IS SPRINKLED.

Further, there is a far more effectual way of coming to the blood of sprinkling than this—when by faith that blood is sprinkled upon our souls. This is absolutely needed; the blood shed must become to each one of us the blood sprinkled. "How can I know," says one, "that the blood of Christ is upon me?" Dost thou trust thyself with Christ? Dost thou believe that He made an atonement on the cross; and wilt thou venture thy eternal destiny upon that fact, trusting in what Jesus did, and in that alone? If thou dost thus trust, thou shalt not trust in vain. Dost thou apply thy heart to the precious blood of Jesus? Then that precious blood is applied to thy heart.

The act of faith, whereby we accept and trust in the Lord Jesus as our Mediator and Sacrifice, is the true and effectual coming to the blood of sprinkling. May none of us forget thus to come! He is the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world, and those who come to Him shall be led into full salvation. Have you thus come? If you have not, why do you delay? He saith: "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." Come to Him, for He is calling you; come to Him, even as you now are, and He will receive you without fail.

ITS EFFECTS.

Further, to come to this blood of sprinkling means thankfully to enjoy all that comes to us through the blood of sprinkling. I have intruded upon this somewhat already. Brothers and sisters, if you have come to the blood of sprinkling, believe in the full pardon which God has given you, and in your consequent peace with God. It is a blessed word in the Creed, "I believe in the forgiveness of sins." Do you believe in the forgiveness of sins? I have seen some of the children of God who have believed in Jesus, but it has been with a faith which did not realize the full blessing promised to it; for they were as troubled about their sins as if they had never been forgiven.

I want every child of God in his inmost soul to come to the blood of sprinkling by full assurance of his justification, and then to go on to enjoy constant access to the mercy-seat, and communion with the Lord God. We may now with holy boldness speak with God in prayer, for the mercy-seat is sprinkled with the blood. Oh, pardoned one, be not backward to enjoy thy liberty of fellowship! Thou art clean through the blood, and therefore thou mayest enter into the closest communion with the divine Father; thou art consecrated by the blood, and therefore thou mayest abound in the service of thy God. Treat thy God as a child should treat a father, and be not so awed by His majesty as to be cast down and distressed because of past sin, seeing it is pardoned. Take the good that God provides thee; enjoy the peace the blood has bought thee; enter into the liberty that thy ransom price has insured thee.

IN THE LIFE.

I think, once more, that this coming to the blood of sprinkling means also that we feel the full effect of it in our lives. The man who knows that Jesus shed His blood for him, and has had that blood applied to his conscience, becomes a sin-hating man, consecrated to Him who has cleansed him. I believe that there is no fruitful source of virtue like faith in the precious blood of Jesus. I hope your conduct will always support me in this assertion. Those who are debtors for salvation to their dying Lord should be the most holy of men. You people who think that you will get to heaven by some other way than by "the blood of sprinkling" have no sure bonds to hold you to holiness. You trust partly to your own works, and partly to what Jesus has done. Well, you do not owe Him much, and therefore you will not love Him much, and therefore you will not feel bound to live strict, holy, gracious lives. But the man who knows that his many sins are all washed away through the blood of Jesus, and that thus he is saved, he is the man who will serve the Lord with all his heart.

Are there not Christians who hold the doctrine of the atoning blood, and yet are no better than others? Alas! it is so. But it is one thing to hold a doctrine, and another thing for that doctrine to take hold upon your heart and influence your life. Oh, if we believed practically what we believe professionally, what manner of persons should we be in all holy conversation and godliness! Hear me, my brother, and answer the appeals I make to thee as in the presence of the Lord. Blood-bought; canst thou live for thyself? Blood-washed; canst thou defile thy garments? Marked with the King's own name, in the King's own blood; how canst thou yield thyself to other rulers? God grant that we may come unto the blood of sprinkling till it shall purify our nature, and fill us with an all-consuming enthusiasm for Him whose heart was pierced for us!

A HEBREW LEGEND.

I ask you, then, to put the question closely home, "Have I come unto this blood of sprinkling? If not, why should I not come at once?" I read the other day an imaginary story, which describes the need of looking well to this great business. Receive it as a parable: A little daughter of the house of Israel had heard the commandment concerning the Passover night, and as she lay ill in her bed she cried: "Father, have you sprinkled the blood upon the lintel and the two side-posts?" Her father answered: "Not yet, my child. It shall be done." The daughter was distressed, and filled with fear. After waiting a little while she again cried: "Father, father, have you sprinkled the blood upon the door?" The father passed over her inquiry; he had been eating of the lamb with his friends, and thought that this was sufficient; he did not care to give too much prominence to the ghastly idea of blood. He was of a liberal mind, and would not believe that a merciful God would smite his household for so small an omission.

Then his daughter arose from her bed, made strong by the God of Israel. Nothing would content her until she had been outside into the street, and seen for herself whether the saving mark was over the door of her father's house. It was almost midnight, but by the light of the moon she looked, and no blood-mark was there! How great was her distress! "Father," she cried, "make haste and bring the basin." There it stood, filled with blood; for the Paschal Lamb had been slain. The father, at her entreaty, dashed the hyssop into it, struck the lintel and the two side-posts and shut the door, and as he did so the midnight hour arrived. They were saved so as by fire. The daughter's obedient care and reverence of the Lord had warded off the sword of the destroyer. Oh, that the holy anxiety of some one now present would work the like blessing for other households!

II. The last part of our subject is this:

WHAT THEN?

According to our text, the blood of Jesus is the voice of the new dispensation. It is the blood which speaks, and it speaks better things than the blood of Abel. What, then, is our duty? How doth the apostle express our obligation? "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh."

I would have a quarter of an hour's very quiet talk with you, without excitement or quibbling debate. Lend me your ears, for I speak in all love for your souls. I want, dear friends, that this great truth of atonement which I so often preach may have a fair hearing, and not be left to lie among the lumber of forgotten things.

Do not refuse the voice of Jesus by cold indifference. God was made flesh, and dwelt among men, and in due time He took upon Himself our sin, and suffered for it in His own body on the tree, that sin might be put away by the sacrifice of Himself. By His death upon the cross our Lord made atonement for the sin of man, and those who believe in Him are delivered from evil and its consequences. The main point is that Jesus died for us, the just for the unjust. His atoning blood has a voice: "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh." The text says: See to it; look to it; make sure of it; be careful about it. Do not miss the salvation of your Lord through neglect; for he who dies by neglecting the healing medicine will as surely perish as he who stabs himself. Be in earnest to accept the Saviour; I beseech you so to do, for I am afraid that many refuse Him that speaketh, because they never think of Him or of His sacrifice.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF IT.

When you resolve to study the doctrine, do not approach it with prejudice through misapprehension. Those that hate the Gospel of Christ are very busy in caricaturing the doctrine of the atonement. They assert that we preach that God was not merciful by nature, but must needs be appeased by the blood of His own Son. They charge us with saying that Jesus by His death made God loving. We distinctly teach the very opposite of that statement. What we do say is this, that God is infinitely loving—that, in fact, God is love; but that love does not cause Him to be unjust or unholy; for that in the long run would not be love. God is the Judge of all the earth, and He must do right.

The Lord, as the great moral governor, if He makes a law, and threatens a penalty, must execute that penalty, or else His law will lose its authority. If the penalty threatened be not executed, there is a tacit acknowledgment that it was threatened in error. Could you believe in a fallible God? The Lord has made a law which is perfect, and just, and good. Would you rather be without law? What reasonable person desires anarchy? He has backed up that law with a threatening. What is the use of a law if to break it involves no evil consequences? A government that never punishes offenders is no government at all. God, therefore, as moral ruler, must be just, and must display His indignation against wrong and evil of every kind. It is written on the conscience of men that sin must be punished. Would you have it go unpunished? If you are a just man, you would not.

To meet the case, therefore, the Lord Jesus Christ, by Himself bearing the penalty of death, has honored the divine law. He has shown to all intelligences that God will not wink at sin, that even His infinite mercy must not come in the way of His justice. This is the doctrine; do not listen to those who twist and pervert it.

We do assure you from God's Word that apart from the atonement of our Lord Jesus you can never be saved either from the guilt or power of evil. You will find no peace for your conscience that is worth having, no thorough and deep peace, except by believing in this atoning sacrifice; neither will you meet with a motive strong enough to rescue you from the bonds of iniquity. Therefore, "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh." Hear, and your soul shall live. Caviel, and you will die in your sins.

THE ONLY WAY.

I cannot help it if you do not like this teaching, although I shall be grieved if you refuse it. I can only tell you the truth, and leave it with your own hearts. Do not wilfully refuse it. When I meet you face to face in that last day, to which we all must come, I shall not be clear of your blood unless I tell you what is assuredly the truth—that in the precious blood of Christ is the only cleansing from sin, and the only acceptance with God. By believing in Jesus, as slain for you, you shall be saved; but do what you may, pray as you may, fast as you may, give alms as you may, you shall not enter heaven by any other road. Look not to any other, for no other is needed, no other is provided, no other can be accepted. Jesus is the sole messenger of the covenant of life and peace. "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh."

"See that ye refuse not." Then there is a choice about it. If you had never heard the Gospel, you could not have refused it; but now that you have heard the message, it lies within your power, and it is an awfully dangerous power, to refuse Him that speaketh. Oh, can you, will you, dare you refuse my bleeding Saviour—refuse the Lord of love? I see Him now. The thorn-crown is about His brow. He is hanging on His cross expiring in unutterable pangs! Can you refuse Him while He presents such a spectacle of sacrifice? His eyes are red with weeping; have you no tears for such sorrow? His cheeks are all distained with the brutal soldiers' spittal; have you no love and homage for Him? His hands are fastened to the wood—His feet the same; and there He hangs to suffer in the sinner's stead. Will you not yield yourselves to Him? I could joyfully bow before that cross-foot to kiss His dear feet distained with blood. What a charm He has for me! And you—do you refuse Him?

A GENTLE VOICE.

When the text says, "See that ye refuse not," it tacitly and pleadingly says, "See that ye accept Him." Dear hearers, I trust you will receive my Lord into your hearts. When we read of refusing, or receiving, we perceive an action of the will. Jesus must be willingly received; He will not force Himself upon any man. Whosoever accepts Jesus is Himself accepted of Jesus. Never was there a heart willing to receive Him to whom Jesus denied Himself. Never! But you must be willing and obedient. Grace works this in you; but in you this must be.

I do not wonder that the Israelites asked that they might no longer hear the voice of thunder from the top of Sinai; it was too terrible for human ear; but you have no such excuse if you refuse Him that speaketh; for Jesus speaks in notes more sweet than music, more tender than a mother's sonnet to her babe. Let me remind you, that He was wont to say: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." He declared that all manner of sin and of blasphemy should be forgiven unto men. He stood and cried, on the last day of the feast: "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." I am telling you no fables; for Christ, who was born at Bethlehem and died on Calvary, by His own blood which He shed for many, assures you that there is forgiveness for every man of you who, confessing his sin, will come and put his trust in Him.

Thus the blood speaks. Will you not answer, "Lord, we come to Thee, for Thou hast drawn us. Thy wounds have wounded our hearts. Thy death has killed our enmity. Sprinkle us unto Thyself. Bedew us with Thy blood. Let us be accepted in the Beloved"? Amen. So God may hear us!

NEW BOOKS.

THE DELIVERANCE OF A HUGUENOT

from the massacre of St. Bartholomew is vividly described in an interesting work compiled by F. Bernard, and translated from the French by Richard Whiteing. It is entitled "Wonderful Escapes," and contains many records of preservation in time of peril, collected from the histories of many countries. Not the least remarkable, as showing how in the very jaws of death God is able to rescue those who trust in Him and preserve them for His service, is the narrative of the escape of Caumont De La Force on that dread night when the blood of the Christians dyed the streets of Paris. Monsieur De La Force and his two sons lived in the Rue de la Seine, and were too well known for their love of the Bible and the Protestant religion to escape the notice of the murderers. Their house was surrounded, and the three men brought out. They would have been slain on the spot, but the old man offered a large ransom. The ransom was seized, and the three were removed to what the executioners said was a place of safety. Other soldiers speedily found them there, and took them to the place of slaughter. There they were set upon by the butchers. The eldest son fell first, pierced by stabs. The father was also struck from behind with a knife, and fell across the body of his son. The blood of the two spurted over the younger son, who felt sick and faint. He fell senseless beside his father and brother, and in the confusion the crowd, seeing his body covered with blood, supposed that he, too, was killed, and left him unhurt. On recovering consciousness, young De La Force lay still, as the murderers were in sight. Presently some robbers came to rob the dead, and one of them, turning him over, saw he was alive. While bending over him the robber asked him if he could be ransomed. The young man said he could, and the robber succeeded in getting him away, and after some days sent him out of Paris to his uncle, who paid the promised ransom. Young Caumont De La Force, now the only survivor of his family, lived to maintain the Huguenot traditions of his house. Another thrilling incident from French history is the escape of Blanche Gamond, a devoted Protestant, at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The book contains in all forty-four of these records, all of them veracious. Pp. 308; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE PENTATEUCHAL CODES.

The opponents of the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible have in our day concentrated their attacks on the first five books it contains. They contend that not only were they not written by Moses, but that they were not written until centuries after he was dead, and that they are a mere collection of legends compiled and edited by Ezra or some writer contemporary with him. Science and scholarship have been pressed into service in the campaign, and so craftily has it been planned that the believer finds his most effective weapons wrested from his hand, and his most conclusive arguments inoperative. A singularly able work has, however, been prepared by Geerhardus Vos, a Fellow of Princeton College, who meets the assailants on their own ground. The title of his book is "The Mosaic Origin of the Pentateuchal Codes." In it he undertakes to show from internal evidence that the Mosaic legislation is a unit, and bears the impress of the Mosaic age. This, too, while rigorously excluding every testimony to which the assailants demur. The value of his argument is far-reaching because his conclusion involves the corollary that the codes were a revelation from God and not the result of development. His reasoning is cogent and ingenious. Every young man whose faith has been disturbed ought to read this book. He will see from it that, without employing the highest arguments at his disposal, the believer is able to defend his position against the assaults of the foe. Pages 263; price, $1.50. Published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York.

EPOCHS OF HISTORY.

The two small volumes of this well-known series now issued deal respectively with epochs of ancient and modern history. One of them, by Charles Sankey, M.A., who is joint editor with the Rev. G. W. Cox of the Ancient History series, deals with the epoch of the Spartan and Theban supremacies. It covers one of the most important periods in the history of Greece. The other, by Professor Edward E. Morris, deals with the period between 1713 and 1749, and is mainly concerned with events in England. It is entitled the Early Hanoverians, and belongs to the Modern History section of the series. In both cases, however, the principle of dealing "horizontally" as to time, rather than vertically as to place, which characterizes this work, has been followed.

As we all acknowledge, historical knowledge is necessary to every intelligent man, and as no child's education is complete without it, too much care cannot be given to the character of the historian whose version of events is studied. Hume and Gibbon have done more than we realize to sow bad seed in youthful minds. It is therefore eminently gratifying to find that so excellent a work as this has been produced by Christian men. The sketch in the one volume of Socrates and his disciples, and in the other of Wesley, Whitefield, and Bishop Butler, breathe a true Christian spirit. The student sees in Socrates the highest point which heathen philosophy could reach and in the Wesleys and their contemporaries how the earnestness of consecrated men inspired and revolutionized the religious life of their day. The Ancient History section comprises eleven volumes, and the Modern History sixteen. Each volume complete in itself and sold separately. Pp. 230; price, $1 each volume. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

SECHELE'S STATE VISIT.

SECHELE is a chief of the Bechuanas, the South African tribe among whom the renowned missionary, Dr. Robert Moffat, labored with success. His government, like that of the other chiefs, is of the nature of a limited monarchy, the extent of the limitations depending on the character of the chief, and the power and independence of the warriors. When any important question arises a council is summoned, and free speech allowed. In some cases it is a mere form, the chief's wishes being made known, the warriors find it to their interest to agree with him; but in others a few warriors holding together are able to counteract the chief's influence.

The great dread of the Bechuanas, and the chief source of their troubles, is the attitude of their neighbors, the Boers, who are continually encroaching on lands claimed by the Bechuanas. In 1884 they appealed to the British Governor of the Cape for assistance to defend themselves against the Boers, and the British sent Sir Charles Warren out as a special commissioner to investigate. It was soon after Warren's arrival that Sechele went to call upon him and lay before him the list of grievances of himself and his people.

An eye-witness describes the curious appearance of the Bechuana chief and his suite. Sechele, impressed with the importance of the occasion, and desiring to make a good impression on the British official, had drawn lavishly upon the resources of his wardrobe. The old man would have looked noble and picturesque in his native dress, but he only succeeded in making himself ridiculous by appearing in European garb. He wore a white plug hat, in the top of which he had inserted a feather. The suit of clothes, which must have been procured with difficulty, was made of cloth with an immense check upon it, red, black, and green on a gray ground. Altogether, the old chief did not fail in his effort to make an impression by his attire, though it was not admired so much by his hosts as by his own subjects.

THE WANDERER'S RETURN.

"How long have you been at sea?" asked a Christian lady, a passenger on a transatlantic steamer, of a young sailor whom she had noticed very smart and active in his duties, and with more intelligence than most of his class.

"About seven years, Madam. I am twenty-two now; I started on my first trip when I was fifteen."

"Then you have had plenty of experience of life afloat. Do you like it?"

"Pretty well, Madam. I am used to it now; it was pretty rough at first."

"Why did you take to it?"

"Well, you see, I was a bit wild. I wanted to see the world and be my own master. My father wanted me to be a carpenter like himself, and he used to make me go to church and Sunday-school regular, and I fretted at it. I was the only son, and I thought life was a bit dull at home with the old folks and my sister. I used to slip out and have some fun at night with the village boys, and when I came home I had a scolding and a spanking now and then. I thought it would be a grand thing to be my own master, so I ran away. I went to New York and got a place as cabin-boy first. I got on till now I am an 'able seaman,' and I'll be third mate next voyage."

"And have you succeeded in being your own master?"

"Well, no," said the young man, laughing. "I've had to obey orders all the time, or I should have fared worse than with my father."

"When you are ashore are you your own master?"

"Oh, I do as I like when I'm ashore, only I have to be back on time."

"What do you generally do ashore?"

"Well, I'm rather ashamed to say. You see, a man's cooped up, so to speak, on board ship and kept close to his work. When he gets ashore with some money in his pocket he feels like having a good time."

"Drinking and singing and dancing, I suppose?"

"Yes, Madam, and sometimes pretty bad capers. When we go to sea again I make up my mind I'll do different next time, but I don't. As sure as I go ashore I get drunk, and get rid of the money, and I am sorry to say I've been locked up two or three times for making a disturbance. 'Drunk and disorderly,' they called it. I was regularly ashamed of myself."

"And you did not want to act that way when you left the ship?"

"Oh, no, Madam; I just meant to go around a bit and have some pleasure."

"Then I may take it you are not your own master ashore either, or you would not do things you don't want to do."

"Well, I suppose not; but I'm free to do what I like."

"Did it ever strike you that when you thought yourself free you were not free, but were just serving the devil?"

"No, I never thought so; but now you speak of it, I guess I do serve him."

"Of course you do. You voluntarily serve him, and he is a bad master, too. You know his wages. You have had some of them already, by your own account. What do you think the end will be?"

"I sometimes think of that, Madam, but never at the right time. I know I am not living right. My father and mother taught me enough to know that. I must turn over a new leaf some time."

"Do you think you can? It will be a dreadful thing if you don't; but you say you always resolve and break your resolution afterward. It looks as if you had not strength enough."

"That's so, Madam; you've just hit it. I haven't strength. I'm as weak as a child when I'm tempted."

"Then what you want to find out is how to get strength to enable you to turn over the new leaf when you decide to do it. Well, you can have the strength; I know how to get it."

"Do you, Madam? How do you mean?"

"When do you mean to try? Life is uncertain. I hope you won't put it off too long. Why not do it right away? The longer you put it off the harder it will be, and perhaps death might come before it is done."

The sailor was called away at this point of the conversation to attend to his duties, and the lady went to her cabin to pray for him. She had not shown much earnestness during the conversation, but her heart had been drawn out toward the young man, and she yearned for his salvation. She feared to press the matter too urgently lest she should repel instead of attracting him to Christ. But alone in her cabin she pleaded with God for this one soul.

All unknown to her, other prayers were at that moment being offered for the same blessing. In a small, poor home in Maine the father, mother and sister of the young sailor were praying, as they had done daily for seven years past, that God would save him. No word in all that time had come from him, but they believed in prayer, and they prayed on. "God will surely hear us," said the old man frequently. "In His own good time He will stretch out His hand and rescue him. I shall meet my boy in heaven if I never see him again on earth."

Time passed, and never a day went by without the sailor's case being presented, in that little home, at the throne of grace. The family were about to retire to rest one night when they heard the outer door opened. Who could be coming in at that time? Some one who knew the way evidently, for the steps came straight to the door of the room in which they always sat. The door was opened, and in rushed the sailor with extended arms. Mother and sister sprang to their feet to welcome the wanderer, but the father fell on his knee with the prayer of aged Simeon on his lips.

It was a glad night in that household. The sailor told how the lady's words had sunk into his heart, and how he had sought her out again and again, and how she had told him of the Saviour's compassion, of His almighty power to help the weak, and how he had been led to trust in Him. He had come straight from his ship without staying in New York, anxious not to lose an hour in bringing them the good news. Together the reunited family offered thanks to God, and rejoiced over one that had been lost and was found.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Wreck.

SUCH a calm, clear, beautiful night it was, with the crescent moon shining on high, and the blue vault studded with stars. Maria was leaning over the bulwark, watching with admiration the little globes of light which glimmered close to the keel.

"Why, we are surrounded with lumps of ice of all sizes and shapes!" cried Juliet. "I did not see one of them at sunset, and now there are hundreds—perhaps thousands," she added, as her eyes wandered through the semi-darkness.

"Yes, we're among the drift ice," observed the second officer, who was watching with some interest the shattered fragments, perhaps, of some broken iceberg.

"How very, very slowly the steamer is going!" observed Juliet; "one hardly feels the motion at all."

"We have been slackening speed very considerably," said the officer.

"You don't think there's danger?" almost gasped Mrs. Daly, the lady who had quitted the crochet. She was of a nervous disposition.

"Danger! no!" was the offhand reply; and the officer turned on his heel and walked quickly away, as if he did not care to be questioned by timorous old ladies.

"He may say there's no danger," observed a stout gentleman in a large, red comforter, who had an oracular manner of delivering his opinion; "for my part, I don't half like the look of affairs." He was addressing the nervous dame, but had other attentive listeners. "You see, our steamer is laden with iron—a very dangerous cargo, very. We've a thousand tons in the fore, a thousand in the aft of the ship. If one of these fragments of ice should knock a hole in the bottom of our vessel, why, down it would go like lead! I should know something about these matters, Mrs. Daly; this is my twentieth voyage."

"Oh dear! oh dear!

I must speak to the captain about it! Where is he?" cried Mrs. Daly, fussily; "I suppose in his cabin—he was not at dinner nor at tea!"

"No, the captain is up there on the lookout on the bridge; he's been there for hours."

"I hear that the captain kept the deck all last night," said Madame Lafitte. "I attempted to speak with him to-day—I merely asked him if it wouldn't be awkward if we came across a big berg in the darkness, and he gave no answer, but something like a growl, as if to say: 'I can't be bothered with your questions.'"

Maria Selden stood slightly apart from the group. Like Juliet, she was watching the multitudinous fragments of ice through which the Quebec was slowly making her way. Maria now raised her eyes to where the two boats hung suspended by ropes. She was calculating in her mind how many passengers they would contain, should any emergency happen. The emigrants in the steerage she knew to be numerous, and there were about twenty first-class passengers. Maria doubted whether a third of the Quebec's living freight could find a place in the boats.

"Why do you look at the boats, Miss Selden? you don't think there's the least danger?" said Juliet, a little anxiously, laying her hand on the arm of her companion.

"I am ignorant of sea matters," was the reply. "We seem to have a good and careful captain."

"You are not frightened, are you?" said Juliet.

"No, not frightened," was the quiet reply; but its tone did not quite satisfy the mind of the questioner. Juliet thought that to Maria the opening of the ebony door might not be the cause of such terror as it would be to herself. But Juliet was not naturally of a timid temperament, and the comparatively calm sea and the slow movement of the vessel were not as suggestive of alarm as the wild storm which, a few days before, the Quebec had gallantly weathered. Juliet even felt amused at the fussy movements of poor Mrs. Daly, who wandered from one passenger to another with the question, "Are you sure there's not the least danger?" When she came to Juliet herself, the young lady, with malicious playfulness, assumed as solemn a look as she could, and replied: "I suspect that there is." The lively girl rather enjoyed the excitement caused by the possibility, the bare possibility, that there might be a little collision with floating ice, just enough to test the valor of her companions and show off her own. It would be a new sensation, and something to tell of when she should return to England.

"I wonder whether if there were a collision Captain Fincham would drop his eye-glass and flash out into a hero," thought Juliet.

"Ha! what's that!" exclaimed Juliet, as a sudden shock was felt, accompanied by a crashing sound below, near where the huge screw was slowly revolving. The whole framework of the vessel seemed to shudder and tremble; Mrs. Daly shrieked aloud, and her cry was echoed by Madame Lafitte. The captain shouted out something to the helmsman (Juliet did not know the nautical term), then repeated the command at the top of his voice.

"She has struck!" cried the second officer. Juliet caught a glimpse of his face; it looked so white in the moonlight.

"Mercy on us!" cried Mrs. Daly; "what can have happened!"

There was a chorus of screams from the steerage. In almost less time than I can trace the words there came a rush of emigrants from below, men, women, and children, terror depicted in every face. There were confused cries of "The water! the water!—it's pouring in; we're lost—we're lost. Oh Lord! have pity upon us!"

A tremendous cloud of steam arose, with a terrible hissing sound, which told its own tale. The water from a huge leak was rushing into the engine-room, and was extinguishing the fire in the furnace!

"Let down the boats!" roared out the captain, springing down from the bridge, instead of making use of the steps which led down to the deck.

"What does it mean—what does it all mean?" cried Madame Lafitte.

"It means that the ship is going down—fast—don't you feel it?" exclaimed Captain Fincham. "The boats! the boats!" he added, rushing toward the place where the excited, shrieking throngs clustered around what they felt to be the last chance of safety.

For the ship was perceptibly lurching over! The sailors worked desperately to launch the boats, knocking aside with violence, rough words, and curses the passengers who in their terror closed around them and impeded their movements. The deck became more and more on a slope, as the weight of water on the side where the leak was overbalanced the other, till the rail on that side was almost on a level with the sea. Opposite it proved impossible to get the boat down; on the sunken side the sailors' frantic efforts met with better success.

Juliet could see nothing distinctly of what was going on round the boat, on account of the dense mass of human beings clustering like bees by the bulwarks, each pushing, elbowing, making violent attempts to get into the centre. She felt—all felt, the horrible sensation caused by the vessel beneath them descending nearer and nearer to the surface of the water. It would be but the work of a few minutes, and the rippling moonlit waves would roll over the deck of the ship Quebec.

Juliet had, like almost every one else, fled toward the place where the boat was being let down, but it was utterly impossible for her to force her way through the crowd. In vain she called out to Captain Fincham—he did not hear her; no one noticed her, helped her, thought of her; the instinct of self-preservation was strong, though husbands were seen clasping their wives, and mothers wildly holding aloft the children for whose safety they cared more than their own. All had been so sudden—so fearfully sudden! there seemed scarcely time even for prayer; though poor Ben the stoker's voice was heard calling on the Lord whom he had so lately found.

Juliet in despair rushed back to the spot where she had left the only being in that ship who really cared whether she died or lived. Maria was kneeling on the deck, a posture not assumed for devotion, though an inarticulate prayer was rising from her heart; her hands were engaged in rapidly lashing together with a rope three of the small perforated wooden frames commonly used in steamers to prevent the feet of passengers from resting on a wet deck.

"You are making a raft!" exclaimed Juliet.

"Help me—we've not a minute to lose," said Maria; but there was no agitation in her voice. The Christian, strengthened by faith, can be calm in imminent danger.

Eagerly, nervously Juliet helped to twist the cords in and out. It was well that the friends were engaged in such a labor, and were thus less fully alive to the horrors of the scene passing so near.

The boat had been safely lowered, and was now floating on the dark waters.

"Women in first!" shouted the captain; like a true sailor, resolved himself to be the last to quit the sinking vessel.

"Women in first!" echoed some of his gallant tars. "Back! back! give place to the women!" But they might as well have called to the waves to keep back! The crush of the crowd was tremendous; it overpowered all resistance. Such numbers, wild with fear, leaped into the boat from the ship whose deck was now terribly near to the surface of the sea, that the overlaid craft was almost instantly swamped! The terrible tale was told by shriller shrieks, more despairing cries; a minute afterward the water which was filling the vessel completed its fatal work. Down, down, hundreds of fathoms down sank the large Atlantic steamer, with its living freight, creating a momentary whirlpool, which sucked down in its vortex floating fragments of ice and struggling human beings.

Some sailors were clinging to the shrouds, but they too, but a few seconds later than the rest, were submerged in their briny grave! All were swept down—the worldly and the pious, Lazarus and Dives, the child and the bearded man! The last jest had been uttered, the last oath sworn by lips now silenced forever.

Juliet felt herself carried down in the whirl beneath the icy cold waves; but before she lost all consciousness she came up again to the surface, partly buoyed up by a piece of ice which happened to be beneath her. Gasping, half suffocated, she rose, and it would have been but to sink again, had not help been near. Juliet caught sight of a loving face, as of an angel's, bent toward her; she saw a white hand stretched out to aid. The two deadly cold dripping hands met in a close, tight grasp; Maria had clung to her little raft, and though borne down for a few seconds, the light wood had soon regained its natural place on the waves. Maria, with all the strength which she could muster, drew up her half-drowned friend to her side, but alas! not out of the water, for the double weight, she saw to her dismay, was more than the tiny raft could sustain.

Maria saw at once that to attempt to save two lives would be to sacrifice both. If the raft were not to sink, one of those clinging to it must perforce let go her hold. An awful choice was before her—life or death! One friend was ready, the other not. Ye ought to lay down your lives for the brethren flashed through the mind of the servant of Christ. Then came a thought of home, and loving ones there never again to be met on earth! Maria's cold fingers relaxed their hold on Juliet, and also on the sinking raft. A thick black cloud at that moment passed over the moon, and all was darkness!

Juliet felt that the raft was floating now, and with a violent effort she drew herself upon it. She doubted not that her friend was beside her, although she saw her no more, and felt nothing but the lap of the cold waters on the wet wood to which she clung. She was never again to see the angel-face of Maria; that loving, pitying look, which was never to pass from memory, was the last which Juliet was ever to see of her friend. Where was Maria? low under the pitiless waves? Oh, no! that sinking form is but the fair case that held the fairer jewel. The spirit is passing through the ebony gate to the radiance of the farther side; for her there is no more sea. There remains for the Christian, to use her own words on her last day in the world, only the unutterable glory, only the unspeakable joy!

It was well that the black cloud had shrouded the moon, that darkness hid from the gaze of the sole survivor among more than three hundred on whom the sun had set sights which might have haunted her spirit to her dying day. Juliet saw not "the strong swimmer in his agony," the struggling forms, and the ghastly faces of drowning men,

"When in an instant, with a bubbling groan, They sank into the deep, unknelt, uncoffined, and unknown."

When the moon first silvered the border of her sable veil, then burst forth in radiant brightness, to shine again so serenely on the murderous waves, nothing remained to denote that so many who not an hour before had been full of life and enjoyment had passed to their last account.

Juliet, as soon as moonlight returned, looked on every side for Maria. She saw nothing but water below, studded with the fatal floating ice; nothing but the deep-spangled sky above, with the cold, unfeeling moon. She gazed around in bewilderment and terror; not a trace could she see of her who had saved her; yes, one—only one; whether by accident or not, a gray plaid shawl had caught on one end of the raft—it was that which Maria had worn. Juliet snatched it up, dripping and heavy with sea-water, and pressed it first to her heart, then to her lips; then her wild wail of anguish sounded over the deep, a wail which there was none to hear!

Juliet's senses were so much bewildered by the shock which she had undergone, that it was only by degrees that she realized the full extent of her loss. Miss Selden had died in saving her! And why, and for what, was she saved? For a more terrible death by starvation and cold! Where were those who had flattered her, admired her, those with whom she had laughed so gaily? All gone—gone forever!

"And she with whom I was so angry, she from whom I turned so abruptly, she at whom I laughed with the mockers, she who warned and I would not listen—she has given her life for mine! She grasped my hand—'twas her last farewell; I did not, could not even ask forgiveness." Again there burst from the poor girl's lips that wail, the cry of an almost breaking heart.

A pitiable object would the fair girl have appeared, had there been one near to see her. Juliet's curly auburn hair had escaped from its velvet band, and fell in long dripping strands over the clotted fur of her seal-skin; her hat had fallen back from her head, but was kept by the soaked ribbons, though her crimson feather had floated away. The expression of Juliet's eyes was wild and despairing; in her ears, as if in terrible mockery, some merciless spirit seemed to repeat over and over the strain, "'Tis to-morrow!"—the refrain of the song which she had sung at the theatrical performance, and which had been so often on her lips during that day. To-morrow! what would it bring to the poor castaway? If she even survived the night to look again on the sun, what was before the unhappy girl? The lingering pangs of starvation! "No one," thought Juliet, "will ever know my fate, unless a corpse or a skeleton one day be discovered, and perhaps identified by the clothes on the shrunken form, the rings on the fleshless fingers!"

Of what might lie beyond death Juliet dared not think. Physical suffering perhaps deadened the sense of what might otherwise have been too terrible for reason to sustain. Juliet's drenched garments clung closely to her shivering form. The wind had risen a little, and, changing its course, blew from the warmer south; but though it was melting the ice, to Juliet it appeared to cut like the points of lancets. Oh, how she longed for the morning, which appeared as if it never would come! Even the moon deserted the castaway at last, and sank in a bank of clouds. Juliet could see nothing but a few faint stars; hope itself seemed frozen within her!

At length the sky assumed a paler hue; the stars died out; the wide expanse of sea gradually became more distinct to the straining eyes of Juliet. Morn was breaking at last, and hope—not quite dead—again revived.

THE FIRST DISCIPLES.

S. S. Lesson for April 11, John 1: 35-51. Golden Text, ver. 37. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

John the Baptist the First Disciple—His Preaching and Testimony—Two Disciples Transferred—Where Jesus Dwells—Andrew's First Concern—Simon's New Name—Philip Called—He Brings Nathanael—Local Prejudice—How to Overcome it—Christ's Greeting.

THE first disciple of Jesus was John the Baptist, His forerunner. A marvellous awakening had taken place under the preaching of this "man sent from God" by the banks of the Jordan, so that the whole country had turned out to go and hear the unusual preacher whose words had the effect of turning his complete audience into one grand inquiry meeting, each one saying, "What shall I do?" The priests and Levites sent by Jews (probably the rulers), who did not themselves go and benefit by the Baptist's teaching, asked him: "Who art thou? . . . What sayest thou of thyself?" John's mission was not to speak of himself, but of Another; he answered: "I am the voice of One crying in the wilderness; . . . but there standeth One among you whom ye know not." So completely nothing was John in his own eyes, that he saw himself as though only the voice of his Master. The very next day after bearing this testimony, the faithful servant was rewarded by seeing and knowing his Lord, and he whose cry had been until now, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," now cried aloud and proclaimed to others the new revelation with which God had visited him—which taketh away the sin of the world." Oh, the joy of John's heart when he said: "This is He of whom I spake, saying, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me!" Although his own ministry would decline and become nothing, yet what was that to John? The Lamb of God, He who actually takes away sin, was there, and his heart said: "No more John, no more self, but Jesus only." He testified: "And I knew Him not: but He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining upon Him, the same is He which baptiseth with the Holy Ghost. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God." Thus this first disciple of Jesus was occupied with Him, rejoiced in Him, testified of Him.

The very next day, in company with two of his own disciples, John saw Jesus as He walked, and saith: "Behold the Lamb of God!" Did he know what would follow? The two disciples heard him speak, and followed Jesus; they needed John no longer. He had led them through repentance for the remission of sins, to look for Jesus Himself; and now it was easy for them to leave John, for they had found Him who "taketh away the sin of the world." They had something more than the forgiveness of their sins, they had Himself who forgives. When we have been able to lead souls to accept Jesus Himself, our ministry to them is in the main accomplished. When a man has found Jesus, received Jesus, possesses Jesus as his Saviour, he has in Him redemption through His blood, even "the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. 1: 7). When a man possesses Jesus as his Sanctification, he finds in Him the holiness which he needs. Our one mission with others is to point them to Jesus, from sin to Jesus, from self to Jesus, from past, present, and future to Jesus.

John lost two disciples by pointing them to Jesus, but all he was and all he had was Christ's, so he was none the loser. At last these disciples had found One who could deal with sin, One who could really take it away from the conscience, the heart, the desires, the will; such a Saviour they wanted, and they followed Him. Jesus soon discovered it—He knows afar off a heart which follows Him—and He turned and said to them: "What seek ye?" The answer was: "Master, where dwellest Thou?" And He said: "Come and see."

WHERE DOES JESUS DWELL?

"Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones" (Isa. 57: 15). But He dwells also in the hearts of His own, "Strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith" (Eph. 3: 16, 17).

Jesus said to John's two disciples which followed Him, "Come and see," and they came and saw where He dwelt, and abode with Him that day. It was the beginning of a union which is forever. Jesus never repels, never keeps any at a distance except they be hypocrites. To all others He gives the warmest welcome—"Where I am there shall also My servant be" (John 12: 26). He longs to have us abide with Him, be at home with Him, have all in common with Him. What they learned of Jesus during that time they abode in the same house we know not, but no doubt remained in their minds that He was the Christ, and the one burden in their hearts was to make Him known to others. One of the two which heard Jesus speak and followed Him was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. "He first findeth Simon." First, before eating or drinking, before entering upon any other business, as the thing of primary importance to be done, he findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him: "We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ. And he brought him to Jesus." Oh, it is blessed when conversion work goes on in a family; when one brother brings another. We don't know how far Andrew had to go, whether Simon was at home or out among the fishing boats; any way, Andrew could not bear that an hour should be lost; the news he had to tell him was better than the largest catch of fish he had ever taken. Probably both these brothers had known John's teaching, had been baptized, confessing their sins; there had been a thorough turning to God, but no peace, no consciousness of freedom from their sins, no relief from the burden; but now Andrew had found the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world; now he believed that his sins were pardoned; the burden was gone, the old sense of condemnation was done away, and his heart was glad. The brothers had shared together their awakening and conviction; then how could Andrew rest for a moment with his glorious new joy unshared by Simon? He could not, and never rested until he had brought him to Jesus.

HIS OWN BROTHER

Reader, have you an unsaved brother? Have you told him, "I have found the Messiah"? Have you brought him to Jesus? Even if he is out of your reach, or perhaps will not listen to your words, have you by faith put his case into the hands of Jesus, and claimed to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ that this member of your house may be saved (Acts 16: 31)? Some go to one extreme, some to another. There are those who are so set upon the conversion of their friends that they set themselves to accomplish it by talking them into it, or praying them into it, and their real expectation is from their own earnestness, and not from God. Others go to the extreme of absolute indifference, and heartlessly say: "Well, if he is to be saved he will be." What is the Scriptural way? God plainly tells us, "He that gathereth not with Me scattereth" (Matt. 12: 30). There is no middle course. What, then, shall we do? God says: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and . . . thy house . . . shall be saved." Believe that when you pray you do receive the answer, and you shall have it (Mark 11: 24); and then be ready, if God wants you, to speak and lead your brother, or sister, or other relation or friend to Jesus, after you have fairly committed the matter to Him in restful, trustful faith.

No sooner did Jesus see Simon than He sur-named him Peter (a stone or rock). This was Peter's first introduction to Jesus; some months later the same two brethren were busy with their fishing, when Jesus passed by and said to them: and I will make you fishers of men." "And they straightway left their nets and followed Him" (Matt. 4: 18-20). From the first they were ready, and when the call came, without a fear as to how their families were to be maintained, knowing that the Lord Himself became responsible, they left all, and followed Him. There are some who attempt to enter upon a faith life of entire dependence upon God from imitation of others; but their faith does not hold out, and they come to a life of the worst kind of begging; the worst kind, because all the time they call begging by the name of faith.

Andrew and Peter did not keep to themselves the blessed knowledge of Jesus which had dawned upon them. Philip was of the same city, Bethsaida, from whence the two brethren came. It was the morrow after Peter's acquaintance with Jesus that He findeth Philip and saith unto him: "Follow me." There is little doubt that Andrew and Peter had been making known in Bethsaida the presence of the Messiah on earth, and so put Philip in the way of meeting with Him, and He had given Philip a distinct call to become a disciple. Philip, like the others, could not keep for himself the blessed tidings: Philip findeth Nathanael. If men are really converted this is the natural course of things—every one makes haste to bring another. John brought Andrew, Andrew Peter, Andrew and Peter Philip, and Philip Nathanael. If Holy Ghost work is done among our churches this same result will follow. Philip knew that Nathanael was a student of Scripture, and said to him, "We have found Him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." Nathanael said: "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip wisely did not argue the point, but said:

"COME AND SEE."

A good lesson for winners of souls. If it is the Holy Ghost who reveals Jesus, then argument cannot do it; it only fosters pride and is a sore temptation to lose calmness. Philip's "Come and see" is worth all the arguments in the world. Bring a soul into contact with Jesus, and all the arguments fall to pieces. How would such an intellectual doubter as Nathanael be convinced? Jesus was equal to the task: He beheld Nathanael coming to Him, and said: "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." Nathanael had not expected such a greeting. "Whence knowest Thou me?" he asked. "Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee." It was enough; the long-cherished desire of Nathanael's heart was gratified; it was the supreme moment of his life; and in the luxuriance of his joy and in the deep Scriptural intelligence of his faith he cried: "Rabbi" (my Master), "Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel." But Jesus led him far beyond his conceptions of what the reign of Christ should be: "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." Thus He spoke of His second coming.

THE DOOR.

"I am the door."—JOHN 10:9.

CHRIST is the door to every blessing,
Beyond him lies our heart's desire;
He is the only one possessing
The peace to which our souls aspire.
He is the door to pathways leading
By waters still, in meadows fair,
Where safe his happy flock are feeding,
All folded in his tender care.

He is the door, yet many, weary,
With bleeding feet and spirit sore,
Turn from the desert, lone and dreary,
And knock in vain upon the door.
And why, when we are oft reminded
To make an open door he died?
O, foolish hearts, by sinning blinded,
The bolts are all upon our side.

Not all the matchless love once given,
The crucifixion of God's Son,
Can open this only door to heaven,
Until our part required is done;
He is the door, his voice is calling,
The lock is fastened by our sin;
We yield our will—the bolts are falling;
O, open door, we enter in.

READ! READ!! READ!!!

DEMONOLOGY or SPIRITUALISM, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

By ELDER E. F. HANSON.

A History of Spiritualism from the early days of Man until the present time. A complete exposition of the POWER BEHIND the scenes.

Startling disclosures: Spiritualism unveiled.

Written by one whose parents were Spiritualists, and who was himself a Spiritualist and attended the Lectures and Seances until he was twenty-three years of age, and witnessed its phenomena in all its phases—from the tiny rap to spirit materialization—from slate-writing to a floating violin in mid-air played by invisible hands—and therefore writes from personal knowledge of the system.

The Church Advocate says: "The style of the book is quite entertaining, chiefly because of the evident sincerity of the author, the vigor of his sentiments, and direct manner in which he sets forth his views. The main thing is that the author should fairly represent Spiritualism, and then sustain his objections by valid logical arguments and well-authenticated evidence. We believe he has done this. We regard the book as one which will be of great service to those who come into conflict with these hurtful doctrines."

The Presbyterian Observer says: "The theory advanced and defended in this book is that the practice of Spiritualism, whether ancient or modern, is devil worship, and that Satan is the founder, inspirer and central force of the whole system. The number and character of the crimes that are shown in this book to be identified with Spiritualism form a most terrific indictment against it. All persons desiring to see the latest, and a most vigorous and forceful exposé of this ruinous delusion, will do well to send for Elder Hanson's book."

The CUNARD STEAMER OREGON, Wrecked off Fire Island, March 14th, 1886.

THE WRECK OF THE OREGON.

Excitement on Receipt of the News—Description of the Vessel—Reputation for Safety—Captain Cottier's Statement—The Passengers' Accounts—How the Collision Occurred—Saving the Passengers—The Chief Officer's Report—Many Singular Incidents—Instances of Fatal Collision.

ON Monday, March 15th, the public was startled by the news that "the greyhound of the Atlantic," the famous Cunard liner Oregon, had foundered off Fire Island. It was briefly stated that she was run into by an unknown schooner on the port side. With a great crash the schooner stove a hole eight feet in diameter in compartment number three, and the injured steamer began slowly to fill.

The excitement among shipowners and underwriters in America and in British seaports following the receipt of this intelligence was immense, especially as only a few hours previously news had been posted that two other fine steamers—the Saxon and the Corinth—had been lost; the former on a reef during a voyage from New York to Cape Haytien, involving the death of six persons; and the latter, which was a vessel of the Union Line, near Amoy. The Oregon was one of the finest steamers afloat. Built only three years ago by Messrs. John Elder & Co., of Glasgow, for the Guion Line, she was intended to be one of the "greyhounds" of the Atlantic. In every respect, except that of length of days, she fulfilled the expectations of her designers. Six days and ten hours was her usual time for covering the twenty-five hundred miles of ocean that roll between the cliffs of Ireland and the mouth of the Hudson.

A NOBLE SHIP.

The Oregon was in a sense a war ship as well. She was on the list of vessels which the British Government had at its disposal in an emergency that might be taken up for cruisers and armed transports, and during the Russian complications of last year she was temporarily held by the government. She went with the evolutionary squadron to the west of Ireland; and all who saw the fleet admired the vast size and graceful build of the noble vessel, which towered above the ungainly monsters that are the pride of the British Navy, and almost dwarfed the handsome but antiquated ironclad frigates which are now nearly as much out of date as gun-brigs and seventy-fours.

The Cunard owners and captains have a world-wide reputation for working their fleet with safety. It is their proud boast that during all the years in which they have been bridging the Atlantic by steam, they have never lost a passenger. This is mainly due to the excellent discipline maintained on all their vessels, and to their prudence in choosing a special route somewhat apart from the beaten highroad of ocean travelling. It cannot be overlooked, too, that the blessing of God has always been sought most earnestly and with faith in the great enterprise. The wife of Mr. Cunard, who started this line in 1840, made the safety of these ships a subject of earnest prayer, and not a vessel started on her voyage without united prayer by her husband and herself for the safety of ship and passengers. Regular religious services are always held on board every Sunday.

CAPTAIN COTTIER'S STATEMENT:

Captain Cottier, who was in command of the Oregon, has made the following statement:

"We had fine weather all the way across. The weather was clear at half past four o'clock on Sunday morning, with a fresh breeze from the west. A sailing vessel suddenly loomed up. When first noticed she showed no light, but when too close to clear us she showed a white light. The Oregon was running about eighteen miles an hour. The vessel struck us amidships, not far from the engines, and stove a big hole in our side. All the water-tight compartments were closed. The Oregon went down at about 12.45, having floated about eight hours after she was struck. She now lies in about twenty-two fathoms of water, north-half-west, west from Watch Hill, Long Island. The tops of her masts are alone visible above the waves, the vessel being upright. She went down head first.

"We worked from the moment of the collision as if we expected her to sink; but I did not believe she was going to sink. We took extreme precautions. The pumps were of no use. I might say that we worked them, of course, to their full capacity; but they had no chance against the mass of water which gradually carried her down. The usual watch was on deck at the time of the accident. No time was lost in awakening the passengers, few of whom heard or felt the shock. All were in bed at the time. Soon after the accident occurred a steamer passed us—a National Line boat, I think—but she went on. The vessel running into us must have sunk immediately; when we looked for her she was not in sight. She must have gone down with all on board. When I found that the vessel was sinking, I took the necessary steps to save the passengers. We first sent up rockets as signals of distress."

The captain adds: "There were no scenes on board the Oregon. I never expected to see such an affair go off so easily."

THE PASSENGERS' STORIES

somewhat modify the captain's statement. Doubtless the proceedings were orderly for a shipwreck, inasmuch as some few passengers even slept an hour after the collision; but the first moments of uncertainty are described as frightful. The decks were instantly thronged by the undressed people, who feared to return for their clothes. Very few saved even their hand-bags. All huddled together for warmth, the temperature being near the freezing-point. Fears lest the steamer should founder were the first emotion. Then next, terror came from the immense clouds of steam, caused by the flooding of the furnaces. The passengers and sailors had been up to this time under control, and the women the coolest of all; but the stokers and firemen, when driven from the furnaces, rushed for the boats, regardless of anybody else. The officers fought them with belaying pins; but some escaped into the boats, which they half filled. The number of boats, though fully up to the standard demanded by British and American law, was totally inadequate to meet the exigencies of such a disaster.

Captain Cottier was below at the time when the Oregon was struck, but

THE CHIEF OFFICER, MR. MATTHEWS, was on the bridge. The sea was comparatively smooth. The boats, of which there were ten, were manned and lowered. The pilot boat Phantom just then came along, and also the schooner Fannie Gorham, and the transfer of those on board the sinking vessel to them began, the ladies going first. The two vessels were almost swamped by the number, but providentially at this moment the large German steamer Fulda arrived at the scene of the disaster, and the six hundred and forty-one passengers and the crew of two hundred and five—a total of eight hundred and forty-six—were all taken on board the Fulda, Captain Cottier being the last to leave the steamer.

The Fulda signalled to the Fire Island signal station at 4.30: "Oregon sunk; passengers all aboard." The Fulda's was the first report of the disaster received on shore. The Fulda then steamed to New York, reaching Quarantine after sunset. The Cunard agents sent several tugs down to bring off the passengers. All the luggage was lost, with nearly all the mails, less than one hundred out of six hundred sacks being saved.

Some passengers say the officers and sailors behaved admirably, but that the conduct of the firemen and stokers was scandalous, swarming about the decks, leaping into the boat ahead of the passengers, and preventing the latter with clubs and hatchets from entering.

Mr. Matthews, the first officer, who was on the bridge when the collision occurred, reports that "the Oregon was struck by an unknown schooner at 4.30 A.M. It was not daylight, but there was a clear view of the horizon. The fourth officer was also on the bridge on the starboard side, while the first officer was on the port side, and there were three look-outs on the promenade deck. Both first and fourth officers saw a sudden flash of a white light which as suddenly disappeared. The look-outs gave no notice of the proximity of a ship, and no side lights were shown, so the first officer concluded the light came from a pilot boat. He had the helm put hard aport, but before the Oregon could answer, the collision took place. He ordered the engines to be stopped, and kept the wheel hard over. His intention was to bout ship and to go to the assistance of the schooner, but the latter, after striking the Oregon twice, disappeared, not a cry being heard. The Oregon was steaming eighteen knots at the time of the disaster. She had two holes made in her port side, near the coal bunkers. A fresh wind west-by-north was blowing when the schooner struck the steamship."

FROM THE FULDA

the scene was a memorable one. Captain Ringk, of that steamer, says: "I had not long to look before I made up my mind that the steamer in the distance was the Oregon. I saw flags flying on her. I wondered what was the matter, and supposed she was taking on a pilot. The pilot boat had no pilot flag up, however, and that puzzled me more than ever. Then I imagined that the Oregon had taken the pilot boat's last pilot, and so I hoisted my pilot signal and went closer to the steamer. All at once, as I proceeded at a good speed, I noticed that the flags on the Oregon were signals of distress, and such signals, too, that indicated a desire for assistance immediately. It was about half-past eleven o'clock when I first saw the pilot boat, and it was just twelve o'clock when I stopped within three hundred feet of the Oregon and saw that her passengers were swarming on the pilot boat and a lumber schooner, and that she was in a sinking condition."

THE PASSENGERS IN PERIL.

"I immediately ordered a boat to be lowered, because I could plainly see that the hundreds of people on the schooner, which was deeply laden, were in danger of being swamped. This was hardly done, however, before a boat from the Oregon came alongside, and Captain Cottier came up the ladder, which was lowered to him, and told me the story of his distress. He asked me if I would assist him—if I would take his passengers aboard, and then tow him ashore. I would have done anything to save those people who were massed together on the small sailing vessels."

"As all the Oregon's boats were overboard I deemed it unnecessary to lower any more of my boats, and manned the Oregon's boats with my fresh crew, laying the ship to all the while. Then began the work of rescue."

"It took us from twelve o'clock noon to three o'clock in the afternoon to transfer all the wrecked people on to my boat. It was a very fortunate circumstance that the sea was smooth, for otherwise all, or at least half, the nine hundred souls from the Oregon would have been washed overboard from the schooner and pilot boat, or dashed to pieces in the life-boats when leaving the sinking ship. As it was, there was not a mishap save a few slight scratches to some of the ladies, one of these catching her finger in the chains of the boat and losing a small tip of skin and flesh. The doctor had nothing to do but administer a little medicine to some of the ladies who were exhausted after the excitement they had experienced."

"As soon as the passengers got aboard the Fulda they were provided with a lunch of cold meats, and coffee and wines where needed, and the poor steerage passengers fared quite as well as the cabin people. Every gentleman on board the Fulda resigned his state-room to make room for the ladies, and by night everybody was as comfortable as though nothing had happened."

THE OREGON GOES DOWN.

"My, though! what a grand sight it was when the beautiful Oregon went down! When I first came up with her she was down at the head. Gradually she sank lower and lower, and all at once her head plunged out of sight under the sea, and her stern came up like a teeter board. The stern rose so high in the air that you could see her screw wheel. She remained in that duck-like position for a little while, and then by degrees again she settled at the stern and went down as gracefully as though gliding off the cradles at a launch. It was all over in a minute or two, although as we all looked at the lovely creature in her helpless condition it seemed like a much longer time.

A ROARING ERUPTION.

"The collision was made right under the bridge of the Oregon, in one of the coal bunkers, near the engine-room. As the stern went down the air escaped from the stern compartment in volume as great as an exhaust of steam, and while the vessel was slowly but majestically sinking beneath the waves the water was forced up over her with a roar like thunder and the grandeur of a waterspout or volcanic eruption.

"When all was over the three after masts of the sunken steamer were about ten feet above the surface; she lost her foremast in going down. I looked at my chronometer and saw that the waters had closed over the Oregon at exactly twenty minutes to one o'clock P.M. Ordering the lead to be dropped, it was discovered that the Oregon lay in twenty-two fathoms, or one hundred and thirty-two feet of water. Her position was on an even keel, as level as though she were floating at her dock."

MANY SINGULAR INCIDENTS

are reported in connection with the wreck. In some cases mothers sent their children alone to the boats which were to leave first, preferring themselves to remain with their husbands to take such risks as those who waited to the last might be supposed to run. A man named Ezra Kendall lost $4500, which he carried with him in cash in order to save the cost of exchange. Others lost larger sums, and the total loss of personal property in coupons, notes, etc., is estimated at $200,000. Diamonds of the value of $1,000,000 were saved. The agents of the Cunard Company replaced the railway tickets to the West which the immigrants lost, but they have not yet given a positive reply in respect to the loss of their baggage, valuables, etc.

CAUSE FOR THANKS.

The passengers of the Oregon may remember with a shudder that their experience is exceptional. More often than not when a large vessel, crowded with human beings, has been struck amidships, a fearful sacrifice of life has been the almost instantaneous result. When the Spanish steamer Murillo ran down the emigrant ship Northfleet in the Downs, in January, 1873, the night was clear and the sea smooth; but only eighty-five out of four hundred and twenty-seven passengers reached the shore alive. It is true that on this occasion the calamity was aggravated by the merciless cruelty of the people on the Murillo, who steamed on without so much as throwing a rope to the shattered and sinking emigrant ship. This circumstance of horror was wanting when the Prussian ironclad, the Grosser Kurfurst, was sunk by her consort, the Konig Wilhelm, almost within cable's length of Folkestone beach. Every effort was made by the rest of the fleet to rescue the crew of the disabled vessel, but out of five hundred men nearly three hundred were drowned.

A collision at sea, when one or both ships are large steamers, is, indeed, so sudden and rapid a calamity, that it is sometimes impossible to save lives, even when there is another vessel standing by to give help. In July, 1886, the Amazon ran into a screw steamer named the Osprey in the English Channel. The sloop stood by to take off passengers and crew; but the Osprey went down so fast that only a very few of the men were able to clamber into her bowsprit and forerigging. Most of the passengers, including the women and children, went down with the ship. Neither is the appalling calamity which befell the Princess Alice in the river Thames forgotten, when some hundreds of excursionists, at the close of a day of pleasure, were run into and found a watery grave.

Almost immediately after the sinking of the Oregon, a diver was sent from New York, to see whether there was any possibility of again floating her. The great depth at which she lies and the unfavorable weather have so far prevented a complete examination. It is, however, almost certain that she cannot be raised, and the company has been advised to explode the hulk, in the hope of securing the cargo.

A doubt still exists in some minds as to the cause of the disaster. The theory that it was caused by an explosion on board the Oregon herself finds favor with many, but inquiries for missing vessels show that there was near the spot at that time a heavily-laden schooner which might have done the mischief. The Cunard Company is still able to boast that it has never lost a passenger, but if this disaster had occurred far out at sea, there is reason to fear that very few of those on board the Oregon would have been saved.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S name has been very prominent in the cable despatches for some time past. He is an advanced Radical in politics, and makes no secret of his preference for a Republican over a Monarchical form of government. Since he has been associated in the government under Mr. Gladstone we have had frequent accounts of his opposition to his aristocratic colleagues, and it appeared that in the present cabinet he would be the most influential member. His chief rival, Lord Hartington, was not in it, so it was thought Mr. Chamberlain would have his own way. But it has not been so. He does not approve of Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy, and has left the Cabinet.

Joseph Chamberlain was born in 1836, and is now fifty years old. He was educated at University College School, London. At the early age of sixteen he was put to business, and when he was eighteen he removed with his family to Birmingham, where his father became one of the partners in the great screw manufacturing firm of Nettlefold & Chamberlain, which employs two thousand persons.

In ancestry Mr. Chamberlain comes of an old Non-conformist family, and is, in fact, descended from one of who faced penury and want rather than do violence to their conscientious convictions. This fact was almost unknown until Mr. Chamberlain himself incidentally mentioned it. Speaking at a large meeting at Denbigh on October 20th, 1884, after referring to the non-conformity of Wales, he said: "I boast a descent of which I am as proud as any baron may be of a title which he owes to the smiles of a king or to the favor of a king's mistress, for I can claim descent from one of the two thousand ejected clergymen who, in the time of the Stuarts, left home, and work, and profit, rather than accept the State-made creed which it was sought to force upon them." It cannot be said that Mr. Chamberlain has been unfaithful to the traditions of his ancestors, for in the Cabinet or out, he has steadily supported them upon every favorable occasion.

HIS ENTRANCE INTO PUBLIC LIFE

was in the municipal affairs of Birmingham, of which enterprising borough he was three times elected mayor, from 1873 to 1876. His business capacity secured for the town the purchase of the private gas companies, by which he reduced the price of gas, and made a large profit to the town.

His first effort to enter Parliament was unsuccessful. In 1874 he contested Sheffield, but was beaten. Two years later, on June 27th, 1876, he was elected by Birmingham, for which important constituency he has sat ever since. He was not long in Parliament before he made his mark, and his maiden speech shortly after the Session opened in 1877 was very successful. But it was during the last Liberal administration that he made rapid and great advances. When the Liberals were returned to power in 1880 speculation was rife as to the composition of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet, and many persons wondered how the great leader would manage

THE MORE RADICAL SECTION OF HIS PARTY.

The announcement that Mr. Chamberlain had been offered the appointment of President of the Board of Trade was recognized by the party generally as wise and suitable.

The reasons of Mr. Chamberlain's success are not far to seek. He possesses remarkable business ability coupled with keen political sagacity, and the power of most effective public speech. He may not be so brilliant a debater as Mr. Gladstone, or so superb an orator as Mr. Bright, but—though he has recently made great advances in these respects—speaking in a fine voice, he sends his clear-cut, crystalline utterances straight home. Whatever his future course may be, he will be an important factor in the conduct of public affairs.

THE MARTYRED BISHOP.

AT a church missionary breakfast, held recently in Oxford, the addresses turned largely on Bishop Hannington, whose portrait appeared in this journal on February 25th, and who is believed to have been murdered by the King of Uganda.

The Vice-Principal of St. Mary's Hall, said: "Fifteen or sixteen years ago they had at St. Mary's Hall one of the most good-natured and loving under-graduates he had ever met with. He was brimful of simple, hearty good-nature, and of genuine honest fun; the only occasion on which, as far as he could remember, that it was his duty to speak to him in a disciplinary kind of way, was when he persisted in letting off too many fireworks in the hall quad. He took his degree and became ordained in the ordinary course, and they heard of him as the incumbent of a pleasant parish in the south of England; but two or three years afterward they were even more surprised than they were delighted, and they were exceedingly surprised and exceedingly delighted to hear that he was at the head of a mission party which was going out into Central Africa. He conducted that mission with so much success that at the end of a comparatively brief time the Church Missionary Society proposed that he should become the bishop of all the newly-formed Christian churches in that vast district which he was exploring. But his health had almost completely broken down. When he came back he told him he had been stricken with fever thirty-seven times in one year. He recruited at home, but the call was too strong for him; the very bishopric was again offered, he accepted, he went out, and he had found that a missionary had to face other perils besides those of the jungle and the swamp, and after living the life of a Christian hero he had died, they had very great reason to believe, the death of a Christian martyr."

Rev. Handley C. G. Moule could not but say a word or two in continuation of what had already been said on the life and death of dear Bishop Hannington. He went out in a spirit of unsurpassable self-devotion, in his opinion. He went out wholly at his own expense, taking with him two working-men assistants at his own expense; he went out in the most absolutely unostentatious way. He did not suppose that many scores of people in this country knew of his going at all, or had taken any notice of it. He could not but think of him with feelings of humiliation and stimulus which were not easy to express. He was but fifteen years ago a man more likely to be found on Newmarket race-course than in the class-room; but by the grace of God he became a very different man within these last few years, and he grew so rapidly into such a height of Christian character, and love and strength, that it was for himself a lifelong benefit to have had anything whatever to do with his training for the ministry.

TRIALS OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 4, 1886.*

"Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me."—LUKE 10: 40.

The Welcome to Christ—A Division of Labor—The Difference in Sisters—Trouble in the Kitchen—I. The Trial of Non-Appreciation—The Matron's Varied Duties—Assured Sympathy—The God of the Housekeeper—Christ Married—II. The Trial of Severe Economy—Necessary in a Smoker's Home—Prepares them to Enjoy Heaven—III. YONDER is a beautiful village homestead. The man of the house is dead, and his widow is taking charge of the premises. This is the widow Martha of Bethany. Yes, I will show you also the pet of the household. This is Mary, the youngest sister, with a book under her arm, and her face having no appearance of anxiety or perturbation. Company has come. Christ stands outside the door, and, of course, there is a good deal of excitement inside the door. The disarranged furniture is hastily put aside, and the hair is brushed back, and the dresses are adjusted as well as, in so short a time, Mary and Martha can attend to these matters.

THE WELCOME TO CHRIST.

They did not keep Christ standing at the door until they were newly apparelled, or until they had elaborately arranged their tresses, then coming out with their affected surprise as though they had not heard the two or three previous knockings, saying: "Why, is that you?" No. They were ladies, and were always presentable, although they may not have always had on their best, for none of us always have on our best; if we did, our best would not be worth having on. They throw open the door, and greet Christ. They say: "Good-morning, Master; come in, and be seated."

Christ did not come alone; He had a group of friends with Him, and such an influx of city visitors would throw any country home into perturbation. I suppose also the walk from the city had been a good appetizer. The kitchen department that day was a very important department, and I suppose that Martha had no sooner greeted the guests than she fled to that room. Mary had no anxiety about household affairs. She had full confidence that Martha could get up the best dinner in Bethany. She seems to say: "Now, let us have a division of labor. Martha, you cook, and I'll sit down and be good."

DIFFERENCE IN SISTERS.

So you have often seen a great difference between two sisters. There is Martha, hard working, painstaking, a good manager, ever inventive of some new pastry, or discovering something in the art of cooking and housekeeping. There is Mary, also, fond of conversation, literary, so engaged in deep questions of ethics she has no time to attend to the questions of household welfare. It is noon. Mary is in the parlor with Christ. Martha is in the kitchen. It would have been better if they had divided the work, and then they could have divided the opportunity of listening to Jesus; but Mary monopolizes Christ, while Martha swelters at the fire.

TROUBLE IN THE KITCHEN.

It was a very important thing that they should have a good dinner that day. Christ was hungry, and He did not often have a luxurious entertainment. Alas! me, if the duty had devolved upon Mary, what a repast that would have been! But something went wrong in the kitchen. Perhaps the fire would not burn, or the bread would not bake, or Martha scalded her hand, or something was burned black that ought only to have been made brown; and Martha lost her patience, and forgetting the proprieties of the occasion, with besweated brow, and perhaps with pitcher in one hand and tongs in the other, she rushes out of the kitchen into the presence of Christ, saying: "Lord, dost Thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone?"

Christ scolded not a word. If it were scolding, I should rather have His scolding than anybody else's blessing. There was nothing acerb. He knew Martha had almost worked herself to death to get Him something to eat, and so He throws a world of tenderness into His intonation as He seems to say: "My dear woman, do not worry; let the dinner go; sit down on this ottoman beside Mary, your younger sister. Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful." As Martha throws open that kitchen door, I look in and see a great many household perplexities and anxieties.

NON-APPRECIATION.

First, there is the trial of non-appreciation. That is what made Martha so mad with Mary. The younger sister had no estimate of her older sister's fatigues. As now, men bothered with the anxieties of the store, and office, and shop, or coming from the Stock Exchange, they say when they get home: "Oh, you ought to be in our factory a little while; you ought to have to manage eight, or ten, or twenty subordinates, and then you would know what trouble and anxiety are!" Oh, sir, the wife and the mother has to conduct at the same time a university, a clothing establishment, a restaurant, a laundry, a library, while she is health officer, police, and president of her realm! She must do a thousand things, and do them well, in order to keep things going smoothly; and so her brain and her nerves are taxed to the utmost.

I know there are housekeepers who are so fortunate that they can sit in an arm-chair in the library, or lie on the belated pillow, and throw off all the care upon subordinates who, having large wages and great experience, can attend to all of the affairs of the household. Those are the exception. I am speaking this morning of the great mass of housekeepers—the women to whom life is a struggle, and who, at thirty years of age, look as though they were forty, and at forty look as though they were fifty, and at fifty look as though they were sixty. The fallen at Chalons, and Austerlitz, and Gettysburg, and Waterloo are a small number compared with the slain in the great Armageddon of the kitchen. You go out to the cemetery, and you will see that the tombstones all read beautifully poetic; but if those tombstones would speak the truth, thousands of them would say: "Here lies a woman killed by too much mending, and sewing, and baking, and scrubbing, and scouring; the weapon with which she was slain was a broom, or a sewing-machine, or a ladle."

A WEARING LIFE.

You think, O man of the world! that you have all the cares and anxieties. If the cares and anxieties of the household should come upon you for one week, you would be a fit candidate for Bloomingdale—I mean insane asylum. The half-rested housekeeper arises in the morning. She must have the morning repast prepared at an irrevocable hour. What if the fire will not light; what if the marketing did not come; what if the clock has stopped—no matter, she must have the morning repast at an irrevocable hour. Then the children must be got off to school. What if their garments are torn; what if they do not know their lessons; what if they have lost a hat or sash—they must be ready. Then you have all the diet of the day, and perhaps of several days, to plan; but what if the butcher has sent meat unmarketable, or the grocer has sent articles of food adulterated, and what if some piece of silver be gone, or some favorite chalice be cracked, or the roof leak, or the plumbing fail, or any one of a thousand things occur—you must be ready.

Spring weather comes, and there must be a revolution in the family wardrobe; or autumn comes, and you must shut out the northern blast; but what if the moth has preceded you to the chest; what if, during the year, the children have outgrown the apparel of last year; what if the fashions have changed. Your house must be an apothecary's shop; it must be a dispensary; there must be medicines for all sorts of ailments—something to loosen the croup, something to cool the burn, something to poultice the inflammation, something to silence the jumping tooth, something to soothe the earache. You must be in half a dozen places at the same time, or you must attempt to be.

ASSURED SYMPATHY.

If, under all this wear and tear of life, Martha makes an impatient rush upon the library or drawing-room, be patient, be lenient. Oh, woman, though I may fail to stir up an appreciation in the souls of others in regard to your household toils, let me assure you, from the kindness with which Jesus Christ met Martha, that He appreciates all your work from garret to cellar; and that the God of Deborah, and Hannah, and Abigail, and Grandmother Lois, and Elizabeth Fry, and Hannah More is the God of the housekeeper.

Jesus was never married that He might be the especial friend and confidante of a whole world of troubled womanhood. I blunder; Christ was married. The Bible says that the Church is the Lamb's wife, and that makes me know that all Christian women have a right to go to Christ and tell Him of their annoyances and troubles, since by His oath of conjugal fidelity He is sworn to sympathize. George Herbert, the Christian poet, wrote two or three verses on this subject:

"The servant by this clause
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room, as for Thy laws,
Makes this and the action fine."

Again, there is the trial of SEVERE ECONOMY.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine households out of the thousand are subjected to it—some under more and some under less stress of circumstances. Especially if a man smoke very expensive cigars, and take very costly dinners at the restaurants, he will be severe in demanding domestic economies. This is what kills tens of thousands of women—attempting to make five dollars do the work of seven. How the bills come in! The woman is the banker of the household; she is the president, the cashier, the teller, the discount clerk; and there is a panic every few weeks! This thirty years' war against high prices, this perpetual study of economics, this life-long attempt to keep the outgoes less than the income, exhausts millions of housekeepers.

A PREPARATION.

Oh, my sister, this is a part of the Divine discipline! If it were best for you, all you would have to do would be to open the front windows and the ravens would fly in with food; and after you had baked fifty times from the barrel in the pantry, the barrel, like the one of Zephath, would be full; and the shoes of the children would last as long as the shoes of the Israelites in the wilderness—forty years. Beside that, this is going to make heaven the more attractive in the contrast. They never hunger there, and consequently there will be none of the nuisances of catering for appetites. And in the land of the white robe they never have to mend anything, and the air in that hill country makes everybody well. There are no rents to pay; every man owns his own house, and a mansion at that.

It will not be so great a change for you to have a chariot in heaven if you have been in the habit of riding in this world. It will not be so great a change for you to sit down on the banks of the river of life, if in this world you had a country-seat; but if you have walked with tired feet in this world, what a glorious change to mount celestial equipage; and if your life on earth was domestic martyrdom, oh, the joy of an eternity in which you shall have nothing to do except what you choose to do! Martha has had no drudgery for eighteen centuries! I quarrel with the theologians who want to distribute all the thrones of heaven among the John Knoxes, and the Hugh Latimers, and the Theban Legion. Some of the brightest thrones of heaven will be kept for Christian housekeepers. Oh, what a change from here to there—from the time when they put down the rolling-pin to when they take up the sceptre! If Chatsworth Park and the Vanderbilt Mansion on Fifth Avenue were to be lifted into the celestial city, they would be considered uninhabitable rookeries, and glorified Lazarus would be ashamed to be going in and out of either of them.

THE TRIAL OF SICKNESS.

III. There are many housekeepers who could get along with their toils if it were not for sickness and trouble. The fact is, one half of the women of the land are more or less invalids. The mountain lass, who has never had an ache or pain, may consider household toil inconsiderable, and toward evening she may skip away miles to the fields and drive home the cattle, and she may until ten o'clock at night fill the house with laughing racket; but oh, to do the work of life with worn-out constitution, when whooping-cough has been raging for six weeks in the household, making the night as sleepless as the day—that is not so easy.

Perhaps this comes after the nerves have been shattered by some bereavement that has left desolation in every room of the house, and set the crib in the garret, because the occupant has been hushed into a slumber which needs no mother's lullaby. Oh, she could provide for the whole group a great deal better than she can for a part of the group now the rest are gone! Though you may tell her God is taking care of those who are gone, it is mother-like to brood both flocks; and one wing she puts over the flock in the house, the other wing she puts over the flock in the grave.

There is nothing but the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ that will take a woman through the trials of home life. At first there may be a romance or a novelty that will do for a substitute. The marriage hour has just passed, and the perplexities of the household are more than atoned by the joy of being together, and by the fact that when it is late they do not have to discuss the question as to whether it is time to go! The mishaps of the household, instead of being a matter of anxiety and reprehension, are a matter of merriment—the loaf of bread turned into a geological specimen; the slushy custards; the jaundiced or measly biscuits. It is a very bright sunlight that falls on the cutlery and the mantel ornaments of a new home.

THE PROSE OF MATRIMONY.

But after awhile the romance is all gone, and then there is something to be prepared for the table that the book called "Cookery Taught in Twelve Lessons" will not teach. The receipt for making it is not a handful of this, a cup of that, and a spoonful of something else. It is not something sweetened with ordinary condiments, or flavored with ordinary flavors, or baked in ordinary ovens. It is the loaf of domestic happiness; and all the ingredients come down from heaven, and the fruits are plucked from the tree of life, and it is sweetened with the new wine of the kingdom, and it is baked in the oven of home trial. Solomon wrote out of his own experience. He had a wretched home. A man cannot be happy with two wives, much less six hundred; and he says, writing out of his own experience: "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith."

GLORIOUS SELF-SACRIFICE.

How great are the responsibilities of housekeepers! Sometimes an indigestible article of food, by its effect upon a commander or king, has defeated an army or overthrown an empire. Housekeepers by the food they provide, by the couches they spread, by the books they introduce, by the influences they bring around their home, are deciding the physical, intellectual, moral, eternal destiny of the race.

You say your life is one of sacrifice. I know it. But, my sisters, that is the only life worth living. That was Florence Nightingale's life; that was Payson's life; that was Christ's life. We admire it in others; but how very hard it is for us to cultivate ourselves. When in this city young Dr. Hutchison, having spent a whole night in a diphtheritic room for the relief of a patient, became saturated with the poison and died, we all felt as if we would like to put garlands on his grave; everybody appreciates that. When in the burning hotel at St. Louis a young man on the fifth story broke open the door of the room where his mother was sleeping, and plunged in amid smoke and fire, crying: "Mother! where are you?" and never came out, our hearts applauded that young man. But how few of us have the Christ-like spirit—a willingness to suffer for others!

A BARBAROUS PEDAGOGUE.

A rough teacher in a school called upon a poor, half starved lad, who had offended against the laws of the school, and said: "Take off your coat directly, sir." The boy refused to take it off, whereupon the teacher said again: "Take off your coat, sir," as he swung the whip through the air. The boy refused. It was not because he was afraid of the lash—he was used to that at home—but it was from shame; he had no undergarment, and as at the third command he pulled slowly off his coat, there went a sob through the school. They saw then why he did not want to remove his coat, and they saw the shoulder blades had almost cut through the skin, and a stout, healthy boy rose up and went to the teacher of the school, and said: "Oh, sir, please don't hurt this poor fellow; whip me; see, he's nothing but a poor chap; don't you hurt him, he's poor; whip me." "Well," said the teacher, "it's going to be a severe whipping; I am willing to take you as a substitute." "Well," said the boy, "I don't care; you whip me, if you will let this poor fellow go." The stout, healthy boy took the scourging without an outcry.* "Bravo," says every man—"Bravo!" How many of us are willing to take the scourging, and the suffering, and the toil, and the anxiety for other people! Beautiful thing to admire, but how little we have of that spirit! God give us that self-denying spirit, so that whether we are in humble spheres or in conspicuous spheres we may perform our whole duty—for this struggle will soon be over.

A CHRISTIAN HOUSEKEEPER.

One of the most affecting reminiscences of my mother is my remembrance of her as a Christian housekeeper. She worked very hard, and when we would come in from summer play, and sit down at the table at noon, I remember how she used to come in with beads of perspiration along the line of gray hair, and how sometimes she would sit down at the table, and put her head against her wrinkled hand and say: "Well, the fact is, I'm too tired to eat." Long after she might have delegated this duty to others, she would not be satisfied unless she attended to the matter herself. In fact, we all preferred to have her do so, for somehow things tasted better when she prepared them. Some time ago, in an express train, I shot past that old homestead. I looked out of the window, and tried to peer through the darkness. While I was doing so, one of my old schoolmates, whom I had not seen for many years, tapped me on the shoulder, and said: "De Witt, I see you are looking out at the scenes of your boyhood." "Oh, yes," I replied, "I was looking out at the old place where my mother lived and died."

That night, in the cars, the whole scene came back to me. There was the country home. There was the noonday table. There were the children on either side of the table, most of them gone never to come back. At one end of the table my father, with a smile that never left his countenance even when he lay in his coffin. It was an eighty-six years' smile—not the smile of inanimation, but of Christian courage and of Christian hope. At the other end of the table was a beautiful, benignant, hard-working, aged Christian housekeeper, my mother. She was very tired. I am glad she has so good a place to rest in. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

A Remarkable Prayer Offered by the Chaplain of the House of Representatives, on March 22d, was ordered to be printed in the Congressional Record by a vote of the House. In the course of the prayer, the chaplain said: "Rid the land we beseech Thee, of all gamblers, whether they gamble with dice or cards, or chips, or with wheat, or stocks, or corn, or cotton. Deliver us from the influence and power of robbers who, enticing their victims to boards of trade, and stock exchanges, and bucket-shops, name their practices of plunder, 'shearing the lambs.' Enlighten our intelligence with Thy truth, sweeten and deepen our humanity with Thy love, quicken our piety with Thy Spirit, and may Jesus Christ become more and more the master and ruler of our lives and characters and thoughts."

A Courageous Sergeant, the Hero of Twenty-two battles, who served four years in the war, showed that he possessed moral courage also, at Reading, Pa., a few days ago. Ex-Governor Curtin, in the course of an address at a public meeting, humorously said: "Who ever knew an old soldier to refuse commissary whiskey?" To his surprise a tall, gray-bearded man arose, and answered: "Here's one." The old soldier who was not afraid to make known his temperance principles is William H. K. Bush, of Reading. He was a temperance man first, last, and all the time. He organized a temperance society of twenty-eight members in his company, and built it up to sixty-eight members. Once there came an order that every soldier should have two doses of quinine in whiskey every day. Sergeant Bush marched his company up to the surgeon's tent at "sick call," and the surgeon said: "Pour out a big one for the sergeant." But the sergeant answered: "I swore allegiance to Uncle Sam to fight, but not to drink whiskey." The surgeon was inclined to make a fuss, but the Colonel backed up the sergeant and others of his company who refused the whiskey. "When the Governor asked that question," said Mr. Bush, "I thought it my duty to stand up, and up I went."

Saved on the Bank of a Precipice was an incident related by a clergyman at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting last week. He said that when a young man he was dissipated, and though his father and mother were praying Christians, he remained indifferent to their appeals. One night when he was two hundred miles from home, in company with other young men indulging in revelry, his mother awoke from sleep in great concern about her boy. She got out of bed, and, kneeling down, besought the Lord with tears and prayers to save her son. She was impressed with a feeling that he was in great peril. Her husband was awakened by her sobs, and finding her praying and weeping, asked what was the matter. "Oh, my boy, my boy; he is in danger," was the reply. In danger he most decidedly was. After indulging in the intoxicating cup and losing his self-control, he drove through a dark country road behind a pair of fast horses. Reckless as he had become through the influence of the drink of which he had so freely partaken, he thought not of danger, but his mother's prayers were heard, and the horses were saved by a step from plunging over a precipice. "Had I gone over that precipice it would have been death to my body and to my soul," said the speaker. But God heard the mother's prayer still further, and saved her son in the highest sense.

THE REMEDY FOR LAWLESSNESS.

By G. H. Pember.

Trials Removed at Christ's Coming—The Tide of Human Misery—No Check till Christ Comes—The World to Grow Worse—Its Doom Pronounced—The Overturning—The Worship of Humanity—The Deliverance.

WHEN Christ our Bridegroom ascended into heaven, immediately the children of the bride-chamber began to fast. Nor will the days of their mourning be ended until they see Him again, and by the light of His countenance He changes the shadow of death into the morning. When He shall approach to us in bodily presence He will remove all those trials away, and from that time neither sorrow nor gloom shall assail us—no, not even through the medium of our bodies or of any materialistic surroundings.

Until He come in bodily form the tide of human misery must still flow on, in spite of every effort to check it. The corruption of all flesh must go on—ay, and even innocence be cast alive into the seething pit, a sacrifice to unnatural desire and greed of gain. Acts of Parliament cannot stop this plague in its maddening career; governments cannot put it down. We have recently had some cause to remember the words of the Latin satirist: "Who is to watch the watchers themselves?" Philanthropists, Christian or otherwise, cannot make head against it. I do not disparage their energies if they are put forth in a right spirit; they may do blessed work. But it will only be by plucking brands out of the burning; the great conflagration they can never overpower. No, has been pronounced, and we see the sentence beginning to be carried out before our very eyes. Its inhabitants will not retain God in their hearts; therefore it must be again as it was in the days of Noah, and in the days of Lot. All flesh must become corrupt before God; the earth must be filled with violence and bloodshed, and there is but one hope, and one only—the coming of the Son of Man. Why does not the Church raise one universal cry for His coming? Our world is being deluged by the armies from the pit, and there is only one possible Deliverer—He who will soon take to Himself His great power to reign, and destroy those who corrupt the earth.

I will speak of but one of the many evils on earth. How is this mystery of lawlessness—we used to be satisfied with calling it "the mystery of iniquity," but that was when it was not understood; we are beginning to know and what is the result, and we are driven upon a more literal translation; the mystery of lawlessness—how it is developing, and beginning to break forth into view on the right hand and on the left; to be no longer a mystery! Long has authority been vacillating and uncertain, and it seems to be gradually yielding its place to anarchy. Those awful words: "I will overturn," seem to be finding what will probably be their last fulfilment. Will any of the schemes that are being put before us be able to restore social order, and to bring back to us the blessings of firm and stable government? There is little hope of such a beneficent result. The sceptre even now is trembling in the hands of the ruler all over the world. On every side we see men self-willed, determined to have their own way. Order seems to be now quite impracticable.

Consider for one moment

of the day. Does it not teach that a man may do whatsoever he will—that he may change times, and laws, and the arrangements of the Lord God Almighty? Does it not teach us that the majority among fallen men must have their way, even though their hearts be set upon unrighteousness? Does it not teach that toward the great God who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters, man may pose as he pleases, and is not to be deprived of a single privilege, even though he dares to defy and insult the Lord God Almighty, his Maker?

God told us twenty-five hundred years ago by the pen of Daniel that the last great rebel should worship the god of forces. Humanitarianism, the popular creed of the day, is being already followed by the abstract worship of humanity. Soon the corollary will appear. Under the influence of these modern teachings, society, which a little before was comparatively calm and still, is now heaving and tossing, and threatening every moment to break up into wild waves out of which there shall presently emerge, at the bidding of the dragon, that awful being, that world deceiver, that man who shall receive the worship of a doomed world—the Antichrist, the Christ of Satan.

In such a case what consolation can we have, whither must we turn for help? Who is able to confront this Leviathan of the world's lawlessness? One, and One only—He whose right it is to reign. "The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters; yea, than the mighty waves of the sea." He who has gone into a far country to receive for Himself the sovereignty must return to take it; then at last peace and righteousness will follow in His train—He whose approach to our benighted earth will be as the morning, when the sun is risen, as a morning without clouds; He whose presence will clothe the sad earth with joy, even as the verdure that springs out of her bosom from the clear shining after rain; He at the light of whose countenance not only His saints and all they that fear God, both great and small, shall rejoice, but even the sick and groaning creation shall be loosed from her bonds; her restless fever shall be rebuked, and shall flee away; the whole earth shall be quiet and at rest, and break forth into singing. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Old Jamie's Surrender.—At a recent meeting Mr. Jack observed: "Not long ago an old man, close on seventy years of age, surrendered himself to Christ. It was indeed a touching sight to witness the aged man, but a mere babe in Christ, sit down for the first time at the Lord's table soon afterward. He was looking exceedingly happy, and I remarked: 'Well, Jamie, you seem very happy this evening.' 'Aye, I am that,' he rejoined, with the tears running down his face. 'Oh, what a Saviour we have!'"

A Dancer's Dying Confession.—Mr. Clarke, the evangelist, related: "I knew a young lady who was a slave to dancing. She came to die. Her last hour had arrived, and as the end drew near, addressing her mother, who was standing by her death-bed, she said: 'Mother, can't you pray for me?' And then, in a husky voice, she exclaimed: 'Oh, mother, dancing has damned my soul!' These were the last words she uttered upon earth, and she carried them to eternity with her. So dancing had dragged her soul to hell, because she had preferred it to the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Good Position in Society.—Mr. J. A. Campbell said: "The other day I was urging a man to close with Christ, when he said: 'Do you know who I am?' 'No,' I said; 'but that does not alter the case.' 'Well,' he said, 'I hold a very good position, and am much esteemed, and if I become a Christian I will not be so honored in society.' Ah! there it is. How many are there like this man who will not consent to be a follower of the Lord for fear of losing a little honor in the eyes of their fellow-creatures; striving for honor and glory here, and, alas! the end of such is damnation and eternal woe."

Facts Better than Feelings.—A Minister observed: "I heard of a man who went to a Gospel meeting and gave himself to the Lord. He went home and told his family that he had accepted Christ. When they heard of this they said: 'Oh, and how do you feel? for you must be quite changed in your feelings.' 'No,' he said,

'I feel no difference.' 'Then you cannot be a Christian,' they replied, 'or else you would feel differently.' Mark his answer. 'I have something better than feelings to go upon. Jesus says: "Come unto Me." I took Christ at His word; so it is facts on which my soul depends; not feelings.' Some time after this God filled this man's soul with an overflowing joy. The 'feelings' came because he had trusted Christ without them. Dear friends, you who are waiting for feelings, just take God at His word, and the feelings will come afterward in His own good time and way."

A Weak Woman's Victory.—"The Other night a woman came into our Gospel tent, and at the close of the service she said: 'Mr. McFarlane, I would like to sign the pledge.' I was a little surprised, and said: 'You do not look like a woman that would take strong drink.' 'I have not taken it for some time, but it is my weakness,' she replied. 'Have you taken the Lord Jesus Christ as your Saviour?' I asked. 'Do you believe He was hanged on the cross for you?' 'I have, and do believe,' she replied. 'Well,' I said, 'I am sorry I have no pledge cards to-night, but when you have the Lord on your side you may pass all the saloons and not be afraid, for has He not promised to be thy Keeper?' She went away, and afterward told me that on that particular night, on her way home, she had a strong desire to enter a rum-shop, but after what had been said she was enabled, by God's help, to pass them all, feeling sure that the Lord was by her side. Thus, dear friends, if we would ever remember that God has promised to help us in our weakness we would be saved from many mournful regrets."

A Gambler in a Fix.—Rev. Dr. Wallace said: "Some time ago three young men professing to be Christians came from the country to our city, and connected themselves with a Christian church. I was asked to look after them, which I did, and after the lapse of a few months I saw that there was a great falling away. This went on for some time, their conduct growing more and more unsatisfactory. One night one of them, with a pale and haggard face, entered my dining-room. I saw that the young man was greatly excited, and undergoing a great mental strain. With some hesitation he asked me if I could lend him fifty pounds. 'That is a very large sum,' I said; 'what need have you for so much?' He pleaded with me to give him the amount asked for, saying that his mother, who was a widow, and lived in the country, was in great and immediate need of it. 'Well,' I said, 'it so happens that I intend preaching in that district next Sunday, when I promise you I will call upon your mother, and inquire into this case, and do all I can to relieve her.' But afterward I learned that this story was untrue; that the money was to pay off a gambling debt which he had run heedlessly into, and then had come in his extremity to me. This is just one example of many thousands of young men who are daily being entrapped by gambling saloons and other places of vice."

Why Mary Clung to Her Father.—"One of the London City missionaries said that not long ago, in one of the narrow streets in the east of London, in the middle of the night, a policeman came upon a little girl crouching on a door-step. Going up to her he kindly said: 'My poor child, what are you doing here at this hour?' 'My father is a drunkard,' was the reply, 'and when he came home to-night he turned me out, telling me not to come back.' Here the child burst into a fit of crying, and after a moment continued, 'but I must go back, sir, in the morning.' In the morning the child did go home, but often that little one was turned out of doors by her drunken father. At last the father was touched by the child's persistent clinging to him, and one day he said: 'Mary, how is it that you have always stood by me when every one else has gone from me? Tell me, child.' In a moment both arms were round his neck, and she said: 'Father, before mother died she made me promise that I would never leave you, no matter what it cost me, and she said you would give up drinking and turn to the Lord yet, for she prayed for you. So now, dear father, I am going to stay by you until that time comes, for I know it will." That little girl had a long time to wait, and many hardships to go through. But it did come. Who could doubt it? because her faith was strong in God's power to save. So she had the unspeakable pleasure of seeing that drunken but much loved father, "sitting at Jesus' feet, clothed and in his right mind." Oh, dear friends, pray—pray for your loved ones unceasingly, and untiringly, for the Lord will surely keep His promise. "Whatsoever ye ask in My name, believing, ye shall receive."

TYPOGRAPHICAL AID TO MISSIONS.

ONE of the most formidable difficulties which missionaries to China and Japan have had to encounter has been the peculiarity of the characters of the printed language. An effort to remove this difficulty is being made, and apparently with promise of success. In a communication from Dr. Frank W. Harrell, at Tokio, Japan, published in the Spirit of Missions, he says:

"The Roman Letter Society is organized for the advocacy of a reform by which the Japanese language shall be written and printed in Roman letters, instead of in the peculiar characters or 'ideographs' which are now used. It is believed that the establishment of this reform will be of immense importance to Japanese missions and missionaries.

"The difficulties in the way of acquiring the Japanese language can be appreciated only by those who have made an attempt to do it. The Rev. H. D. Page, of the Japan Mission, states these difficulties and the inestimable benefits that will come with the adoption of the change proposed by the Roman Letter Society very clearly, in a letter published recently. As everybody knows, writes Mr. Page, the Japanese use in their books and writing not only their own native symbols of intricate form and style, to the number of several hundred varying forms, but also the Chinese ideographs; in fact, the book language may be said to be written in Chinese characters. Now, as these characters stand each for a separate word, and there are forty thousand of them, often of puzzling and complicated forms, and as every one who wishes to be anything of a scholar at all must learn four or five thousand of these differing characters, it will be seen what an immense task is before the Japanese youth who means to be able to read the books of his native tongue.

"It is computed that this system of writing takes six years out of the intellectual life of every Japanese—that is to say, the boy of fifteen at home has learned to read well enough to be able to possess himself of any treasures of knowledge that may lie stored in the English language; but for the Japanese boy of the same age the knowledge which he seeks lies hid within these thousands of different symbols, and he cannot begin to store his mind with ideas, but he must spend six years in unlocking the door and crossing the threshold of his treasure-house.

"The foreign missionary who wishes to know the Japanese language thoroughly must study these characters, too, and so years of time and strength are given to the task of learning to read over again, when he would be gladly using his mind to know more of what might stimulate his thoughts, kindle his imagination, give him food for meditation, and make him a better preacher to the people to whom he comes with his message.

"It seems now as if all this were soon to be changed. Last year the Roman Letter Society was formed in Tokio for the purpose of substituting in the writing and printing of the language our twenty-six Roman letters for all these thousands of Chinese and Japanese characters. What a reform it will be when it comes to pass, and how the lucky schoolboy will congratulate himself that he was not born so early as his father, and, like him, have to strain his eyes and make his head ache over Chinese letters! The reform is coming about wonderfully fast. This society has already a membership of fifty-five hundred persons, many of them being leading men in Japan; and now one of the educational departments of the government is going to have all its books printed in Roman letters only, and have them studied by all the schoolboys in the land."

THE DISCOURSE.

Text: "Walk in love" (Eph. 5: 2).

God is love. God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son.

God was in Christ. Then Christ was the incarnation of love.

"As Thou hast sent Me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world" (John 17: 18). Then Christians are to be the embodiment of love.

Our Master walked in love. So we must walk in love, and thus "be followers of God, as dear children" (Eph. 5: 1). Thus we show forth our Lord, as our lives exhibit love.

"Walk" is equivalent to "live." Our whole intercourse with our fellow-men is to be inspired by love. In social, political, and business life, we are to be animated by love. If we defend ourselves from the attacks of others it must be done lovingly. If we correct a child or a servant, if we prosecute or defend a suit at law, if we punish a culprit, love must reign in us.

This is not easy. There are many people that are very unlovely, very unloving; really hateful, and hating us. How are we to love them? Let us recollect:

1. That we have loved ourselves when we knew ourselves to be false, unclear, under the rule of vile passions, and really hateful;

2. That we were glad to have the love of others even then;

3. That we may be as disagreeable in the sight of God as those others;

4. That Christ has loved us, and there cannot be so great a difference between the worst of men and the best as there is between the best of men and Christ.

Dwell on Christ's love for you until you be inflamed with love for Him.

Then remember that He died for love of those whom you find it so hard to love.

Then, that this love-sacrifice on the part of Christ is delicious to God—a sweet-smelling savor.

[The Lord's Prayer should be used somewhere in each service, and the service may be closed with the "Gloria" or other Doxology.]

AFTERNOON TALK.

THE BRUISED REED.

By Rev. Dr. Maclaren.

Isaiah 42: 3 makes this representation of the servant of the Lord—"He shall not break the bruised reed."

Here is the picture: A slender bulrush growing by the margin of some tarn or pond; its sides crushed and dented in by some outside power—some gust of wind, some sudden blow, the foot of some passing animal. The head is hanging by a thread, but it is not yet snapped or broken off from the stem. It is "bruised," but the bruise is not irreparable. And so there are reeds bruised and "shaken by the wind," but yet not broken. And the tender Christ comes, with His gentle, wise, skilful surgery, to bind these up and to make them strong again.

To whom does this text apply? Who are meant by this metaphor of the bruised reed not yet broken? In a very solemn sense, all mankind. In you and me and all our brethren everywhere, the dints and marks of sin are plainly seen. Our manhood has been crushed and battered out of its right shape, and has received awful wounds from that evil that besets us, and has found entrance within us. Whatsoever be the strength, beauty, wisdom, nobleness of any man, in the eye of that God whose will is perfection, that man is a bruised reed.

But, blessed be God! there emerges from the metaphor, not only the solemn thought of the bruises by sin that all men bear, but the other blessed one, that there is no man so bruised as that he is broken; none so injured as that restoration is impossible, no depravity so total but that it may be healed, none so far off but that they may be brought nigh. The reeds are all bruised, the reeds are none of them broken. And so the text comes with its great triumphant hopefulness, and gathers into one mass as capable of restoration the most abject, the most worthless, the most ignorant, the most sensuous, the most godless, the most Christ-hating of the race. And He looks on all the tremendous bulk of a world's sins with the confidence that He can move that mountain and cast it into the depths of the sea.

But then the text may be taken in a somewhat narrow sense, applying more directly to a class. In accordance with other metaphors of Scripture, we may think of "the bruised reed" as expressive of the condition of men whose hearts have been crushed by the consciousness of their sins. Did you ever see a gardener dealing with some plant, a spray of which may have been wounded? How delicately and tenderly the big, clumsy hand busies itself about the tiny spray, and by stays and bandages brings it into an erect position, and then gives it water and loving care. Just so does Jesus Christ deal with the conscious and sensitive heart of a man that has begun to find out how bad he is, and has been driven away from all his foolish confidence.

And the words may be looked at from yet another point of view. We may think of them as representing to us the merciful dealing of the Master with the spirits which are beaten and bruised, sore and wounded by sorrows and calamities; to whom the Christ comes in all the tenderness of His sympathy and the sweetness of His gentleness, and lays a hand upon them—the only hand in all the universe that can touch a bleeding heart without hurting it.

The Christ that knows our sins and sorrows will not break the bruised reed. The whole race of man may be represented in that parable that came from His own lips, as fallen among thieves that have robbed him, and left him bruised, but, blessed be God! only "half dead," sorely wounded, indeed, but not so sorely but that he may be restored. And there comes One with the wine and the oil, and pours them into the wounds. "The bruised reed shall He not break."

FROM LAVATER'S HYMN.

"He must increase, but I must decrease."—JOHN 3: 30.

O Jesus Christ, grow in me,
And all else fade away;
My heart be daily nearer Thee!
Remove all sin, I pray.

Grant daily grace and power;
My strength in weakness be;
Thy glorious light disperse my sight,
Thy life from death make free.

In Thy beams of light all glorious,
Earth's delusions disappear;
Let Christ be all victorious,
And self no longer dear.

Make all in me less faulty;
Fill with a Christ-like love,
First to Thee, then my fellow-men,
Pointing to Thee above.

Now to Thee and Thy kingdom
My life shall all be given;
Pride, wandering thoughts, and indolence
Must from my soul be driven.

My own vain self be empty;
Be humbled every day;
Make me Thy earnest, loving child,
To work for Thee, I pray.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Treasury Statement for March. Issued last week, was eagerly examined for indications of the financial position of the Government. It showed a reduction of the public debt of $14,087,844. The gold balance is about seven millions larger than at the beginning of the month, and the silver balance about the same. Thus the withdrawal of the one and two-dollar notes must have forced about two million silver dollars into circulation, as $2,600,000 was coined during March. There was an increase in the revenues and a decrease in the expenditures as compared with March, 1885. The total advance in the revenues, as thus compared, is $3,765,433, of which $2,181,000 is in customs, and the diminution of expenditures has been $10,862,955, of which $3,637,000 has been in ordinary expenses and $7,371,000 in pensions, there being a slight increase in miscellaneous expenses.

The Edmunds Resolutions on the Confirmation of nominations appear to have failed in their grip on the Senators. At a caucus held last Friday it was found impossible to secure unanimity of action on the line of the resolutions. A large majority of the Senators, prominent among whom was Mr. Hoar, intended to have nominations taken up and passed upon as if the Edmunds resolutions had never been adopted, and this programme will probably be carried out. During the debate in the caucus frequent reference was made to the question of giving publicity to the Senate's consideration of nominations, and many Senators favored opening the doors of executive sessions. That is the best way to disarm suspicion of a bargain between the President and the Senate.

The Arbitration Bill Which Passed the House last week provides a remedy which it may be hoped will be used by railroad companies and their employés to prevent strikes and lock-outs. It provides for the appointment of boards of arbitration, regulates their proceedings, endows them with authority, and permits them to draw money from the public treasury to pay their expenses. The bill does not compel either party to a dispute to submit the question to a board, nor does it make the decision of such a board binding on the parties after it is rendered. It simply arranges for a simple and inexpensive mode of settling disputes which it is optional for the parties to employ. It is thought that a method of settlement being provided by law, it would be more likely to be resorted to than if the matter were left to the spontaneous action of the parties. As passed by the House, the bill provides that each party shall appoint one member of the board, and those two members shall choose a third who must take an oath that he is disinterested. The board is to have power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, examine witnesses under oath, employ clerks and stenographers, and charge all expenses under $1000 to the Government. If the bill becomes law, it ought to be an efficient preventative of strikes.

The Surrender of Geronimo and his Hostile Apaches and their subsequent escape were reported last week. The surrender was made on March 27th, at the San Bernardino Ranch, on the Mexican frontier. They were placed in charge of Lieutenant Maus, with orders to conduct them to Fort Bowie, to which point General Crook preceded them. The prisoners were Geronimo and three other chiefs, twenty-nine warriors, and forty-eight squaws. On the night of March 29th nearly the whole of the Indians made their escape, and at the end of last week had not been recaptured. It is supposed that Geronimo learned in some way that there was little hope of mercy from the Government. General Crook has now been relieved of his command in Arizona at his own request, and he is succeeded by General N. A. Miles, who it is expected will take prompt measures for the capture of the Apaches.

Serious Damage from Floods is Reported from the South and West. The James, the Chattanooga, and the Cumberland have all risen to a dangerous height. In Virginia, Richmond, Danville, and Lynchburg have been the chief sufferers. In Alabama, Birmingham and Montgomery report heavy losses, while Louisville, Ky., and Chattanooga, Tenn., farms are inundated, bridges are swept away, and many families are homeless. At other places there has been much suffering, and it is feared several lives have been lost. A steamer was dispatched from Selma, Ala., to the relief of people who might be in danger in the submerged districts. It returned with about three hundred, principally negroes, picked up from the trees and house-tops. Relief committees are being organized, and efforts made to supply the destitute with clothing and provisions.

The Labor Trouble in the South-west Continued last week in spite of the hopes of a settlement held out on Monday, March 29th. Mr. Powderley, after his conference with Mr. Gould, telegraphed his order for the men to resume work, but later in the day was under the necessity of withdrawing it, owing to a technical difficulty. On Thursday Vice-President Hoxie informed the Knights of Labor that he should not take back the strikers in a body, but only about half of them, and should make selections from any who might apply for work. It was then resolved to resume the strike, and the disappointment of the men rendered their mood a dangerous one. A few trains were run on the Missouri Pacific with new men on Friday, the strikers offering no opposition. They were waiting the action of their National Committee, which was to meet in St. Louis to consider the new phase the difficulty had assumed. The committee, up to the close of the week, was unable to effect an arrangement with Mr. Hoxie. On Saturday morning the first bloodshed occurred. Sheriff Maddox resolved to take a train out of Fort Worth, and he took twenty armed deputies to help him. It was not molested until it arrived two miles out of the city; but there, at the New Orleans crossing, a number of men armed with Winchester rifles were seen near the track awaiting the train. Shots were exchanged in which one deputy sheriff was killed and two seriously wounded. Three of the strikers also are said to be wounded.

The Riotous Belgian Strikers have Accepted a compromise with their employers, and have returned to work with an increase of wages, though not so large as that demanded. On Monday of last week the disturbances reached their culmination in conflicts with the troops in the Charleroi district. Men and women were shot down in the streets, and more than two thousand rioters were taken prisoners and lodged in prison. On Tuesday there was a conference between the miners and their employers which terminated satisfactorily, the men returning to work. The other trades are still menacing, and the Socialists are trying to stir them to fresh outrages, but with less success than they had the previous week. The Herald correspondent, telegraphing from Charleroi, describes the havoc worked by the riots as appalling. He says: "One must go back to the days of the Commune for any approach to a parallel with the reckless violence which has laid waste the great works that were the glory of the industrial enterprise of Belgium. It would have entailed fearful loss to have enforced simply a reign of idleness throughout these districts; but what has been done is far more disastrous—the insanity of idleness passed into the madness of delusion. The cry of 'No more work!' drove willing work people into the streets. Workshops and factories, with all their costly machinery and stores of finished work or work in progress, have been wrecked and their contents have been given up to fire and robbery." The workmen generally were not prominent in the work of destruction. It was done chiefly by Socialists and thieves. This statement is confirmed by a member of the Belgian Government, who said in the Chamber of Deputies that most of the offenders were convicted felons.

A Mass-Meeting to Protest against Granting home rule to Ireland filled the London Guildhall on Friday afternoon. Sir John Lubbock, M.P., the authority on the two subjects of ants and banking, presided. The names of Gladstone and Parnell were heartily hissed by the meeting, and Mr. George Potter, a prominent representative of the workmen, who tried to say a good word for Mr. Gladstone, was hooted down. The meeting is regarded as an indication of the feeling of the middle and upper classes of England on the subject of concession to Ireland. The Pall Mall Gazette, which is usually well informed on political subjects, declares now that the prospects of passing such a measure as will satisfy the Irish are gloomy. Mr. Gladstone's colleagues are pressing him to propose a much more moderate scheme than that he is preparing, but he is resolved to make it comprehensive, even if it results in his own exclusion from office. He has declared that upon this measure he is content to rest his claims to the character of a statesman. Justin McCarthy, the historian, who is one of Mr. Parnell's lieutenants in Parliament, referring to Chamberlain, Hartington, Trevelyan, and other Liberals who have deserted Mr. Gladstone on this question, said: "So far as Ireland is concerned, it does not matter much if only Gladstone shall commit himself and the Liberal policy to a genuine home rule measure. That point reached, on the cause must go, the only question being of a session or two."

The Eastern Question Continues a Source of apprehension in European cabinets. The European correspondent of the New York Times, who has special information, adheres to the opinion he has held throughout the trouble, that it will not be settled without a great war. He cables as follows to his journal: "Nobody on the continent professes any longer to be confident of peace. It seems to be taken for granted everywhere that war is inevitable. The only question is whether it will be the last despairing stand of the small nationalities against the big empires, or a conflict between the Titans themselves. Greece is not so foolish in all this affair as she seems to be. Her actions all have a method in their madness. She counts on uprisings all over the Turkish Empire which will take up so much of the Turkish Army that she can easily whip the rest, and, moreover, she relies on Russian aid. Meanwhile the Russian papers are openly declaring that the Czar's visit to the Crimea means overt action, the first step of which will be the forcible deposition of Prince Alexander of Battenberg. Even more interesting is the fact that the Berlin press is beginning to show its teeth in defence of the Prince, which is held to mean that Germany is preparing to take an active part in the affair as the protector of Bulgaria." France also has refused to join in the coercion of Greece.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $6. From Warner, Ill., $1; Delray, Mich., $1; Dundas, Ont., $4.

A Successful Evangelistic Mission is in Progress in New Orleans conducted by Mr. E. F. Shorey, of the McAuley Water Street Mission of New York, and Mr. E. W. Bliss, of Boston, Mass. Among those who have been blessed during the services and have made a profession of faith in Christ was a former officer of the famous Confederate cruiser the Alabama. He was on board the ship when she was sunk by the Kearsage, and was one of the few survivors of the battle.

Major George A. Hilton's Gospel Temperance services in Philadelphia have resulted in a remarkable revival of the work in that city. Two services were held each day, and the interest deepened and the audiences increased until the closing services of Sunday. On that day four hundred destitute inebriates were gathered to a breakfast at nine in the morning, and much good was done among them. The afternoon meetings formed an interesting feature of the week's work. Wives and mothers came in large numbers for Bible reading, spiritual advice, and prayer.

The Services Conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey at Selma, Ala., have been followed already by the addition of one hundred to the membership of the various churches of the city, and many others are expected to unite. The Rev. P. Gowan, of Selma, in the course of a letter to the Independent, says the services were held in a large cotton warehouse accommodating about three thousand persons, which was fitted up for the occasion. The first meeting was held on Sunday morning at half past eight, when the building was nearly filled with a congregation eager to see and hear these earnest men whom God had so signally used and blessed in His service. Another service was held at 3.30, and another at 7.30 P.M. At these services the building was filled to overflowing, and many had to go away or stand outside and hear what they could through the open door.

An Evangelist's Renunciation of Tobacco has caused some surprise and gratification among his friends. When Sam Jones and Sam Small went to Chicago recently both used tobacco freely. Sam Small abandoned it soon after his arrival, but Sam Jones smoked and chewed as before. On Sunday, March 28th, however, he made these remarks at the service: "Down in my country I have never been in a soul's way that I know of. In a hundred different instances I have been notified that a habit that you are given to is a stumbling-block to souls in this city, and I want to say to this congregation to-night, from this day till we meet up in heaven, you can tell this world that Sam Jones has got no habit that is a stumbling-block to anybody. For your prayers and for your sympathy I am grateful, and if I don't do any good in Chicago, let Chicago thank God Almighty she has done the poor little pale Southern preacher some good for the balance of his life."

Four Good Reasons for a Large Gift to a Young Men's Christian Association were assigned by a citizen of Minneapolis, Minn. Perhaps if other friends will consider them they may be similarly moved, if not to give so large an amount. In a letter which Mr. Hobart O. Hamlin sent to the Association of Minneapolis inclosing a cheque for $10,000, he said: "The gift is tendered because I have lived in St. Anthony and Minneapolis more than thirty years, and feel very much interested in the moral surroundings of the thousands of young men who now reside in the same place and are constantly coming. (2) Because I feel that the time has come when a grand effort should be made to secure a permanent home worthy of the cause and the city. (3) Because I feel confident that a subscription for a large amount will act as a stimulus upon others to heartily co-operate in the enterprise. (4) Because I feel that I can give $10,000 and still do justice to my creditors and family, and I prefer to give it now rather than by bequest after I am dead."

A Thief's Incriminating Plunder Brought a double indictment on him in New York last week. On March 29th a man paid for some drinks in a saloon on Sixth Avenue with a twenty-dollar bill. After he left the place the saloon keeper discovered that the bill was a counterfeit, and sent a policeman to arrest him at the place where he worked. The policeman showed his prisoner the bill when he arrested him, and the man's employer, who was present, remarked that there must be several of them in circulation, for he had one that he had taken some days before. He was asked to produce it for comparison, but when he went to look for it he found that it was missing. Then the prisoner confessed that it was the missing bill which he had stolen. He was therefore arraigned both for passing counterfeit money and for stealing it. At the last it will be found that all Satan's agents have been similarly deceived. The prizes for which they schemed and sinned help to work their ruin (James 5:1-3).

An Unexpected Fortune was Found in a Bible at Greenville, Mich., on April 2d, after being hidden thirty-one years. In 1850 a man left New York and went West, leaving his two little boys in the care of his mother. Five years later he died, and his effects were sent back to New York. The boys were cared for and educated by the grandmother until they were able to provide for themselves. Recently the grandmother died, and some of her personal property was sent to one of her grandsons who resides at Greenville. Among it was an old chest, the contents of which seemed of little value save as family relics. The man, however, examined it last week, and found in it his father's Bible. On turning over the leaves he discovered his father's will and a bond for $40,000, to which he and the children of his brother, who is now dead, are heirs. It may be hoped that the discovery will encourage the heirs to look further into the book. They will find that, valuable as the enclosure was, it is trivial when compared with the inheritance to which they are directed in the body of the work (Ps. 19:8-10).

A Collection at an Execution was Taken up by the condemned criminal at Marten, Texas, on March 31st. The criminal was convicted of murder, and the sentence of death was carried out in the presence of five thousand persons. He appeared unconcerned, and sat on his coffin unmoved while being driven to the place of execution. On the scaffold he confessed his guilt, and acknowledged the justice of his doom. After admonishing his large audience to avoid the pitfalls which brought him to the scaffold, he said he wanted his body to be buried in the adjoining county, and passed his hat around for contributions to defray the expense of transporting his body. He gathered $22, for which he heartily thanked the donors. He took his place on the scaffold, the noose was adjusted, and in a moment the man was launched into eternity. The dispatch is eloquent on the subject of the man's heroism in the face of death. It would seem that he was callous rather than brave. In his situation concern about the destination of his soul not of his body would have been more befitting. But his is a common fault. Thousands of men are careful to secure a plot in a fashionable cemetery for their last resting-place, while they neglect the offer of a mansion in heaven for their souls (Matt. 8:22).

Vaccinating Under Difficulties was the Work done on the Canadian border during the small-pox epidemic by a medical inspector in Maine, who has given a lengthy account of his experience to a reporter of the Lewiston Journal. He was ordered to Lowell's Township, where gangs of railroad men are continually passing through. It was a wild place, twenty-eight miles from a railroad station, and no house near. He took with him two powerful men, a formidable Newfoundland mastiff, rifles, and revolvers,

On his arrival he built a log cabin and constructed a gate across the road. "No man," he says, "went through that gate without being vaccinated." One day he vaccinated eighty-five men. "They rebelled against it," the doctor says, "but we made no talk with them, going through them like a flock of sheep. A burly Scotchman vowed he would pass my station without being vaccinated. He was one of a dozen desperate fellows. I had a pitched battle with him at last, and actually vaccinated him with my foot on his windpipe! Meanwhile my assistant kept off the others with his gun. We stuck the quill into every one of them. He used force generally, and never tried to convince his patients that the operation was necessary to their safety. Had he done so, many of them would doubtless have desisted his warnings, as impenitent sinners despite the warnings of preachers who tell them that unless they are born again they cannot inherit eternal life (II Chron. 36:16).

A Lady's Disappointment with a New saccue was tearfully expressed recently in Boston, Mass. The Record of that city states that a certain very stylish young lady, who drives a good deal, got into a horse car in the exclusive suburb where she lives the other day wearing her new coachman jacket of rather gay red cloth, trimmed effectively with brass buttons. She was going to make a morning call on a friend only a few streets away, and as she wished to show the young lady her new accoutrements, she wore her gay jacket. Scarcely had she seated herself in the car when an eager-voiced old woman sitting near said sociably: "You belong to the Salvation Army, don't you?" The swell young lady was a little startled, but she said "Naow" coldly, and turned a little away from her neighbor. "But you must," persisted the old lady. "Them's Salvation Army clothes!" But the car had by this time reached the block on which the friend resided, and the gayly attired lady alighted and rushed into her friend's house, not to receive her congratulations, but to have a good cry over the impossibility of wearing a garment which gave rise to a humiliating misconception. Perhaps the young lady may yet gain a clearer view of what is humiliating. If not in this life, then beyond the grave she will learn that it was a better thing to be in the service of Christ, with all its humiliations, than to be a devotee of fashion (Luke 9:23, 26).

A Curious Demand on a Physician was made by a deserted husband in New Jersey last week. It appears that the physician, while attending one of his patients, noticed that the woman who was acting as professional nurse in the case was disfigured by a huge wart on her cheek. Apart from the wart the woman's features were attractive. The physician, in pure kindness, offered to remove the ugly excrescence, and the woman consented on being assured that it could be done without danger and without cost. The operation was done quickly and successfully. Her husband alleges that she immediately grew more careful of her attire. Her modest, sombre hued, plain cut garments were laid aside, and she donned more gaudy and fashionable dresses and wraps. The removal of the wart had wrought a great change, and the plain woman became pretty and vain. From that time she became dissatisfied with her home and sought gay company, and at length deserted her husband. The man was exasperated, and attributing his misfortune to the removal of the wart, abused the physician who did it, and demanded that he should atone for the wrong by aiding him personally and with money to discover the fugitive. The kindness seems to have brought misery all round. The most miserable, because of her guilt, is the woman herself. She has found, as others have done before her, that an apparent evil may be a blessing in disguise. It protected her from temptations which she was not able to resist. Many a man who bemoaned his poverty or obscurity or some other calamity has found, when it was removed, that a worse evil has followed (Prov. 30:8, 9).

OUR LORD'S PETITION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth."—JOHN 17: 17.

Jesus Anticipating His Work—His Intercession—
—I. What He Asked—Dedication—Separation——Not to Exceed the Word—What Sanctification Includes—II. For Whom the Prayer was Offered—Not for the World—For the Apostles——Holiness Never Perfect—Essential for Service—
—III. To Whom He Prayed—The Work of God Alone—IV. How Sanctification is Wrought——By the Truth—Not by Dreams and Voices—
—Pretenders who have Revelations—The Truth and the Life.

OUR Lord Jesus prayed much for His people while He was here on earth. He made Peter the special subject of His intercession when He knew that He was in extraordinary danger. The midnight wrestlings of the Son of man were for His people. In the sacred record, however, much more space is taken up by our Lord's intercessions as He nears the end of His labors. After the closing supper, His public preaching work being ended, and nothing remaining to be done but to die, He gave Himself wholly unto prayer. He was not again to instruct the multitude, nor to heal the sick; and in the interval which remained, before He should lay down His life, He girded Himself for special intercession. He poured out His soul in life before He poured it out unto death.

In this wonderful prayer, our Lord, as our great High Priest, appears to enter upon that perpetual office of intercession which He is now exercising at the right hand of the Father. Our Lord ever seemed, in the eagerness of His love, to be

ANTICIPATING HIS WORK.

Before he was set apart for His life-work, by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Him, He must needs be about His Father's business; before He finally suffered at the hands of cruel men, He had a baptism to be baptized with, and He was straitened till it was accomplished; before He actually died, He was covered with a bloody sweat, and was exceeding sorrowful even unto death; and in this case, before He in person entered within the veil, He made intercession for us.

This chapter, which ought to be universally known as the Lord's Prayer, may be called the holy of holies of the word of God. Here we are admitted to that secret place where the Son of God speaks with the Father in closest fellowship of love. Here we look into the heart of Jesus, as He sets out in order His desires and requests before His Father on our behalf. Here inspiration lifts her veil, and we behold truth face to face.

I. At the beginning, then, consider

WHAT HE ASKED.

What is this inestimable blessing which our Saviour so earnestly requests at the Father's hand? He first prays: "Holy Father, keep them;" and again: "Keep them from the evil;" but this negative blessing of preservation from evil is not enough; He seeks for them positive holiness, and therefore He cries, "Sanctify them." The word is one of considerable range of meaning; I am not able to follow it through all its shades, but one or two must suffice.

It means, first, dedicate them to Thy service. The prayer means: "Father, consecrate them to Thine own self; let them be temples for Thine indwelling, instruments for Thy use." This is one part of the meaning of our Lord's prayer. He would have each of us consecrated unto the Lord, designated and ordained for divine purposes. We are not the world's, else might we be ambitious; we are not Satan's, else might we be covetous; we are not our own, else might we be selfish. We are bought with a price, and hence we are His by whom the price is paid. We belong to Jesus, and He presents us to His Father, and begs Him to accept us and sanctify us to His own purposes. Do we not most heartily concur in this dedication?

In addition to this, those who belonged to God, and were dedicated to His service, were set apart and separated from others. The Lord would have those who are dedicated to Him to be separated from the rest of mankind. For this purpose He brought Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, and Israel out of Egypt. "The people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." The Lord saith of His chosen: "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall shew forth My praise." Before long this secret purpose is followed by the open call: "Come out from among them, and be ye separate; touch not the unclean thing; and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters." The Church of Christ is to be a chaste virgin, wholly set apart for the Lord Christ; His own words concerning His people are these: "They are not of the world, even as I am

NOT OF THE WORLD."

Those who are sanctified in this sense have ceased to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers; they have ceased to run with the multitude to do evil; they are not conformed to this present evil world; they are strangers and pilgrims upon the earth. The more assuredly this is true of them the better. There are some, in these apostate days, who think that the Church cannot do better than to come down to the world to learn her ways, follow her maxims, and acquire her "culture." In fact, the notion is that the world is to be conquered by our conformity to it. This is as contrary to Scripture as the light is to the darkness. The more distinct the line between him that feareth God and him that feareth Him not, the better all round.

Put these two things together, dedication to God and separation unto Him, and you are nearing the meaning of the prayer. But, mark you, it is not all separation that is meant; for there are some who "separate themselves," and yet are sensual, not having the Spirit. Separation for separation's sake savors rather of Babel than of Jerusalem. It is one thing to separate from the world, and another thing to be separate from the Church. Where we believe that there is living faith in Jesus, and the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, we are not called to division, but to unity. For actual and manifest sin we must separate ourselves from offenders; but we err if we carry on this separation where it is not authorized by the Word of God. We are to be faithful to truth; but we are not to be of a contentious spirit, separating ourselves from those who are living members of the one and indivisible body of Christ. To promote the unity of the Church by creating new divisions is not wise.

HOOLINESS.

At the same time, this word "sanctification" means what is commonly understood by it—namely, the making of the people of God holy. "Sanctify them"—that is, work in them a pure and holy character. "Lord, make Thy people holy," should be our daily prayer. I want you to notice that this word here used in the Greek is not that which is rendered "Purify;" but it has another shade of meaning. Had it meant "purify," it would hardly have been used in reference to our Lord as it is in the next verse.

It has a higher meaning than that. Oh, brethren, if you are called Christians, there must be no room for doubt as to the fact that you are purged from the common sins and ordinary transgressions of mankind, else are you manifestly liars unto God, and deceivers of your own souls! They that are not moral, they that are not honest, they that are not kind, they that are not truthful, are far from the kingdom. How can these be the children of God who are not even decent children of men? Thus we judge, and rightly judge, that the life of God cannot be in that man's soul who abides wilfully in any known sin, and takes pleasure therein. No; purification is not all. We will take it for granted that you who profess to be Christians have escaped from the foul pollution of lust and falsehood; if you have not done so, humble yourselves before God, and be ashamed; for you need the very beginnings of grace. "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh."

But sanctification is something more than mere morality and respectability; it is not only deliverance from the common sins of men, but also from the hardness, deadness, and carnality of nature; it is deliverance from that which is of the flesh at its very best, and admittance into that which is spiritual and divine.

Children of God should exhibit the love of God, they should be filled with zeal for His glory, they should live generous, unselfish lives, they should walk with God, and commune with the Most High. Ours should be a purpose and an aim far higher than the best of the unregenerate can understand. We ought to reach unto a life and a kingdom of which the mass of mankind know nothing, and care less.

II. Now I want you to notice, in the second place, this prayer was offered. It was not offered for the world outside. It would not be a suitable prayer for those who are dead in sin. Our Lord referred to the company of men and women who were already saved, of whom He said that they had kept God's Word: "Thine they were, and Thou gavest them me." They were therefore sanctified already in the sense of being consecrated and set apart for holy purposes; and they were also sanctified in a measure already in the sense of being made holy in character; for the immediate disciples of our Lord, with all their errors and deficiencies, were holy men. It was for the apostles that Jesus thus prayed; so that we may be sure that the most eminent saints need still to have this prayer offered for them: "Sanctify them through Thy truth."

WORK OF A LIFETIME.

These chosen ones were sanctified, but only to a degree. Justification is perfect the moment it is received; but sanctification is a matter of growth. He that is justified is justified once for all by the perfect work of Jesus; but he that is sanctified by Christ Jesus must grow up in all things into Him who is the Head. To make us holy is a life work, and for it we should seek the divine operation every hour; for "He that hath wrought us for the self-same thing is God." We would rise to the utmost pitch of holy living, and never content ourselves with present attainments. Those who are most pure and honorable have yet their shortcomings and errors to mourn over. Oh, ye sanctified ones, it is for you that Jesus prays that the Father may still sanctify you!

I want you to notice more particularly that these believers for whom our Lord prayed were to be the preachers and teachers of their own and succeeding generations. These were the handful of seed-corn out of which would grow the Church of the future, whose harvest would gladden all lands. To prepare them to be sent out as Christ's missionaries they must be sanctified. How shall a holy God send out unholy messengers? An unsanctified minister is an un-sent minister. An unholy missionary is a pest to the tribe he visits; an unholy teacher in a school is an injury rather than a blessing to the class he conducts. Holiness is an essential qualification to a man's fitness for being used of the Lord God for the extension of His kingdom; hence our Lord's prayer for His apostles and other workers: "Holy Father, sanctify them."

Furthermore, our Lord Jesus Christ was about to pray "that they all might be one;" and for this desirable result holiness is needed. Moreover, our Lord finished His most comprehensive prayer by a petition that we might all be with Him—with Him where He is, that we may behold His glory. Full sanctification is essential to this. Shall the unsanctified dwell with Christ in heaven? Shall unholy eyes behold His glory? It cannot be. How can we participate in the splendor and triumphs of the exalted Head if we are not members of His body? and how can a holy head have impure and dishonest members? No, brethren, we must be holy, for Christ is holy.

III. I am compelled by shortness of time to be brief upon each point; but I must dwell for a little upon the third subject of consideration, which is this—this prayer is directed. "Sanctify them through Thy truth." No one can sanctify a soul but Almighty God, the great Father of spirits. Beloved, this sanctification is a work of God from its earliest stage. We go astray of ourselves, but we never return to the great Shepherd apart from His divine drawings. Regeneration, in which sanctification begins, is wholly the work of the Spirit of God. Our first discovery of wrong, and our first pang of penitence, are the work of divine grace. Every thought of holiness, and every desire after purity, must come from the Lord alone, for we are by nature wedded to iniquity. See, then, what a great thing sanctification is, and how necessary it is that our Lord should pray unto His Father: "Sanctify them through Thy truth."

NOT BY TRUTH.

The truth alone will not sanctify a man. We may maintain an orthodox creed, and it is highly important that we should do so; but if it does not touch our heart and influence our character, what is the value of our orthodoxy? It is not the doctrine which of itself sanctifies, but the Father sanctifies by means of the doctrine. The truth is the element in which we are made to live in order to holiness. Every work of the Spirit of God upon the new nature aims at the purification, the consecration, the perfecting of those whom God in love has taken to be His own. Yea, more; all the events of Providence around us work toward that one end; for this our joys and our sorrows, for this our pains of body and griefs of heart, for this our losses and our crosses—all these are sacred medicines by which we are cured of the disease of nature, and prepared for the enjoyment of perfect spiritual health. We are being educated for the skies, meetened for the assembly of the perfect.

Thus I have reminded you that the prayer for sanctification is offered to the divine Father, and this leads us to look out of ourselves and wholly to our God. Do not set about the work of sanctification yourselves, as if you could perform it alone. Do not imagine that holiness will necessarily follow because you listen to an earnest preacher, or unite in sacred worship. My brethren, God Himself must work within you; the Holy Ghost must inhabit you; and this can only come to you by faith in the Lord Jesus. Believe in Him for your sanctification, even as you have believed for your pardon and justification. He alone can bestow sanctification upon you; for this is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

HOW IT IS WROUGHT.

IV. This is a great subject, and I have but short time; so I have, in the last place, to notice with much brevity how sanctification is to be wrought in believers. "Sanctify them through Thy truth; Thy word is truth." Beloved, observe how God has joined holiness and truth together. There has been a tendency of late to divide truth of doctrine from truth of precept. Men say that Christianity is a life and not a creed; this is a part truth, and very near akin to a lie. Christianity is a life which grows out of truth. Jesus Christ is the way and the truth as well as the life, and He is not properly received except He is accepted in that threefold character.

No holy life will be produced in us by the belief of falsehood. Sanctification in visible character comes out of edification in the inner faith of the heart, or otherwise it is a mere shell. Good works are the fruit of true faith, and true faith is a sincere belief of the truth. Every truth leads toward holiness; every error of doctrine, directly or indirectly, leads to sin. A twist of the understanding will inevitably bring a contortion of the life sooner or later. Error may puff you up, it may even make you think that you are sanctified; but there is a very serious difference between boasting of sanctification and being sanctified, and a very grave difference between setting up to be superior to others and being really accepted before God. Believe me, God works sanctification in us by the truth, and by nothing else.

But what is the truth? There is the point. Is the truth that which I imagine to be revealed to me by some private communication? Am I to fancy that I enjoy some special revelation, and am I to order my life by voices, dreams, and impressions? Brethren, fall not into this common delusion. God's Word to us is in Holy Scripture. All the truth that sanctifies men is in God's Word. Do not listen to those who cry: "Lo here!" and "Lo there!" I am plucked by the sleeve almost every day by crazy persons and

PRETENDERS WHO HAVE REVELATIONS.

One man tells me that God has sent a message to me by him; and I reply: "No, sir, the Lord knows where I dwell, and He is so near to me that He would not need to send to me by you." Another man announces in God's name a dogma which, on the face of it, is a lie against the Holy Ghost. He says the Spirit of God told him so and so; but we know that the Holy Ghost never contradicts Himself. If your imaginary revelation is not according to this Word, it has no weight with us; and if it is according to this Word, it is no new thing. There will be no more revelations; no more are needed. The canon is fixed and complete, and he that adds to it shall have added to him the plagues that are written in this Book. What need of more when here is enough for every practical purpose? "Sanctify them through Thy truth; Thy word is truth."

Learn, then, my brothers, how earnestly you ought to search the Scriptures! See, my sisters, how studiously you should read this Book of God! If this is the truth, and the truth with which God sanctifies us, let us learn it, hold it, and stand fast in it. To Him that gave us the Book let us pledge ourselves never to depart from His testimonies. To us, at any rate, God's Word is truth. "But they argue differently in the schools!" Let them argue. "But oratory with its flowery speech speaketh otherwise!" Let it speak; words are but air, and tongues but clay. O God, "Thy word is truth." "But philosophers have contradicted it!" Let them contradict it. Who are they? God's Word is truth; we will go no farther while the world stands.

But, then, let us be equally firm in our conviction that we do not know the truth aright unless it makes us holy. We do not hold truth in a true way unless it leads us to a true life. If you use the back of a knife it will not cut; truth hath its handle and its blade; see that you use it properly. You can make pure water kill a man; you must use every good thing aright or it will not be good. The truth, when fully used, will daily destroy sin, nourish grace, suggest noble desires, and urge to holy acts.

INCONSISTENCIES.

The one point of failure to be most deeply regretted would be a failure in the holiness of our church-members. If you yourselves act as others do, what witness do you bear? If your families are not graciously ordered; if your business is not conducted upon principles of the strictest integrity; if your speech is questionable as to purity or truthfulness; if your lives are open to serious rebuke—how can God accept you or send a blessing on the church to which you belong? It is all falsehood and deceit to talk about your being the people of God when even men of the world shame you. Do not come to me with your experiences, and your convictions, and your professions, unless you sanctify the name of God in your lives. Oh, brethren, we had better quit our professions if we do not live up to them!

Nothing is truth to me but this one Book, this infallibly inspired writing of the Spirit of God. It is incumbent upon us to show the hallowed influence of this Book. The vows of God are on us, that by our godly lives we should show forth His praises who has brought us out of darkness into His marvellous light. This Bible is our treasure. We prize each leaf of it. Let us bind it in the best fashion, in the best morocco of a clear, intelligent faith; then let us put a golden clasp upon it, and gild its edges by a life of love, and truth, and purity, and zeal. Thus shall we commend the volume to those who have never looked within its pages. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

PULPIT AIDS.

Good speeches, apt illustrations, and suggestive passages from the productions of eminent men are collected in this volume, as an aid to preachers and platform speakers. They are arranged under the headings of: Home Work, Foreign Missions, Bible Distribution, Temperance, and Miscellaneous, and are thus convenient for reference. Turning to any one of these groups something bright and suggestive is found which without plagiarism may be used in the production of speech or sermon. Among the speakers quoted are: Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, Archbishop Tait, Archdeacon Farrar, Canon Fleming, Dr. R. W. Dale, Dr. Parker, Dr. Punshon, Canon Tristram, and Newman Hall. Though specially designed as a help to speakers, the volume, full of bright sayings and original thoughts, will be read and enjoyed by Christian people who do not appear on platform or in pulpit. CHILDREN'S STORIES in American History, by Henrietta Christian Wright, will be a welcome present to intelligent little boys and girls. It contains sketches of thrilling events in the history of our country which cannot fail to interest them: "Is it true?" the ingenuous child often asks, as he listens to the close of some story, and it is evident that his enjoyment of it is enhanced when he can receive the assurance that it is true. These stories have that merit, and, while they are instructive, and prepare the child's mind for historical study, the style is so sprightly that they arrest and hold the attention like a fairy story. The Story of the Huguenots is one of the best of the collection, and it impresses the young reader with the value of a religion for which the brave men and women were ready to make so great sacrifices. Then there is the beautiful story of Pocahontas, and the story of Sir Walter Raleigh, and the Settlement of New England, and the story of Henry Hudson and the Knickerbockers, and many others which are jewels in history, and with which the children ought to be familiar.

The style of the book may be perceived through one extract from the story of the Red Men, in which the author endeavors to explain the Indian myths. It is the story of The Morning Star: "The Indian mothers would tell their children the story of Wabun, the East Wind, who brought the morning to the earth, and chased away the darkness with his silver arrows, whose cheeks were crimson with the sunrise, and whose voice awoke the deer and the hunter; and yet, although the birds sang to him, and the flowers sent up their perfume to greet him, and though the forests and rivers sang and shouted at his coming, still he was not happy, for he was alone in heaven. But one morning while the villages were still sleeping, and the fog lay on the rivers, Wabun looking downward saw a beautiful maiden walking all alone in a meadow, gathering water-lilies and rushes. And each day after that the first thing he saw was the maiden's eyes, which looked like two blue lakes among the rushes, and he loved the beautiful maiden, and wooed her with the sunshine of his smile and whispered to her in the gentle breezes which sang through the trees, and at last he drew her to him and changed her to a star, and then he was no longer sad, but happy, for he was no longer alone in heaven, but with him was his bride, the beautiful Wabun-Annung, the Morning Star." With an education like this it is easy to understand how the little Indian child when he grew up gave quaint poetic names to places which still bear those names.

In this way the author renders her readers familiar with the habits and customs of the people who at successive periods made their homes in our land. In the final chapter with simple eloquence she tells the story of the War for Independence and the causes which led the patriots reluctantly to sever their connection with England and to lay down their lives for freedom. Numerous excellent illustrations add to the value of the book. Pp. 356; price $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

AN INFIDEL EXPERIMENT

and its results are described in the current number of Christian Thought, the excellent bi-monthly magazine edited by the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., published at 71 Bible House, New York. The experiment referred to was commenced in 1881 in Barton County, Mo. A party of atheists secured land there and founded a city. They gave it the name of "Liberal," and announced that it would be "a demonstration of what man could do for himself without the superstitions of religion." They proposed to show the world that Christianity was nothing but a fable; that people could live and prosper without it; that churches, and ministers, and Sabbath-days, and religious observances were all a humbug. Five years have passed, and the results may be seen. Perhaps the infidels are satisfied with them, but the principles on which the city was founded do not seem to have worked exactly as we were led to expect. There is no school-house in the city. The children are taught in rented buildings, and in an edifice about the size of and much like a smoke-house, which bears the title of "Universal Mental Liberty Hall." The most imposing building in the city is worth $3000, and the majority cost less than $1000. Quarrels and dissensions abound, liquor is sold without stint, profane language is heard everywhere, not only from men, but women, boys, and girls, and the grossest forms of social immorality prevail. That is the condition of Liberal after five years' experience. Founded in a spirit of bravado and defiance of God, it is like hell upon earth.

Beside this article from which we have quoted, Christian Thought contains articles by Dr. Washington Gladden, Dr. Thomas A. Hoyt, etc.

THE SHOEBLACK'S CONTRIBUTION.

AN interesting incident is recorded in connection with the first experiment of a Hospital Saturday collection. It occurred in Birmingham, England, the town which has also the honor of establishing Hospital Sunday. Collections were taken up in the various factories, and several young ladies consented to superintend the collections at places frequented by the men where permission was given for a box to be placed. At one of these two shoeblacks presented themselves. The fraternity, like other trades, is not so well paid in England as here. Five cents for a shine and ten cents for an extra fine polish would be considered an imposition across the Atlantic. One penny, value two cents, is the standard price, so the shoeblacks before the box could easily reckon how much time and labor every penny they gave represented.

"I am going to give 'em a penny, Joe," said the elder. "What are you goin' to do?"

"I've got a tanner," said Joe, producing a bright new silver coin worth six pennies, or twelve cents, for which tanner is the slang name. "I'm goin' to give it."

"No; ain't that all you've got?"

"Yes, but I've got plenty of blacking; I sha'n't want to buy any more yet awhile."

"You're silly to give all that. What's the use? There's lots o' folks to give. Give 'em a penny like me. That's enough for us chaps."

"Ah! you ain't been in hospital, Bill. 'Tain't to be expected o' you. Wait till you've been laid up like me, and had the doctor put you right, and the nurses a-waiting on you as if you was a lord, and asking you how you feel, and saying they're sorry for you, and giving you water when you're thirsty, and nice things when you're gettin' well, and reading to you, and all that; you'd feel different then. You'd be ready to give a bob (twenty-five cents) if you'd got it."

The sixpence went into the box, and the boys went away to look after business. The lady who sat listening to the conversation thought of an event that took place centuries before in a city far away, when He who read all hearts and will judge all conduct declared that a widow who dropped two mites into the treasury gave more than the ostentatious rich men who cast in large gifts. Like those two mites, the boy's sixpence was a gift that meant much.

"Do you know what I have just heard?" asked Mrs. Neely, setting down her water-can beside the well at the head of the village street. She addressed Jamie Miller, an old man, tall and lean, but with alert, bright eyes that showed his mind was still active.

"No," said he; "how can I know that; I cannot guess."

"Well," said Mrs. Neely, "I've been told as Mary Fleming has been 'sent for.'"

"Do you tell me so? Weel, dear, it'll be for good." Jamie Miller's face shone with gentle benevolence, and the words that were oftenest upon his lips were those he had used just now: "It'll be for good."

The conversation took place beside the moss-covered stones that surrounded the old well, in view of the women at their doors, and the children playing, and the lively stir near the corn-mill.

Mrs. Neely was not at all pleased with the way in which she considered what was a piece of bad news was received, and replied somewhat angrily: "An' what for do you be sayin' the like of that, Jamie Miller? Sure Mary's a girl that has aye been useful in the town, an' what for do you say it'll be for good if she goes awa'?"

Just then the rector appeared, turning the corner so quickly that he was close to the well before she had finished speaking. "Who is that that is going away, Mrs. Neely?" he asked, with a smile.

"Mary Fleming, sir, and here's Jamie saying it'll be for good. He don't know how we'll all miss the handiest girl in the village."

"I agree with you both," said the rector. "Mary Fleming will be a very great loss to the village at large. We shall all miss her; her neighbors because she is unselfish and helpful;

I, because she is my best pupil, the best singer in the choir, and an example to all the other young girls in the parish. But I agree with Jamie, too. Mary is God's servant. I hope and believe, therefore, that whatever happens to her will be for good. You know that all things work together for good to them that love God.

Mrs. Neely did not care for the turn that the conversation had taken; she could not stop Mr. Stuart as she stopped Jamie, but she dropped him her curtsey, saying, somewhat snappishly, that she must hasten to look after her husband's supper, and was gone.

As Mr. Stuart and Jamie remained talking together by the old well a very pleasant sight suddenly appeared in the street—a comely young girl, clean, with pretty brown hair carefully arranged, and a calico dress, much worn and patched, but washed and ironed by her own hands. This was Mary Fleming, the cause of the foregoing lamentations and eulogiums—Mary, the rector's favorite pupil, the villagers' generous and ready helper, and her mother's right hand and stay. Her approach was greeted by women and children on both sides of the street. "Mary, dear, maybe you'd fetch me a goo' water," pleaded Ellie Brown; "the pains is that bad the night I can hardly move." "To be sure I will, Ellie; give me your can," was the cheerful response.

Smiling more brightly than usual, she at last reached the well. "Good evening, sir," she said. "Good evening, Mary. I hear that you are 'sent for.'" "Ay, sir, my passage money's come, an' I'm to sail on the fifteenth of next month, if I am ready. Our Joe is sending for me; he's in very good work in America, an' he says I needna do a hand's turn unless I like, for he can keep me like a lady." "Why, Mary, that will be a strange life for you, who are always working hard for somebody. Do you enjoy the thought of idleness?" "No indeed, sir; I think I'll have to put my hand to something. The likes of me isn't fit to be a lady;" and she laughed a cheery little laugh, whose musical ripple sounded like the distant chiming of silver bells.

"Well, Mary," said the rector, "we shall all miss you, but we shall be glad if you will be happier there. You will ask the Lord to guide you, and then, as Jamie says, it'll be for good."

With a smile and kind nod Mr. Stuart passed on, and as Mary filled Ellie's water-can, tears coursed quickly down her cheeks. But before she set the table for supper that evening she was as bright as ever. To see the world! To be with her dear brother! The thought of change was delightful to a girl of twenty, strong and energetic as she was. She sang hymns as usual while she mended the children's clothes by the light of her tallow candle, and her heart was running over with joy and gratitude to God.

But it was not unalloyed joy, for Mary learned, now that the time for which she once longed was actually near, that she would be leaving a vacant place behind which would not be easily filled. How many of these poor people would miss her! How they loved her! She did not know it before. Now she saw that her going would bring a shadow on many homes, and would render many a hard lot a little harder.

Mary saw things in a new light. She would like to go to America, but what was her duty? Her life would be easier for the change, but could she do as much good in her new sphere? Mary spent a long time in prayer that night, and in the morning she announced her resolve to stay at home. It was a sacrifice of her inclinations that cost a pang, but she entered into a life of consecrated service which, wherever spent, always brings joys attainable by no other course.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

On the Whaler.

SCARCELY had the first bar of golden light streaked the eastern horizon, when across that bar a dark object was visible on the sea. Juliet sprang up to a standing position on her heaving raft. Yes, instead of the floating ice, which had almost disappeared during the night, Juliet saw more and more distinctly a sail, and a mast above it. Some vessel was on the sea, and not very far off, but much too far for her voice to reach whoever might be on board.

Yet Juliet did call, shriek, implore! Raising herself as high as possible, she waved first her handkerchief, then her hat, hope and fear alternating, till suspense became actual torture. Could the men in the vessel see her? if they saw her, would they turn out of their course to help? Surely the craft, whatever it was, was coming nearer. Juliet could distinguish that it was of a different shape altogether from the passenger steamer in which she had been crossing the Atlantic; it marked the sky with no long line of smoke; it carried more sails, and seemed to be of far more clumsy build than the ill-fated Quebec.

Yes, it was coming nearer; little black objects that must be men stood out distinct against the flushed sky. Juliet cried out till her voice became hoarse with calling, and then faintly said: "Oh, why does the vessel come so slowly; I shall die before it reach me! Surely they are making preparations to launch a boat! The man on the prow is waving something! Yes, I am saved—I am saved!" a gush of tears came, and with tears something like a burst of thanksgiving.

The castaway had indeed been seen, and the Norwegian fishing-vessel, for such it was, was slowly approaching the raft. The Bergen was an unsightly-looking craft, black in hull, with sails smoke-colored and pitched; in appearance it would not have gained much by comparison with any other kind of vessel, except perhaps a coal-barge. But even a coal-barge would have been welcomed then by the refined young lady as a blessed ark of safety.

The sound of the oars of the boat put out and the rude shout sent across the water by voices anything but harmonious were far pleasanter than any strain of music had ever been to the ear of Juliet Erle. Help came not an hour too early, for endurance had been strained to the utmost. A cold night spent on an open raft, in garments thoroughly soaked, intense anxiety, overpowering anguish, had been almost more than even Juliet's young, vigorous constitution could bear. She was in a nearly fainting state when first taken into the boat, and then from it lifted up the side of the vessel. There was some consciousness, indeed, that rough, coarse-looking men were about her, with a good deal of hair on their faces, and some on their hard, sunburnt hands; she was sensible that the deck on which she was placed was so dirty that she would not, without necessity, have placed her foot upon it. Then deck, cordage, sails, men—all seemed to swim around her, and she fainted away.

Had Juliet retained her consciousness, she would have understood nothing of the remarks made by the Norwegian fishermen who had picked her up from the sea.

"I say, Karl, here's a strange haul! we was a-looking for grampus, and we've hooked a mermaid!" quoth the captain, a big, bony, broad-shouldered man, with skin burnt almost to the color of mahogany, save the bit of forehead protected by his oil-skin cap. A broad grin was on his coarse features as he spoke.

"What are we to make of our haul? She's a dainty kind of fish, I take it, and not accustomed to a rough shell like this," observed Karl.

"She shall have my cabin to herself," quoth Captain Logbrog. "Poor child! she's wringing wet, and all in a swoon. Karl, just put this gray shawl afore the fire and give it a warming; I must manage to get off this here jacket. Gently, gently;" he drew Juliet's arms from the fur sleeves, and stared in surprise at what appeared to him the very extraordinary dress beneath the jacket—pink silk, with short sleeves, and trimmed with puffings and lace.

"To think of putting to sea in such fancy foolery as that!" he exclaimed. "If we warn't so far from land, I'd guess she'd escaped from some lunatic asylum."

"She's a-dying," said one of the sailors; "she won't trouble us long."

"Dying—not a bit of it; she's merely in a bit of a faint. Just you get a drop of warm grog, while I carry her down to my den; it will bring her round in a twinkling!" and lifting the poor girl in his strong arms, as if she had been a baby, Captain Logbrog carried Juliet down to the cabin which, with rude gallantry, he had given up to his most unexpected guest.

Jollof, the oldest sailor on board, with a face seamed with wrinkles, shook his face ominously as he observed, "It's unlucky, mighty unlucky; it happens, too, on a Friday; not a seal shall we catch."

"What dost mean, old salt?" asked one of the sailors.

"She's no canny," was the reply; "girls of flesh and blood don't go sailing alone over the salt seas like a nautilus. I don't like the look o' the thing."

"She looks harmless as a drowned lamb," said his messmate, "not a bit like a witch!"

"Dost think she wears for nothing all these gimcracks dangling from her chain—a pair of bellows, and a fish among them! Just mark my words—while she stays aboard not a narwhal or seal will we catch."

When Juliet revived from her swoon, she found herself in a small dark cabin, with a big Norwegian pouring something fiery into her mouth.

The poor girl had been treated with real though rough hospitality; the burly captain of the vessel, having given up his cabin, would have to share the yet narrower quarters of the men. He administered warm grog to the fainting lady as what he himself considered the great specific for every ill. But it was not in Juliet's case so effectual as he had expected. For days she lay prostrated by a violent attack of illness caught by exposure. For a few hours her senses were lost, and she surprised the sailors by wildly singing, "'Tis to-morrow!" ending with hysterical cries. This seemed to old Jollof confirmatory of his suspicions. "She's a-raising the wind," he muttered, and then would relate some of the wild legends of the north, where old superstitions still linger, till some of his more credulous shipmates were half convinced that they had better have left their strange mermaid to float on the sea. Captain Logbrog, however, only laughed at Jollof and his old wives' tales.

When Juliet's fever passed away it left pain, weakness, and depression behind. Her sufferings may be best described in her own words. Juliet had found in the captain's cabin writing materials of a rude kind; an oil-stained, ink-bespattered low shelf had served the honest seaman for a desk, and a dirty ink-bottle had been screwed down into a hole in the wood beyond risk of upsetting by the vessel's rolling. A supply of coarse paper, unlike any that had hitherto been pressed by Juliet's pen, was to her now a real prize. Leave to use these writing materials, asked by signs, was nodded with a good-natured smile, which made the captain's unshaven lips almost extend from ear to ear. Accepting this as permission, she spent much of her time in writing a journal. Here are some of the entries made there:

"I wonder how many days have passed since that fearful, fearful night! I have lost all account of time. I think that I must have been very ill. I have still such weakness and pain that I cannot crawl up the ladder to the deck, though I am almost stifled in this hole. It is not much larger than a dog-kennel, and the thick bull's eye which alone admits the light serves but to make 'darkness visible.' I can scarcely see to guide my pen.

"I hear everything through the partition; the laughing; jesting, sometimes quarrelling, and the boisterous songs at night; but what I hear I cannot understand. Not a word of these men's language do I know, and they know not a word of mine. I have tried—oh, how desperately have I tried!—to make the bull-headed captain understand that I would give one, two, three hundred pounds, half my fortune, to be taken to some English or American port. I have spoken in English, French, Italian—in vain. He only answers by that broad grin which tries my patience, I feel so little disposed to smile. I think that the captain regards me simply as a petulant child.

"Oh, the smells, and then the uncatchable food!

Salt junk, and stale biscuits as hard as a rock, and water whose very scent makes me feel sick, with the nauseous, fiery grog! I think that I shall die of starvation and thirst in this horrible den!

"If that angel—whom I never shall cease to mourn—had been here, could she have been calm and contented? Would she have found even here the sweet manna of which she spoke, or would she have murmured as I murmur, despaired as I now despair? Oh, Maria Selden would never have murmured; she would, through all, have felt the Father's hand, and looked up, and said: 'My Saviour!' How utterly unlike her am I!

"Some say that trials bring us nearer to God; it is not the case with me. I feel a hundred times more wicked than ever I was before—in-deed, I never before thought myself wicked at all. I had a better temper than either of my sisters, was not so fickle as Gertie, was a general favorite with my companions. I thought that I had no very serious faults. But now there has arisen within me such a spirit of fierce rebellion that I am frightened at my own state of mind. I do not feel a gentle hand, but an iron grasp; I am simply crushed beneath it.

"I say in my rebellious heart, Why was Maria taken away, she so good, so pious and gentle, a blessing to so many? Why was she drowned in the sea? And why am I bereft of everything, cast down to the very dust? I do not believe that a God who is really love—O Lord, forgive the wicked thoughts that rise in my soul, and have almost been put down by my pen! Shall I tear up this paper? No, no; the evil lies deeper, in the very roots of my heart. I am a sinful, miserable wretch! God have mercy upon me!

"August 1.—I put down my date by guess-work; I do not know the real time. I managed to climb up the ladder to-day. It was such a relief to breathe the fresh air again, to look at the sun! The sailors, after the first stare, and what I suppose were meant for inquiries after my health, take little notice of me, except one strange wrinkled old man, who watches my movements with suspicion, as if he thought that I might carry off some pulley or bolt. I am able to sit on a greasy coil of rope, the only seat, and look around, and inhale the cool sea-breeze. I wonder whither we are going. Northward, to judge by the position of the sun, and the cold which increases, though the sun is hot in the middle of the day. Certainly we are not going toward England. More vain attempts to make myself understood. At night greatly troubled by rats. I am sure that they swarm in the vessel.

"August 2.—I have managed to learn the names of a few things which I can point to, or touch, such as rope, harpoon, and whale; I think that I must be in a whaling-vessel, so eager were the seamen at the sight of a spouting in the distance; they were keen as sportsmen following the deer. I believe that we have changed our course, and that we are in pursuit of something. I should like to see a whale caught; it would make an exciting break in this intolerably monotonous and irksome life. Our fare to-day has been varied by some fresh fish, a pleasant change from the tough salt junk. The old man (I heard him called Jollof) looks a trifle more gracious.

"August 3.—I do wish that I had a Bible! To-day there was hail, so I could not keep on deck. I was sorely in want of a book. I tried how many verses from Scripture I could remember. I can hardly repeat one correctly. That which comes most readily into my mind is, 'She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth;' I remember it, for it was the text of a sermon preached on my twentieth birthday. I thought it a very hard saying, and so did Gertie; her mother was quite angry with the preacher for his excessively uncharitable views. We were living in pleasure, for nothing but pleasure. Was I dead then? am I dead now? Were I so, should I feel this gnawing pain at my heart?

Oh, if I had but Maria beside me! She had the Bible in her memory, treasured up in her soul. What a help she would have been to me now!

"One of my troubles, and not a light one, is the impossibility of changing my dress. I look with actual aversion on the stained faded finery which I am compelled to wear; it is only fit for a May-queen! Can my feelings at all resemble those of some poor old votary of the world, grown gray in folly, forced to remain in a round of insipid amusements from sheer inability to change the habits of a life; clinging to what disgusts her because she has nothing besides! I think of my Maria's question: 'Would you like to lead such a life for a hundred years?' Oh, how wearisome, how almost loathsome all my vanities would be then!

"I remember how eager I was for this very pink dress to come home from the mantua-maker's; how impatient I was, how angry lest it should not be ready for the grand Sunday dinner on my birthday. I sent message after message, and it came, just as I was returning from church, after hearing that terrible sermon. Heartless as I was, I remember the feeling of pain given me by the sight of the pale hollow cheeks and sunken eyes of the young seamstress who brought the dress home. She said that she had sat up all night to finish the work; and I—even I—had a twinge of conscience; I had robbed the sick girl both of her night and her Sunday's rest, and sorely she needed them both. But other thoughts soon drove these regretful thoughts away; it is only now, in my solitude, that I remember my folly, my sin! Will memory thus awake in another world? and if so, what torment it will bring!

"August 4.—We have had an exciting day! Our sailors sighted a herd of walrus, and with what eagerness they prepared for the attack! I had never seen these huge sea-horses before, except in pictures, and watched preparations with curiosity and interest. A boat of peculiar form, bow-shaped at both ends, was rapidly let down into the water; five strong fellows, the captain among them, swung themselves down into her, and then plied their oars with furious energy, rowing toward the herd. All the rest of the men, except the steersman, watched them from the deck or shrouds, like eager spectators at a boat-race. This was a more dangerous affair than any match. I noticed in the boat four or five immense lances, such as are used in this war with the monsters of the deep.

"I could see little but the heads of the walrus above the water; but what strange heads they were, almost like monstrous caricatures of the human face, with thick bristles above the mouth, and enormous tusks pointed downward; formidable weapons they appeared!

"When the herd was reached, oh, what a savage battle ensued! I shall never forget the spearing, thrusting, the apparent efforts of the wounded and desperate animals to board the boat, or swamp it, the splashing in the waves, the loud cries and shouts of the men on deck to encourage their comrades! I know now how spectators must feel who look on at a bull-fight. A sensation of horror mingled with excitement, as the waters around the boat grew reddened with blood! The poor sea-horses, strong and fierce as they were, had a bad chance in their struggle with man. Three walrus were killed, the others dived, and disappeared from my view. The short, sharp battle was over, and loud were the shouts of the sailors!

"Another boat, but of different shape, was let down to help to bring in the prizes, while rapid preparations were made on deck to construct a sort of rough, strong platform, the use of which I did not at first understand. I understood it too soon! The poor walrus has not only to be killed, but skinned, and the blubber removed. The creatures, dragged in by the boats, were hoisted up by a crane to the platform. Two men, clad from head to foot in oil-skin, appeared, armed with large knives. As soon as I saw what work was in hand, down I fled to my cabin, utterly sickened. The ship, which was in a sufficiently repulsive state before, has become a floating reservoir of blubber; such is the state of the deck that I dread to set foot upon it!

"What a life these hardy fishermen lead! yet to them it is not without its joys. The men are evidently in high spirits at their capture; to them blubber means gold. What a gulf separates one class of human beings from another! But Maria bridged it over with Christian love. She would have taken an interest even in these men. She would have spoken of them as she did of the emigrants on board the Quebec, whom to my astonishment she visited in their gloomy quarters below. "They are my brethren and sisters," she said; "there is not one among them for whom a crown of life may not be prepared. Why should I shrink from the company below of those with whom I may spend eternity above?" I remember shrugging my shoulders, and inwardly wondering at a lady's low tastes. O Maria, Maria, you low—you who were as much above me as the white cloud is above the tossing billow!"

THE FIRST MIRACLE.

S. S. Lesson for April 18, John 2: 1-11. Golden Text, ver. 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Mary not an Ascetic—Marriages to which Jesus is Called—Marriages of Expediency—Mary's Impatience—Waiting the Lord's Time—The Opening of the Door—A Safe Rule—The Filled Water-pots—Human Rules Reversed—The Water Brought to God—His Transforming Work—The Purification of the Temple.

THE third day after John had proclaimed Jesus to be the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee, and the mother of Jesus was there. Some have pictured Mary as an unapproachably holy woman. But who was ever holy as Jesus Himself? and yet who was ever more approachable than He. Mary recognized family claims, and so will all who have the mind of Christ. Those who could not go into society for the sake of their own amusement because life has to them a purpose so much more real, worthy, precious, and even satisfying, can yet with their Lord "rejoice with them that do rejoice," as well as "weep with them that weep" (Rom. 12: 15).

Jesus, as a member of the family in which the marriage took place, and His disciples, as being His friends, were called to the marriage. That is a blessed marriage where Jesus is called, for He alone can truly unite two hearts and two lives. Howsoever unlike husband and wife may be by nature and disposition, however trying they would be to one another if He did not come in and put all the wrong things right, He can make the most real unity where there are the most unlikely elements by making both parties see that He permits what is naturally trying, and therefore taking it from His hand, not directly from the other. Thus the things which are in themselves calculated to separate become closer bonds of union because they are taken to the Lord, and He indeed turns the water into wine. Many are entered into from expediency; some with a view to riches, some with a view to position in society, some with a view to self-gratification or comfort. In all such cases it is not Jesus who is called to the marriage, but wealth, position, comfort; etc. But when two of God's children whom He has brought together enter into marriage "as heirs together of the grace of life" (1 Pet. 3: 7), with the conviction that God will be honored by the mutual help they may be to one another, and the greater usefulness in God's service which their union may bring about, then Jesus is called to the marriage. When a man of God marries an unconverted woman he cannot call Jesus to the marriage, for the command is plain: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers" (II Cor. 6: 14), and again (I Cor. 7: 39), "only in the Lord."

At the marriage in Cana guests were more plentiful than provisions; the supply of wine ran out, and the mother of Jesus said to Him: "They have no wine." Why should she have said it to Him? Up to this time He had wrought no miracles. But Mary knew that her Son should be called "the Son of God" (Luke 1: 35); she knew that the Holy Ghost had come upon Him, and that therefore the time of His ministry was beginning. But "Jesus saith to her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." Jesus was in close communion with His Father; His mother, Mary, was impatient for others to know the things which she had so long kept and pondered in her heart (Luke 2: 19, 51). Our blessed Lord could not be pushed on by human energy; He would not do one hour before the time even what He knew He should do ultimately. O Lord, teach us also this closeness of walk to Thee! Mary then took her true and precious place, and said to the servants, "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." There was all the time evidently in the mind of Mary a conviction that something was going to happen; but, like so many, she tried to hasten it by her own efforts. There are those who have prayed for a revival, and they become fearful lest their faith should fail if it does not come quickly, and so they try to and without waiting until the Lord gives the word, they try to put a pressure on Him, and on the people too, and try to bring about the answer to their prayers. This cannot honor God, and God cannot be a party to it, and for this very reason a great deal of revival work is strained and forced and poor in its results. When God gives the word, great is the company of those that publish it, men and women (Ps. 68: 11). Again, many pray for the revival of primitive Christianity in its primitive power, and then, thinking to help God, get into a spirit of drive in pushing the truths of holiness and Divine healing before unwilling people, forgetting that when God sets before us an open door, no man can shut it (Rev. 3: 8), and no man has power to open the door of God's power; Jesus is He that openeth (Rev. 3: 7). It is our place and our privilege to wait for orders, and then, "whatsoever He saith unto you, do it;" don't think over it, but do it; don't talk about it, but do it. This is a safe rule for our daily life. As we read God's Word, as one and another of the Lord's commands become clear to us, there and then to do, without hesitation or fear, whatsoever He says.

But how are we to know what He says? How are we to get definite and unmistakable guidance from God? How was it on this occasion? As soon as the servants were ready to do His will He told them what to do. There were six water-pots of stone standing there empty, and He said: "Fill the water-pots with water." "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." As we place ourselves voluntarily at God's disposal, He makes known His will to us; He shows us His will, not that we may speculate upon it, but that we may obey it. Again, "If any man he shall know of the doctrine" (John 7: 17).

The servants obeyed and filled the water-pots to the brim. Very useless they might have thought; it is wine, not water, which is needed. Then He gave them another command: "Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it." No word had been spoken, nothing done of which the senses of man could take cognizance, yet that water was made wine. And the governor of the feast (quite ignoring Jesus, for only His mother and the servants knew what had been done) called the bridegroom, and said unto him: "Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now." He was giving utterance to a great truth. With man the best is always first, and then there is deterioration. The best works of an author are generally his early productions, and then there comes a sameness; so with an artist, a poet, an architect. But God is inexhaustible in all things; with Him the best is always best. He goes on developing His resources, and thus it comes about that in old Christians, just when the natural powers are diminishing, the ripeness and mellowness of the soul, the life "hid with Christ in God" (Col. 3: 2) becomes so remarkable. It is who can turn water into wine, yes, even the good wine of the kingdom—wine which maketh glad the heart of man. What we bring to God is like the water in the water-pots; what He makes of what we bring Him is like the water turned to wine. We bring Him hearts inclined to deceit and crookedness, He comes and takes possession, and dwells within as the very truth itself. We bring to Him loveless hearts, or hearts only possessed with the most selfish of all selfishness, that which men call love, and which is only self-gratification; He comes in and dwells, and brings in His own reign of His own love, which is altogether unselfish, pure, blessed, joyous. We bring Him our utter weakness and inability to do anything for His cause; He takes possession and makes His strength perfect in our weakness. It is only as He, the Divine, takes possession of the human and lives His life out in us, that we can please Him. How futile, then, is our effort to make ourselves to be what He calls and desires us to be! We can no more change ourselves than we can turn water into wine; but we can surrender ourselves to Him who can do it. John and James were surnamed Boanerges, sons of thunder (Mark 3: 17), and they seemed like it when they wanted to command fire to come down from heaven to consume those who did not receive Jesus (Luke 10: 54). Yet this very John became the disciple whom Jesus loved, and who was the apostle of love in his epistles especially. Jesus had turned the water into wine. The woman of Samaria was hard, impure, and unwomanly, but in a few hours she became a humble and zealous witness for Jesus. He had turned the water into wine.

THE PURIFICATION OF THE TEMPLE.

This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth His glory, and His disciples believed on Him. They had believed before, but they believed more now. After this Jesus abode for a few days with His mother and His disciples at Capernaum. But the Passover was at hand, and Jesus, as commanded in the laws, went up to Jerusalem. He found in the temple all kinds of merchandise going on. Of course the excuse of the people would have been it was more convenient to buy bullocks and birds for sacrifice in the temple-inclosure than to bring them from a distance. But His Father's house was being made a house of merchandise. How about the temple of our body? Is it our house of prayer, or a house of merchandise? Does nothing within need to be cleansed away? Jesus did many miracles in Jerusalem, and many believed on Him; but He did not commit Himself unto them. He willed that they should recognize Him as fulfilling the Scriptures which had been written of Him. "He knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of men, for He knew what was in man."

"INTO THY HANDS."

Into Thy hands, O, Father! Now at last,
 Weary with struggling and with long unrest,
 Vext by remembrances of conflicts past
 And by a host of present cares oppress,

I come to Thee and cry, Thy will be done!
 Take Thou the burden I have borne too long;
 Into Thy hands, O mighty, loving One,
 My weakness gives its all, for Thou art strong!

For life—for death. I cannot see the way;
 I blindly wander on to meet the night;
 The path grows steeper, and the dying day
 Soon with its shadows will shut out the light.

Hold Thou my hand, O Father! I am tired
 As a young child that wearies of the road;
 And the far heights towards which I once aspired
 Have lost the glory with which erst they glowed.

Take Thou my life, and mold it to Thy will:
 Into Thy hands commit I all my way;
 Fain would I lift each cup that Thou dost fill,
 Nor from its brim my pale lips ever stay.

Take Thou my life! I lay it at Thy feet;
 And in my death my sure support be Thou;
 So shall I sink to slumber sound and sweet,
 And wake at morn before Thy face to bow!

AN eminent theologian in a work famous all over the world, described under the figure of a dream the consternation there would be if God in anger withdrew His Book from the world. He pictured the dismay of the people when they opened their Bibles to find it all blank paper, and when they turned to other books at finding every place where a quotation from the Bible had been, marked by an empty space. Next to that loss, the greatest of which we can conceive, the one which the Church would feel most severely would be the loss of its hymns. There are books, like the "Pilgrim's Progress," "The Anxious Inquirer," and a few others, which could not be spared, but not even the loss of these would be so irreparable and so calamitous as the loss of the hymns which have been used in the service of God from one generation to another. The preacher may be forgotten, the theologian may be known to few, but the man who writes a hymn which expresses the spiritual emotions of men, is a benefactor to the Church throughout the world, and his production is treasured as a precious possession. No man is so certain of undying fame; no man can be so assured that his work will live after he has quitted the world. Such a man is he whose picture appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The works for which the Christian world is indebted to American divines are not few nor lightly valued, but the contribution to Christian literature by Americans which has been most highly valued and most extensively used are the hymns which have come from American pens. A very high place, if not the highest among American hymn-writers, is that occupied by the Rev. Ray Palmer, D.D., whose hymn commencing: "My faith looks up to Thee," has been translated into more than twenty languages. That is only one of many popular hymns that he has written, but the rapidity with which it seized and held the admiration of Christian people established its author's position in the world of Christian literature.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Ray Palmer was born November 12th, 1808, at Little Compton, R. I. He is therefore now in his seventy-eighth year. It was intended that he should pursue a commercial career. He was therefore sent to Boston, Mass., at the age of thirteen to fill a clerk's position in an extensive business house. It was, however, stipulated that the boy should have opportunities for completing his education. He attended school in Boston in addition to performing his commercial duties, and for two years he led this divided life. Placed in such a position many lads would have given their chief energies to the pursuit which held out the best promises of wealth and worldly success. Study would have been irksome in circumstances which tended to make the boy feel himself a man—a stage beyond the schoolboy status. It was not so with Ray Palmer. Study had charms for him, which could not be found in buying and selling and getting gain. The school encroached on the store, and at the end of two years the receipt of custom knew the future Christian poet no more.

SCHOLASTIC WORK.

From Boston Ray Palmer went to Phillips' Academy, Andover, to prepare for college. He was fifteen at the time; he had seen something of the world, had failed to be drawn into the current of competition for riches, had looked at the prizes which fascinate the hearts of men, and had turned from them unmoved by their attractions. He was three years at Andover, and at the end of that time he proceeded to Yale College, New Haven. He entered that institution in 1826, and graduated in the class of 1830. His first occupation, after leaving college, was that of teaching. A position was offered him in a private school in New York. It was situated in what was at that time an aristocratic quarter of the city, among the residences of the best families. It was in Fulton Street, west of Broadway, near Church Street, where now vast wholesale business houses crowd each other, and shut the light of day from the narrow thoroughfare. There the young man taught for three hours a day. He had leisure, and, as a countryman in a great city, may naturally be supposed to have had temptations to spend his time in amusement. But he was by this time a child of God, and in quiet reflection and in Christian service he found abundance of occupation.

THE POETIC GENIUS.

Already, unknown almost to every one, the genius of the poet was manifesting itself. In a little book which he carried about with him there were jotted down short poems and single stanzas which were to him the most natural expression of his deepest emotions. One day alone in his chamber, away from outward excitement, and with a deep consciousness of his own needs, the young tutor wrote in his little book, as faithfully as he could, the thoughts that were passing within him. It was a poem of four stanzas, never intended for publication, but a spontaneous expression of feeling. As he wrote the last words he was so moved by the subject of the poem that he covered his face with his hands, and his overwrought soul found relief in abundant tears. These were the words as they still stand as they were written fifty-five years ago in the old morocco-covered memorandum book:

My faith looks up to Thee,
Thou Lamb of Cavalry,
Saviour divine;
Now hear me while I pray,
Take all my guilt away,
Oh, let me from this day
Be wholly Thine.

May Thy rich grace impart
Strength to my fainting heart,
My zeal inspire;
As Thou hast died for me,
Oh, may my love to Thee
Pure, warm, and changeless be—
A living fire.

While life's dark maze I tread,
And griefs around me spread,
Be thou my guide;
Bid darkness turn to-day,
Wipe sorrow's tears away,
Nor let me ever stray
From Thee aside.

When ends life's transient dream,
When death's cold, sullen stream
Shall o'er me roll;
Blest Saviour, then, in love,
Fear and distrust remove;
Oh, bear me safe above—
A ransomed soul.

It was remarkable that lines so sweet and so expressive should have been written by one who evidently felt their force and beauty, without awakening a desire to see them in print. It shows the unworldly, retiring spirit of the man that no thought of publication crossed his mind. Ray Palmer kept them hidden in his little book, and went about his daily duties a busy, unambitious man. No one saw them until a year or two afterward, when they were shown to Dr. Lowell Mason in a Boston street. That was a memorable time. A wave of deep religious revival was sweeping over the country, and a new demand had arisen for hymns to be used in the meetings. Dr. Mason, in conjunction with Dr. Hastings, of New York, was preparing a collection of such hymns, and meeting Ray Palmer in Boston told him of his effort, and asked him if he could furnish a contribution. The young poet showed him the stanzas which had so deeply moved himself when he wrote them two years before, and stepping into a store, Dr.

Mason then and there took a copy. On sitting down at home and reading them again he became more and more interested, and finally composed a tune to suit the words. It was "Olivet," the tune to which they have been sung in every time since then thousands of times. "You may live many years, Mr. Palmer," was Dr. Lowell Mason's prediction on meeting the author a few days afterward, "and do many good things, but I think you will be best known to posterity as the author of that hymn." That prediction is already verified. In 1840 the hymn was being generally used in England, and since that time, as we have said, it has been translated into more than twenty languages.

ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

Many interesting incidents in which this hymn has figured have been related. One of the most affecting is an incident of the war. It was night. A great battle was impending. In one of the tents eight Christian young men were gathered. They knew well that the coming dawn would be the signal for a sanguinary conflict, from which not all of them could come alive. In that hour they came together for prayer. Before they parted they spoke freely of the improbability of their surviving the morrow, and one of the number suggested that they should draw up a paper expressing the feelings with which they went to stand face to face with death, and all sign it; and that it should be left as a testimony to the friends of such of them as might fall. The suggestion was unanimously adopted, and after consultation it was decided that a copy of "My faith looks up to Thee" should be written out, and subscribed by all present, so that father, and mother, and friends should know in what spirit they laid down their lives. They did not all meet again, but one of the survivors saw the arrangement carried out. A multitude of instances are also on record of souls seeking the light who have found it in the same hymn, and of Christians in circumstances of trial and of heart-breaking sorrow who have gained new strength from it.

In the autumn of 1831, Ray Palmer returned to New Haven, and became associated with the eminent Latin scholar, Professor E. A. Andrews, in the foundation of the New Haven Young Ladies' Institute, which was one of the earliest attempts made in America to furnish young ladies with advantages equal to those enjoyed by the other sex.

THE MINISTRY.

Useful as such work was, Ray Palmer had been called to a grander sphere of labor in which he would devote all his time and talents to direct Christian effort. He had, ever since he left Yale, looked longingly toward pastoral work, and been preparing for it by theological study. In 1832 his desire was fulfilled; he was licensed to preach by the New Haven West Association of Congregational ministers. Shortly afterward he accepted a call to the Central Congregational Church of Bath, Me., and was ordained there in 1835. He was about the same time united in marriage to Miss Ann H. Waud, daughter of Marmaduke Waud, Esq., of New York.

Fifteen years of earnest practical labor followed, full of abundant tokens of the divine blessing. During that period (in 1847) he crossed the Atlantic, in a brief respite from ministerial labor. He needed rest and change of scene as a recuperation, for, beside ordinary pastoral duties his pen had been in constant requisition, and his services had been sought and rendered as one of the Overseers of Bowdoin College, Brunswick. During his trip he visited England and Scotland, and made a tour of the chief Continental countries.

Soon after his return an urgent call from the First Congregational Church in Albany, N. Y., was tendered to him. This was so presented that he gave it prayerful consideration, and finally was led to accept it. He removed to Albany in 1850, where he remained fifteen years and a half. At the end of that time he was requested by his ministerial brethren to fill the office of Secretary of the Congregational Union.

The duties of that responsible position he performed for twelve years. During his term of office no less than six hundred Congregational churches were built by the aid of the Association.

LITERARY WORK.

While thus actively engaged as a pastor, and in official work, his untiring energy found occupation in the production of numerous works, besides smaller pamphlets and fugitive contributions to religious journals. Among the books published, most of which were republished in London, and ran through several editions as they did in America, were: "Spiritual Improvement; or, Aid to Growth in Grace" (1839); "Closet Hours" (1851); "Remember Me" (1855); "Hints on the Formation of Religious Opinions" (1860); "Hymns and Sacred Pieces" (1865); "Hymns of My Holy Hours" (1866); "Home; or, The Unlost Paradise" (1868); "Earnest Words on True Success in Life" (1873); "Complete Poetical Works" (1876); "Voices of Hope and Gladness" (1880). The value of all these was shown by the eagerness with which they were sought, and new editions called for. It is, however, as a poet that the Church delights to think of Dr. Palmer, and is grateful to him for the gems he has added to her treasury of praise. Among the best-known of these is the hymn commencing:

"Fount of everlasting love," which appeared in the collection of Dr. Lowell Mason, at the same time as that we have already quoted. Professor Frederic M. Bird in his work on "Hymnology," thus classifies Dr. Palmer's productions:

"Thou who roll'st the year around," written 1832, but never printed till 1865, for "The Closing Year." The next four appeared in "Union Hymns," Boston, 1834. The date of composition is appended to each piece in the volume of 1876.

"Away from earth my spirit turns." (1833).

"Stealing from the world away." (1834).

"Before Thy throne with tearful eyes." (1834).

"Wake thee, O Zion, thy mourning is ended." (1834).

"Thine holy day's returning." (1834).

"When downward to the darksome tomb," written 1842 and widely used, as is the next:

"And is there, Lord, a rest." (1843).

"O sweetly breathe the lyres above." (1843).

is another general favorite. The "Sabbath Hymn-Book" contains seven contributions from his pen. They were:

"Jesus, Thou Joy of loving hearts."

"O Christ, our King, Creator, Lord."

"O Bread to pilgrims given."

"Come, Holy Ghost, in love."

"Jesus, these eyes have never seen."

"Lord, my weak thought in vain would climb."

"Thy Father's house! Thine own bright home!"

The first four of these are translations, all beautifully rendered. Dr. Robinson's "Songs for the Sanctuary," published in 1865, contained the next seven of Dr. Palmer's productions. They were:

"Eternal Father, Thou hast said." (1860).

"Jesus, Lamb of God, for me." (1863).

"Take me, O my Father, take me." (1864).

"Wouldst thou eternal life obtain." (1864).

"Thou, Saviour, from Thy throne on high." (1864).

"Lord, Thou on earth didst love Thine own." (1864).

"Lord, Thou wilt bring the joyful day." (1864).

All these are well known, and are growing in favor. Since they were published many others have appeared from time to time. It would be impossible to give here even a catalogue of their titles, for in his retirement Dr. Palmer has been led to devote himself more completely to poetry, and has written a very large number of tender and beautiful hymns and poems which are gradually coming to popular recognition. Those already mentioned which will be found in most evangelical hymn-books, will show the character of his work, and may lead our readers to study

Dr. Palmer's volumes for themselves. In his home, at 205 Mount Pleasant Avenue, Newark, N. J., he has been spending the past few years of tranquil old age, still full of mental activity and ever adding new treasures to the literature of the Church.

IN A LEPER ASYLUM.

It would be difficult to find in the annals of missionary work for the past year in any land a more pathetic page than that received last month at the Presbyterian Mission Rooms, 23 Centre Street, New York, containing the report of the Lepers' Asylum at Sabathu. This institution, and the work of peculiar self-sacrifice connected with it, has been principally under the charge of Mr. Rudolph and Mr. and Mrs. Wyckoff. The following sketch, published in the Foreign Missionary for April, is from the pen of Mrs. Wyckoff:

"Long, low mud houses plastered with the same material, with flat roofs, each having a veranda in front, are the kind of dwellings that have been provided for these poor lepers. There are about fifteen of these houses perched here and there on the mountain side, facing to all points of the compass, varying in size, each capable of accommodating from six to ten or even twenty persons. The little plots of ground which some of the lepers are able to cultivate add to the attractiveness of their homes, while the food and exercise thus gained is good both for mind and body. Their only attendants are two water-carriers, and a servant or two of the lowest caste, though occasionally a self-sacrificing wife will follow her leprous husband to the asylum and remain with him, ministering to his wants, during all the weary months and years of his suffering."

"On the second Saturday evening after our arrival in Sabathu, the next day being Communion Sabbath, we went into the prayer-room to attend a preparatory service for the Christian lepers. They were all present and sang, apparently with much feeling, 'Jesus is Our Helper,' and afterward listened attentively to words of counsel and advice given them by their devoted friend and pastor, Rev. A. Rudolph."

"At the close of the service a new applicant was presented for admittance into the institution. A young boy about fourteen years of age stood in the doorway, tears fairly raining down his cheeks, while an old man stood behind him, answering questions which Mr. Rudolph put to him about the poor lad. The parents, he said, had no leprosy; neither had any of the family. Only this poor boy has the disease, and no one knows how or why. What wonder tears should fall, when he saw before him such a number of his fellow-creatures in all stages of the foul disease, and knew that in course of time he would probably be as bad as the worst of them? Then, too, having just parted from home and friends to cast in his lot with these poor, suffering strangers, was no small trial to the poor fellow."

"When the holy Sabbath came and the gong was sounded for service, the whole of the little community seemed eager to enter the place of prayer, and were most quiet and attentive throughout the solemn service. One poor woman, unable to walk, was carried on a man's back to the place of prayer, that she might once in her earthly pilgrimage worship with the Lord's people and sit at His table. The elements were first passed to the Christians present who were in health, afterward to the poor diseased members of Christ's body. I could not help thinking of the time when they would be clothed in white, and when even their vile bodies would be redeemed and cleansed in the blood of the Lamb. Those among them who are truly followers of the Lord Jesus must greatly rejoice in so glorious a home."

"There have been six baptisms in the asylum during the year, and eleven deaths. The number of inmates has been fluctuating between eighty and ninety. . . . The entire number that have sought the benefit of the institution during the year is one hundred and seven."

"The inmates of the asylum have, as in former years, made a collection every month to support one of their number."

A CHILD IN A CREVASSE.

A REMARKABLE incident is related in a recently published work by the Rev. W. Adamson, D.D. He says: "A Highland widow, bearing her only son, a babe, in her arms, went away to seek assistance from a relative to pay her rent. She was suddenly overtaken, in a wild glen among the mountains, by what was long recalled by her fellow-villagers as 'the first May storm.' After attempting in vain for some time, with her infant in her arms, to buffet whirling eddies, she wrapped her child in her own cloak and laid him carefully down among the heather and ferns in the deep cleft of a rock, with the intention, it is supposed, of making her own way home, through the drifting sleet, and obtaining succor for her little one. She was found by the anxious neighbors, next morning, stretched cold and stiff on a snowy shroud. But the cries of the babe directed them to the crevasse close by where it lay, all unconscious of its danger, and from which it was rescued in safety."

"Many long years afterward that child returned from distant lands a disabled soldier, covered with honorable wounds. The first Sabbath of his home coming he entered the Gaelic Church, Glasgow, to get shelter from a heavy fall of snow. It was on a Communion Sabbath. The subject of the discourse was the Love of Christ. In illustrating the self-sacrificing nature of that 'love which seeketh not her own,' the preacher narrated the above story of the Highland widow, whom he had himself known in his boyhood. And he asked: 'If that child is now alive, what would you think of his heart if he did not cherish an affection for his mother's memory, and if the sight of the poor tattered cloak which she wrapped round him, in order to save his life at the cost of her own, did not fill him with gratitude and love too deep for words? Yet, what hearts have you, my hearers, if, over those memorials of your Saviour's sacrifice of Himself, you do not feel them glow with deeper love, and with adoring gratitude?'"

"A few days after this a message was sent by a dying man requesting to see the clergyman. The request was complied with. The sick man seized the minister by the hand, and gazing intently on his face, said: 'You do not, you cannot recognize me. But I know you. I have been a wanderer in many lands. I have visited every quarter of the globe, and fought and bled for my country. I came to the town a few weeks ago in ill-health. Last Sabbath I entered your church—the church of my countrymen—where I could once more hear, in the language of my youth, the Gospel preached. I heard you tell the story of the widow and her son'—here the voice of the old soldier faltered, his emotion almost choked his utterance; but recovering himself for a moment, he cried: 'I am that son!' and burst into a flood of tears."

"'Yes,' he continued, 'I am that son! Never, never, did I forget my mother's love. Though I never saw her, dear to me is her memory, and my only desire now is to lay my bones beside hers in the old churchyard among the hills. But, sir, what breaks my heart and covers me with shame is this—until now I never saw, with the eyes of the soul, the love of my Saviour in giving Himself for me—a poor, lost sinner. I confess it, I confess it!' he cried, looking up to heaven, his eyes streaming with tears; and pressing the minister's hand close to his breast, he added: 'It was God that made you tell that story. Praise be to His holy name, that my mother has not died in vain, and that the prayers which I was told she used to offer for me have been at last answered; for the love of my mother has been blessed by the Holy Spirit for making me see, as I never saw before, the love of the Saviour. I see it; I believe it. I have found deliverance in old age where I found it in my childhood—in the cleft of the rock; but it is the Rock of Ages!'"

THE TRIALS OF THE NEWSPAPER PROFESSION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 11, 1886.

"Behold a flying roll."—ZECH. 5 : 1.

The Newspaper as an Educator—Its History—The Pioneers—Its Share in the World's Advance—Its Part in Evangelizing the World—Two Kinds of Newspapers—A Vast Growth—Small Sympathy Extended—The Trial of Disenchantment—Inadequate Remuneration—Gratifying a Morbid Public—The Nervous Strain—Alcoholic Temptation—Why Horace Greeley Abstained—Neglected by the Church—Life in Type—An Insane Poet.

THIS winged sheet of the text had on it a prophecy. The flying roll to-day is the newspaper. In calculating the influences that affect society, you can no more afford to ignore it than you can ignore the noonday sun or the Atlantic Ocean.

It is high time that I preach a sermon expressing my appreciation of what the newspaper press has done and is doing. No man, living or dead, is or has been so indebted to it as I am, for it gives me perpetual audience in every city, town, and neighborhood of Christendom, and I take this opportunity before God and this people to thank the editors, and publishers, and compositors the world over, and I give fair notice that I shall take every opportunity of enlarging this field. I have said again and again to the officers of this church, whoever else are crowded, don't let the reporters be crowded. Each responsible and intelligent reporter is ten or fifteen churches built on to this church.

Ninety-five per cent of the newspapers are now my friends, and do me full justice and more than justice, and the other five of the hundred are such notorious liars that nobody believes them. It was in self-defence that sixteen years ago I employed an official stenographer of my own because of the appalling misrepresentations of myself and church. Since then things have marvelously changed, until now it is just as appalling in the marvellous opportunity opened.

THE GREAT EDUCATOR.

The newspaper is the great educator of the nineteenth century. There is no force compared with it. It is book, pulpit, platform, forum—all in one. And there is not an interest—religious, literary, commercial, scientific, agricultural, or mechanical—that is not within its grasp. All our churches, and schools, and colleges, and asylums, and art galleries feel the quaking of the printing-press.

ITS HISTORY.

The institution of newspapers arose in Italy. In Venice the first newspaper was published, and monthly; during the time that Venice was warring against Solymán the Second in Dalmatia, it was printed for the purpose of giving military and commercial information to the Venetians. The first newspaper published in England was in 1588, and called the English Mercury. Others were styled the Weekly Discoverer, the Secret Owl, Heracitus Ridens, etc. Who can estimate the political, scientific, commercial, and religious revolutions roused up in England for many years past by the Daily Telegraph, the Daily News, the Standard, the Morning Chronicle, the Post, and the London Times? Though in 1775 there were but thirty-seven in the whole country, the number of published journals is now counted by thousands; and to-day—we may as well acknowledge it as not—the religious and secular newspaper are the great educators of the country.

I find no difficulty in accounting for the world's advance. Four centuries ago, in Germany, in courts of justice, men fought with their fists to see who should have the decision of the court; and if the judge's decision was unsatisfactory, then the judge fought with counsel. Many of the lords could not read the deeds of their own estates. What has made the change?

"Books," you say. No, sir! The vast majority of citizens do not read books. Take this audience, or any other promiscuous assemblage, and how many histories have they read? How many treatises on constitutional law, or political economy, or works of science? How many elaborate poems or books of travel? How much of Boyle, or De Tocqueville, Xenophon, or Herodotus, or Percival? Not many! In the United States the people would not average one such book a year for each individual!

UNIVERSALLY USED.

Whence, then, this intelligence—this capacity to talk about all themes, secular and religious—this acquaintance with science and art—this power to appreciate the beautiful and grand? Next to the Bible the newspaper, swift-winged and everywhere present, flying over the fences, shoved under the door, tossed into the counting-house, laid on the work-bench, hawked through the cars! All read it—white and black, German, Irishman, Swiss, Spaniard, American, old and young, good and bad, sick and well, before breakfast and after tea, Monday morning, Saturday night, Sunday and week day.

I now declare that I consider the newspaper to be the grand agency by which the Gospel is to be preached, ignorance cast out, oppression dethroned, crime extirpated, the world raised, heaven rejoiced, and God glorified.

TWO KINDS OF NEWSPAPERS.

There are only two kinds of newspapers—the one good, very good, the other bad, very bad. A newspaper may be started with an undecided character, but after it has been going on for years, everybody finds out just what it is; and it is very good or it is very bad. The one paper is the embodiment of news, the ally of virtue, the foe of crime, the delectation of elevated taste, the mightiest agency on earth for making the world better. The other paper is a brigand amid moral forces, it is a beslimer of reputation, it is the right arm of death and hell, it is the mightiest agency in the universe for making the world worse and battling the cause of God. The one an angel of intelligence and mercy, the other a fiend of darkness.

Between this archangel and this fury is to be fought the great battle which is to decide the fate of the world. If you have any doubt as to which is to be victor, ask the prophecies, ask God; the chief batteries with which He would vindicate the right and thunder down the wrong have not yet been unlimbered. The great Armageddon of the nations is not to be fought with swords, but with steel pens; not with bullets, but with type; not with cannon, but with lightning perfecting presses; and the Sumters, and the Moultries, and the Pulaskis, and the Giblartars of that conflict will be the editorial and reportorial rooms of our great newspaper establishments. Men of the press, under God you are to decide whether the human race shall be saved or lost. God has put a more stupendous responsibility upon you than upon any other class of persons.

VAST GROWTH.

What long strides your profession has made in influence and power since the day when Peter Sheffer invented cast metal type, and because two books were found just alike they were ascribed to the work of the devil, and books were printed on strips of bamboo, and Rev. Jesse Glover originated the first American printing-press, and the Common Council of New York, in solemn resolution, offered £40 to any printer who would come there and live, and when the Speaker of the House of Parliament in England announced with indignation that the public prints had recognized some of their doings, until in this day, when we have in this country about five hundred skilled phonographers, and about thirteen thousand newspapers printing, in one year, two billion five hundred million copies!

The press and the telegraph have gone down into the same great harvest field to reap, and the telegraph says to the newspaper: "I'll rake while you bind;" and the iron teeth of the telegraph are set down at one end of the harvest-field and drawn clean across, and the newspaper gathers up the sheaves, setting down one sheaf on the breakfast table in the shape of a morning newspaper, and putting down another sheaf on the tea table in the shape of an evening newspaper; and that man who neither reads nor takes a newspaper would be a curiosity. What vast progress since the day when Cardinal Wolsey declared that either the printing-press must go down or the Church of God must go down, to this time when the printing-press and the pulpit are in combination; and a man on the Sabbath-day may preach the Gospel to five hundred people, while on Monday morning, through the secular journals, he may preach that Gospel to millions!

ABUSE NOT SYMPATHY.

Notwithstanding all this that you have gained in position and influence, men of the press, how many words of sympathy do you get during the course of a year? Not ten. How many sermons of practical helpfulness for your profession are preached during the twelve months? Not one. How many words of exhortation, and denunciation, and hypercriticism do you get in that same length of time? About ten thousand. If you are a type-setter, and get the type in the wrong fount, the foreman storms at you. If you are a foreman, and cannot surmount the insurmountable, and get the "forms" ready at just the time, the publisher denounces you. If you are a publisher, and make mismanagement, then the owners of the paper will be hard on you for lack of dividend. If you are an editor, and you announce an unpopular sentiment, all the pens of Christendom are flung at you. If you are a reporter, you shall be held responsible for the indistinctness of public speakers, and for the blunders of type-setters, and for the fact that you cannot work quite so well in the flickering gaslight and after midnight as you do in the noonday. If you are a proof-reader, upon you shall come the united wrath of editor, reporter, and the public, because you do not properly arrange the periods, and the semicolons, and the exclamation points, and the asterisks. Plenty of abuse for you, but no sympathy.

Having been in a position where I could see these things going on from year to year, I have thought that this morning I would preach a sermon on the trials of the newspaper profession, praying that God may bless the sermon to all those to whom this message may come, and leading those not in the profession to a more kindly and lenient bearing toward those who are.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

One of the great trials of this newspaper profession is the fact that they are compelled to see more of the shams of the world than any other profession. Through every newspaper office, day by day, go the weaknesses of the world, the vanities that want to be puffed, the revenges that want to be wreaked, all the mistakes that want to be corrected, all the dull speakers who want to be thought eloquent, all the meanness that wants to get its wares noticed gratis in the editorial columns in order to save the tax of the advertising column, all the men who want to be set right who never were right, all the crack-brained philosophers, with story as long as their hair, and as gloomy as their finger nails, in mourning because bereft of soap; all the itinerant bores who come to stay five minutes and stop an hour.

From the editorial and reportorial rooms all the follies and shams of the world are seen day by day, and the temptation is to believe neither in God, man, nor woman. It is no surprise to me that in your profession there are some skeptical men. I only wonder that you believe anything. Unless an editor or a reporter has in his present or his early home a model of earnest character, or he throw himself upon the upholding grace of God, he must make temporal and eternal shipwreck.

Another great trial of the newspaper profession is inadequate compensation. Since the days of Hazlitt, and Sheridan, and John Milton, and the wallings of Grub Street, London, literary toil, with very few exceptions, has not been properly requited. When Oliver Goldsmith received a friend in his house he, the author, had to sit on the window, because there was only one chair. Linæus sold his splendid work for a ducat. De Foe, the author of two hundred and eighteen volumes, died penniless. The learned Johnson dined behind a screen because his clothes were too shabby to allow him to dine with the gentlemen who, on the other side of the screen, were applauding his works. And so on down to the present time, literary toil is a great struggle for bread.

NON-APPRECIATION.

The world seems to have a grudge against a man who, as they say, gets his living by his wits; and the day laborer says to the man of literary toil: "You come down here, and shove a plane, and hammer a shoe-last, and break cobblestones, and earn an honest living as I do, instead of sitting there in idleness scribbling!" But God knows that there are no harder worked men in all the earth than the newspaper people of this country.

It is not a matter of hard times; it is characteristic of all times. Men have a better appreciation for that which appeals to the stomach than for that which appeals to the brain. They have no idea of the immense financial and intellectual exhaustions of the newspaper press. They grumble because they have to pay five cents a copy, and wish they had only to pay three, or paying three, they wish they had only to pay one. While there are a few exceptions—and some few do make large fortunes—the vast majority of newspaper people in this day have a struggle for livelihood; and if in their hardship and exasperation they sometimes write things they ought not to write, let these facts be an extenuation. Oh, men of the press, it will be a great help to you, if when you come home late at night, fagged out and nervous with your work, you would just kneel down and commend your case to God, who has watched all the fatigue of the day, and who has promised to be your God and the God of your children forever!

SATISFYING MORBID TASTES.

Another great trial of the newspaper profession is the diseased appetite for unhealthy intelligence. You blame the newspaper press for giving such prominence to murders and scandals. Do you suppose that so many papers would give prominence to these things if the people did not demand them? I go into the meat market of a foreign city, and I find that the butchers hang up on the most conspicuous hooks meat that is tainted, while the meat that is fresh and savory is put away without any especial care. I come to the conclusion that the people of that city love tainted meat. You know very well that if the great mass of people in this country get hold of a newspaper, and there are in it no runaway matches, no broken-up families, no defamation of men in high position, they pronounce the paper insipid. They say: "It is shockingly dull to-night."

I believe it is one of the trials of the newspaper press, that the people of this country demand moral slush instead of healthy, intellectual food. Now, you are a respectable man, an intelligent man, and a paper comes into your hand. You open it, and there are three columns of splendidly written editorial, recommending some moral sentiment, or evolving some scientific theory. In the next column there is a miserable, contemptible divorce case. Which do you read first? You dip into the editorial long enough to say: "Well, that's very ably written," and you read the divorce case from the "long primer" type at the top, to the "nonpareil" type at the bottom, and then you ask your wife if she has read it!

Oh, it is only a case of supply and demand! Newspaper men are not fools. They know what you want, and they give it to you. I believe that if the Church and the world bought nothing but pure, honest, healthful newspapers, nothing but pure, honest, and healthful newspapers would be published. If you should gather all the editors and the reporters of this country in one great convention, and then ask of them what kind of a paper they would prefer to publish, I believe they would unanimously say: "We would prefer to publish an elevating paper." So long as there is an iniquitous demand there will be an iniquitous supply. I make no apology for a debauched newspaper, but I am saying these things in order to divide the responsibility between those that print and those who read.

THE NERVOUS STRAIN.

Another temptation of the newspaper profession is the great allurements that surrounds them. Every occupation and profession has temptations peculiar to itself, and the newspaper profession is not an exception. The great draught, as you know, is on the nervous forces, and the brain is racked. The blundering political speech must read well for the sake of the party, and so the reporter, or the editor has to make it read well, although every sentence was a catastrophe to the English language. The reporter must hear all that an inaudible speaker says, who thinks it is vulgar to speak out, and it must be right the next morning or the next night in the papers, though the night before the whole audience sat with its hand behind its ear, in vain trying to catch it. This man must go through killing nightwork. He must go into heated assemblages and into unventilated audience rooms that are enough to take the life out of him. He must visit court rooms which are almost always disgusting with rum and tobacco. He must expose himself at the fire. He must write in fetid alleyways. Added to all that, he must have hasty mastication and irregular habits.

TEMPTATIONS.

To bear up under this tremendous nervous strain, they are tempted to artificial stimulus, and how many thousands have gone down under that pressure God only knows. They must have something to counteract the wet, they must have something to keep out the chill, and after a scant night's sleep, they must have something to revive them for the morning's work. This is what made Horace Greeley such a stout temperance man. He told me that he had seen so many of his comrades go down under that temptation.

Oh, my brother of the newspaper profession, what you cannot do without artificial stimulus, God does not want you to do! There is no halfway ground for our literary people between teetotalism and dissipation. Your professional success, your domestic peace, your eternal salvation, will depend upon your theories in regard to artificial stimulus. I have had so many friends go down under the temptation, their brilliancy quenched, their homes blasted, that I cry out this morning in the words of another: "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright in the cup; for at the last it biteth like a serpent, and it stingeth like an adder."

NEGLECTED BY THE CHURCH.

Another trial of this profession is the fact that no one seems to care for their souls. They feel bitterly about it, though they laugh. People sometimes laugh the loudest when they feel the worst. They are expected to gather up religious proceedings and to discuss religious doctrines in the editorial columns, but who expects them to be saved by the sermons they phonograph, or by the doctrines they discuss in the editorial columns? The world looks upon them as professional. Who preaches to reporters and editors?

Some of them came from religious homes, and when they left the parental roof, whoever regarded or disregarded, they come off with a father's benediction and a mother's prayer. They never think of those good old times but tears come into their eyes, and they move around this great, roaring metropolis homesick. Oh, if they only knew what a helpful thing it is for a man to put his weary head down on the bosom of a sympathetic Christ! He knows how nervous and tired you are. He has a heart large enough to take in all your interests for this world and the next. Oh, men of the newspaper press, you sometimes get sick of this world, it seems so hollow and unsatisfying! If there are any people in all the earth that need God, you are the men, and you shall have Him if only this day you implore His mercy.

A WRECK.

A man was found at the foot of Canal Street. As they picked him up from the water, and brought him to the Morgue, they saw by the contour of his forehead that he had great mental capacity. He had entered the newspaper profession. He had gone down in health. He took to artificial stimulus. He went down further and further, until one summer day, hot and hungry, and sick and in despair, he flung himself off the dock. They found in his pocket a reporter's pad, a lead-pencil, a photograph of some one who had loved him long ago. Death, as sometimes it will, smoothed out all the wrinkles that had gathered prematurely on his brow, and as he lay there his face was as fair as when seven years ago he left his country home, and they bade him good-by for ever. The world looks through the window of the Morgue, and says: "It's nothing but an outcast," but God says it was a gigantic soul that perished, because the world gave him no chance.

RESPONSIBILITY.

Let me ask all men connected with the printing-press that they help us more and more in the effort to make the world better. I charge you in the name of God, before whom you must account for the tremendous influence you hold in this country, to consecrate yourselves to higher endeavors. You are the men to fight back this invasion of corrupt literature. Lift up your right hand and swear new allegiance to the cause of philanthropy and religion. And when, at last, standing on the plains of judgment, you look out upon the unnumbered throngs over whom you have had influence, may it be found that you were among the mightiest energies that lifted men upon the exalted pathway that leads to the renown of heaven. Better than to have sat in editorial chair, from which, with the finger of type, you decided the destinies of empires, but decided them wrong, that you had been some dungeoned exile who, by the light of window iron-grated, on scraps of a New Testament leaf, picked up from the hearth, spelled out the story of Him who taketh away the sins of the world. In eternity, Dives is the beggar!

LIFE IN TYPE.

Well, my friends, we will all soon get through writing, and printing, and proof-reading, and publishing. What then? Our life is a book. Our years are the chapters. Our months are the paragraphs. Our days are the sentences. Our doubts are the interrogation points. Our imitation of others the quotation marks. Our attempts at display a dash. Death the period. Eternity the peroration. O God, where will we spend it? Have you heard the news, more startling than any found in the journals of the last six weeks? It is the tidings that man is lost. Have you heard the news, the gladdest that was ever announced, coming this day from the throne of God, lightning couriers leaping from the palace gate? The news! The glorious news! That there is pardon for all guilt, and comfort for all trouble. Set it up in "double-leaded" columns, and direct it to the whole race.

A Scotch poet, insane on everything but religion, wrote this beautiful yet strange rhythm:

"God hath pardoned all my sin,
That's the news! That's the news!
I feel the witness deep within,
That's the news! That's the news!
And since He took my sins away,
And taught me how to watch and pray,
I'm happy now from day to day,
That's the news! That's the news!"

"And now if any one should say:
What's the news? What's the news?
Oh, tell him you've begun to pray—
That's the news! That's the news!
That you have joined the conquering band,
And now with joy at God's command,
You're marching to the better land,
That's the news! That's the news!"

FOREIGN MISSIONARY INCIDENTS.

A TRIBUTE FROM A PATIENT.

THE Twenty-fifth Annual Report of the Women's Union Missionary Society of America mentions the placing of a tablet in the hospital established by the mission in Shanghai, China. It says:

"Miss McKechnie introduces us to 'our first patient in the new hospital. She was an old lady who had been a sufferer for fifty years—a native physician's wife who had journeyed about two hundred miles to consult the 'foreign doctor.' Everything about the place was new and wonderful to her, and she took manifest delight in all she saw. Hung up in her room is one of the picture rolls of the twelve scenes in the life of Christ. Our Bible reader had been reading and explaining the pictures to her, and the next day when I asked her about them I was astonished to find how much she remembered. She was present every morning at prayers, and seemed very attentive during the reading and singing. Our matron, an excellent Christian woman, prayed for her by name, that she might be led to worship the true God. A day or two before she left she brought a tablet to be hung on the wall. On the right, in gold characters, on a delicate pink background, is her husband's name and the country to which she belonged, and the name of the person presenting it. In the centre is an appropriate selection from the Chinese classics, setting forth the doctor's skill. To the left is a brief history of the case, and how she had heard of the doctor and was cured."

AN INVITATION TO TEACH.

Mrs. Pearson, of the same missionary society, writes from Yokohama, Japan:

"There came to me a very urgent invitation to visit a village on the seashore, the women of that region having no teacher and desiring one. They are the wives of naval officers, and have recently become interested in the truth through the instructions of some native evangelists. I was accompanied by a Bible woman and one of our Christian girls. The meeting was held at the residence of a Christian physician, and a more intelligent and interesting company of women I have never met in this country. Many prayers had been offered by native Christians and by foreign friends for God's blessing upon this meeting, which prayers were heard and answered. The morning services, beginning at ten o'clock, were conducted by one of our Bible women, who has much of the blessing and power of the Holy Spirit, and who spoke earnestly and impressively on the sufferings which the Lord Jesus willingly endured on our behalf, and our obligation to present our spirits, souls, and bodies unto Him, as living sacrifices, in token of our love for and gratitude to Him. Another of our Bible women spoke upon 'walking with God,' saying, if Enoch walked with God for three hundred years, in the dim light of the ancient dispensation, might not we, who live under the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, walk closely and constantly with our Lord?"

WANTED THE BEST.

Mrs. Viele, who is also at Yokohama, writes: "Only a few days ago a heathen father brought to our school his little daughter of eight years, and said: 'Your religion is good, I am sure of that, and I wish my child to learn about it. I am too old to change my religion, I cannot be troubled with thinking about new things; but my child is young, and she will learn, and I want her to have the best.' This man pays for his child, so we cannot believe he had a mercenary motive."

AN EXCHANGE OF PUPILS.

Miss Arnott, who is laboring in Jaffa, Syria, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Branch of the Women's Union Missionary Society, sends interesting details of her work, which are included in their annual report. She writes: "I must inform you of the change I have made in reference to Jameeleh. When we reopened our school after the vacation, Jameeleh's mother begged us to let her have Jameeleh at home, as she goes out to work, and wanted her to take care of the little ones. I felt that was only right and reasonable, and Jameeleh has been the principal stay and bread-winner of the family during the winter, for her mother has been in very poor health, and was not able to do much. She begged me to take a younger daughter in Jameeleh's place. [Appears to have approved the result on Jameeleh.] The next in age has been adopted ever since the father's death into a native family here, so I took the third daughter, named Malaki (Queen), who is eight or nine years of age. She is a nice child, and seems to possess more mental capacity than her elder sister, and has improved very much."

FIRST VISIT TO A ZENANA.

The Women's Union Mission was at first called the Zenana Mission, and it deserved the name, for it has done excellent work in the zenanas, though it has not confined itself to that department exclusively. One of the reports which directed its attention to the work, and deeply stirred the hearts of the Christian ladies twenty-five years ago, is an incident reproduced after a quarter of a century. It is of the first visit ever paid to an Indian zenana by a Christian lady. She was the wife of the renowned English missionary, Dr. Mullens. She thus described it:

"In one of the first calls made at a residence not far from my own home, the gentleman could talk a little in English, using a few expressive words. He asked me in to see the ladies of his family, which was what I wanted. They flocked around me, surprised that I could speak in Bengali. I was the first white lady they had ever seen. I asked the Babu why the ladies of his house were not taught to read. He said: 'They no learn, they stupid. You see her,' pointing to his wife, 'she beast, she never learn.' I said: 'Let me try.' 'Very well, you try.' The next day I went again, and if you could have seen the eager eyes of eleven women seated around me, you would have been as excited as I was. On my second visit they flocked around me, caught my hand in theirs, wept, and said: 'You have not forgotten us.' They entreated me to come again, and bring them books, and they would pray to their God to let them study." Another lady engaged in the work writes: "I have known cases where a woman has been fifty years in a house, and never once outside of it."

THE CHARM OF CHRISTIAN SONG.

Miss Christine Belz, who has labored in India uninterruptedly for twenty-two years, recently wrote to a friend in this country respecting her work. The Foreign Missionary publishes the following extract from her letter: "In one zenana I was asked to sing, and sang the hymn, 'Wake, awake, the Lord is coming,' translated into Hindustani. When I had sung one verse, a girl in the zenana said to me, with beaming face: 'Oh, I have read of what you are singing in the New Testament!' and she then began to relate the parable of the ten virgins. Almost all my pupils in the zenana, and their aged mothers, nearly every time I visit them request me to sing one of our Christian hymns. I find singing of great use sometimes when speaking in villages. Occasionally it happens that I meet people who are opposed to the Gospel and make light of judgment and eternity, and try to divert the attention of my hearers. I then sing one or two verses from a bhajan, or hymn, which have reference to the Word which they have tried to oppose, and my opponents become at once quiet and attentive. I do not know that I ever failed in attaining my object when I sang the bhajan, 'Kyün man Chulá hai yih Sansará,' and some women would, when I was singing it, repeat it after me, word for word, with tears in their eyes."

HIDEOUS IDOLS.

The Rev. James Kennedy thus describes the interior of the Golden Temple of Benares, which he visited recently: "Within the temple, with its gilded dome and graceful colonnades, one encounters nothing but offensive sights and odors horrible. The place is sloppy with the water poured out by the worshippers, and is littered with decaying flowers. Hard by is the famous well so foul as to be poisonous. There, too, are figures of Shiva, the deity, seated upon a bull or a dog. The god is given in all his hideousness, with his three eyes covered with ashes and inflamed with intoxicating herbs. His repulsive partner, Durga, is at his side, with her eight arms and her ferocious look, delighting in blood. Hanuman is seen, the monkey god, with his huge tail; Krishna, engaged in his gambols; Ganesh, the god of wisdom, with his elephant head and protuberant belly, and many others beside. Everything is wild, grotesque, unnatural, forbidding, with nothing to purify and raise the people, with everything to pervert their taste and lower their character, and yet giving a faithful representation of the mythology prepared by their religious leaders."

TEN COMING GREAT EVENTS.

THE following remarks were in substance published in 1873 by the Rev. M. Baxter:

Whatever differences of opinion have existed among expositors as to the more minute details of prophetic interpretation, it is remarkable that more than a hundred of them have foreshown in their books (some of which were written as long as fifty years or a century ago) that the great crisis accompanying the Coming of Christ and commencement of the millennium would most probably take place at some point of time between 1866 and 1900; and that consequently there might be expected about that period unparalleled changes, revolutions, and tribulations throughout the whole earth, and the end of this dispensation prove to be the end of the present nineteenth century, or nearly so.

And now that we have arrived at the threshold of this great crisis, we behold their prophetic anticipations signally verified and confirmed. We see of the times clustering around this period, precisely such as are foretold to be accompaniments of the epoch of the consummation.

We see signs in the political world in the drying up of the Turco-Mohammedan empire "that the way of the Jews may be prepared" (Rev. 16:12), and the increased emigration of the Jews to Palestine, and the enlargement of Jerusalem by new buildings, and the consequently approaching close of the times of the Gentiles;* "the many running to and fro and knowledge being increased," as displayed in the enhanced celerity of transit and intercourse throughout the globe by railways, steam vessels, telegraphs, and the printing-press; and the spread of education and knowledge; and the perfection to which arts, sciences, and manufactures are now brought (Dan. 12:4). A clear prediction of railways in the last days is given in Nah. 2:4: "The chariots shall rage in the streets; they shall jostle one against another in the broad ways; they shall seem like torches; they shall run like lightnings."

We also see the energetic and extensive going forth of

THE THREE UNCLEAN SPIRITS;

1, From the Dragon Satan—viz., Antichristian Infidelity, especially as developing in Spiritualism and Rationalism; 2, From the ten-horned wild beast, the Roman Empire—viz., Revolutionary Democracy, as manifested in Radical Demagogism, Socialism, Communism, Internationalism; and 3, from the False Prophet of Romanism and Mohammedanism, as shown in Popish Ultramontaniam and Mohammedan crusading fanaticism, leading on toward agitations and so-called Holy Wars. These three spirits are to leave the nations with their influence,

* "When the Lord shall build up Zion, He shall appear in His glory." Ps. 102:16: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Therefore the Jewish restoration will show the times of the Gentiles to be just reaching their close (Luke 21:24; Ezek. 38).

and to "gather them to battle" to the tremendous war of Armageddon. (See Rev. 16 : 13, 14.)

We see likewise the progress of the countries of the original Roman Empire toward their predicted latter-day form as the clay-iron toes of Daniel's Prophetic Image, by the growing tendency to introduce into their governments the clay or democratic element—i.e., popular representation and universal suffrage or Republicanism; and we are manifestly living near the close of the history of the four consecutive Gentile empires of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, represented by the four parts of Daniel's metallic Image and the four wild beasts, and our present chronological position corresponding with the feet of the image just before the formation of its ten clay-iron toes, upon which Christ, the Messianic Stone, will soon descend to smite and destroy them; after which the Stone Kingdom will become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth during the millennium. (See Dan. 2 : 31-45.)

We see, moreover,

in the active and enlarged missionary exertions for preaching the Gospel of Christ as a witness to all nations; and in the commenced proclamation of the midnight cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh;" by much more being written and spoken about the speedy coming of Christ than heretofore; and also in the great revivals of religion,* in the United States and the British Empire since 1857, by which the Christian Church has been much quickened, many revival preachers raised up, more prayer-meetings established, and salvation through believing in Jesus widely proclaimed in streets and highways, halls and theatres, as well as in churches and chapels. Thus does the Spirit of the Lord raise up a standard when the enemy is coming in like a flood.

The final great crisis will commence at least eleven or twelve years before the end of this dispensation, and will especially include ten leading events: in considering which let us not forget to lift up our hearts in prayer to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, for the Holy Spirit to give us a right understanding of these truths. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him" (Jas. 1 : 5).

Firstly, Great

commencing not later than about eleven or twelve years before the end of this age, and completely transforming by eight or nine years before the end, the now existing twenty-three kingdoms or States within the countries of Cæsar's original Roman Empire into an allied Confederacy of ten kingdoms ruled by ten sovereigns, as represented by the ten horns of Daniel's wild beast (7 : 24).

All standard expositors hold that the Roman Empire of the Cæsars is represented by Daniel's ten-horned wild beast, and also by the ten-toed iron legs of Daniel's metallic human image. The two iron legs corresponded with the Roman Empire's eastern and western divisions, each of which is therefore to become subdivided into exactly five kingdoms in accordance with the five toes upon each leg. And the ten kingdoms must not stand independently apart from each other as at present, but must become allied together in a Confederacy in agreement with the emblem of ten toes united together upon one corporate body, as well as of ten horns united on one head.

The countries of Cæsar's original Roman Empire consist at present (in 1873) of twenty-three kingdoms or States which by great wars and revolutions will be reduced to the number of ten Confederated kingdoms, which will in the main consist of (1) Britain, separated (at least to the extent of their having parliaments of their own) from Ireland and India, and its other colonies which never formed part of Cæsar's Roman Empire; (2) France enlarged to the Rhine, so as to include Belgium, Luxemburg, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, and Tunis, and whatever of Baden, Wurtemberg, and Bavaria is not added to Austria; (3) Spain with Portugal, and Northern Morocco; (4) Italy, probably with Tripoli; (5) Austria, losing its provinces north of the Danube, Bohemia, Moravia, Galicia, but gaining Bosnia, Herzegovina, and part of Servia—five western kingdoms; and (6) Greece, with Thessaly, Epirus, Macedonia, and Albania; (7) Turkey, reduced in size to ancient Thrace-with-Bythinia; (8) Syria separated from Turkey; (9) Egypt; (10) Bulgaria and Roumania, and part of Hungary and of Servia—five eastern kingdoms. Montenegro will be added either to Austria or Greece.

This ten-kingdomed alliance can be produced by no less cause than

of these ten Roman nations to resist military attacks of Germany, and perhaps also Russia, which never have been Roman nations. All this implies tremendous wars.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A "Twisted" Christian.—At a recent meeting Mr. Hopkins said: "One gentleman recently said to another: 'Is Mr. L—a Christian?' Now, mark the reply. 'Well, yes, Godward he is all right, but manward he is just a little twisted.' Of how many people is this only too true! I entreat you, brethren, be not such one-sided Christians, but let Christ so fill you, that both at home and abroad, in public and in private, ye may show the spirit that was in Him."

"Past Redemption Point."—Mr. J. A. Campbell said: "In the river above the Fall of Niagara there is a point called 'Past Redemption Point,' and the reason why it is so called is because if a vessel goes beyond that point it is lost, and no power can bring it back. And, dear friends, there is a 'Past Redemption Point' in all our lives if we do not turn to Jesus; and if we get beyond that point nothing can bring us back, and consequently, like the vessel, we are lost. But, oh, turn into the secure haven of rest, for 'Behold, now is the accepted time, behold now is the day of salvation!'"

A New View of Christ.—"In the Year 1873, thirteen years after I had given my heart to the Lord Jesus, I got a fresh view of Him from one of His blessed promises. A passage in the Word of God changed my whole life. When Christ could keep me while standing, I saw that He was able to lead me step by step. I saw that it was not only a beautiful passage to look at and admire, but could claim it as mine. There I cast myself on God for the deepening of my spiritual life. Just as a sinking man throws himself on a log, and finds that it will carry him, so I trusted wholly to Christ, and I can now rejoice in a deeper knowledge of His love. But how many hindrances come in the way if we want this greater blessing! I remember very well how it was with myself."

A Chained Man.—"I know a Young Gentleman who was brought up in a God-fearing home. He never tasted whiskey or any alcohol until he attained the age of seventeen, and he had never seen it on his father's table. At that age a friend said to him: 'Come and have a drink.' 'No,' he replied, 'I am a total abstainer, I never tasted strong drink.' His companion urged, and the lad yielded; he liked it; he repeated the dose again, and from that time my friend Alick became a drunkard. He held a high position in life; his father left him ten thousand pounds and a college education, and with these he might have been looked up to and respected had it not been for this accursed drink. At one time, after he was married, he was living with me, and one night on entering my bed-room I heard a fumbling noise in my cabinet. On going over to ascertain the cause of it I found poor Alick groping in the darkness, only half clad, for his wife had locked away his clothing from him to prevent him going out. He was feeling for a bottle which contained a burning fluid made up of turpentine, alcohol, and other ingredients which we used for lamps. He was about to swallow the poisonous compound, when I rushed forward and dashed it from his hand. 'Alick,' I said, 'what is this you are about?' Turning to me with a piteous look, he said: 'Oh, if you only knew the terrible desire I have for drink.' Then I sat down and talked to him, when he said: 'I have a chain wrapped round and round me from which I shall never be freed. I am a bond-slave to drink.' He died shortly afterward, and his last words were: 'Oh, wife, for God's sake give me some more brandy.' Thus my friend Alick passed away."

A Minister Invited to a Dance.—The Rev. Mr. McFarlane related the following incidents:

"One night I was going to attend a lecture in the centre of the town, and not being acquainted with the district I went into the building by the wrong entrance. After climbing one stair, I saw a young man and a young woman standing on the landing, and when I made my appearance the young man took a pipe from his mouth, and asked me for what place I was looking. On being informed, he said: 'It is just a dancing hall that is up-stairs,' and then he invited me to come up with them and have a dance, which was about to begin, and which they were going to attend. I then spoke to that young man of the danger in which he was, and found that he had a soft spot in his heart. Before leaving him he promised me that he would come to our Gospel meeting, where I trust God will meet with him, and that he may be led to see the fearful danger of those dancing halls."

A Man without a Soul.—Mr. Robertson Related: "The other night in a meeting I heard a north country minister tell this story. He said: 'On one occasion, when I was going round the district to call upon my people, I entered a farmhouse. After the family and the servants were gathered in, and I had begun to speak to them, I noticed from the window a man working in one of the farmer's fields. "Who is that?" I inquired of the farmer; "I thought you said they were all gathered in." "Oh, yes," he replied, "that is only Silly John; there is no use bringing him in." "He ought to have been brought in with the others," I said; "send for him at once." The man was accordingly sent for, and brought in, and before leaving I said to him, "Well, John, have you a soul?" "No, I have no soul," he said. "Have you no soul, John?" I said again. "No, sir, I have got no soul, for I gave it Jesus long ago." I turned from the farm-house thinking of that verse in God's Word: "The wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein.""

A Cannibal Converted in a Canoe.—The Rev. W. B. Nicolson, M.A., related: "Some years ago in British Columbia there dwelt an Indian chief, fierce, cruel, and vindictive in the extreme, and a cannibal from choice. On one occasion, in a furious passion, he almost took the life of William Duncan, the missionary to those parts. But afterward by God's blessing on his preaching the man became ashamed of his own cruelties and wickedness. He went to live at the mission station, so that he might learn to lead a better life. For a long time all went well, but it was only a moral change. He did not yet know the power of God unto salvation, and his evil passions only slept. One day he told his friend, the missionary, that he was determined to go back to his people and his old habits for a time. The moral restraint to his unrenowned nature was more than he could bear, and next morning he set out in his canoe. But when he was alone on the waters the Holy Spirit of God met him, and strove with him. All he had heard of Christ and His love came home with new power to his heart, and there alone on the bosom of the great lake he gave himself to God. The canoe was instantly turned toward the mission station, and the missionary had the joy of receiving his old pupil a new man in Christ."

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Decisive Vote on the Silver Question was taken in the House on Thursday last. Its evident meaning is the postponement of all legislation on the subject by this Congress. Mr. Bland's proposal for free and unlimited coinage of silver dollars was the matter under consideration. Before it came to a vote an amendment was offered suspending the coinage of silver dollars altogether. That was defeated by a vote of 201 to 84. Mr. Bland's bill was then submitted to a vote, and that also was negated by 163 to 126. The result, therefore, is that no change is made, and the Government is still required to coin two million silver dollars every month. Neither political party goes on record as a party by this vote. Of the 163 votes cast against the bill, 70 were cast by Democrats and 93 by Republicans. Of the 126 votes cast for the bill, 97 were cast by Democrats and 29 by Republicans. Classified by States there is little change to be noted in the attitude of the sections. Of the 84 members who voted for suspension, 30 were from New York, 20 from Pennsylvania, 5 from New Jersey, 5 from Maryland, 18 from New England, 2 from South Carolina, 1 from Kentucky, 2 from Illinois, and 1 from Minnesota.

The Admission of Washington Territory as a State was agreed to by the Senate, on April 10th, by a vote of thirty to thirteen. An effort was made to transfer the power in such matters from the President to Congress. Mr. Morgan moved that the Constitution of the new State should be approved by Congress preliminary to admission. This provision was to take the place of the section in the bill that a proclamation by the President, after the Territory had complied with the provisions of the bill, should place Washington in the roll of States. Mr. Morgan's argument was that this power to admit or keep out a State would be dangerous in the hands of a President, whose re-election might depend upon his action. The proposal was rejected. It is expected that the House will veto the Senate's action.

A Defiant Letter was Read at the Mormon General Conference held at Provo, U. T., on April 6th, from the two leaders who have absconded—John Taylor, the President of the Church, and George Q. Cannon, recently the Utah Delegate to Congress. Both are in hiding to avoid arrest for polygamy, and Cannon has forfeited his bail. The letter exhorts to a continuance of polygamy, and protests against persecution. In the course of their denunciations the leaders say: "Those bringing the persecutions would deny us rights as citizens. We were born free men and women, and owe it to ourselves and the people of this land to maintain those principles and transmit them unimpaired to posterity. We demand freedom, not beg it, under our rights as citizens dwelling under the flag of the Republic. The present crusade is nothing but religious persecution, and will yet be so recognized by the world." The writers appear to forget that they are treated only as other polygamists and all convicted criminals are treated in the States. Though all are born free men and women, their freedom is taken from them when they break the laws. They are simply criminals trying to pose as martyrs.

More Bloodshed in Connection with the Great railroad strike is reported. The companies two weeks ago advertised for "men of grit" to go to St. Louis and act as deputy sheriffs. They received plenty of applicants in response, and accepted a large number. These they armed with Winchester rifles and Colt's revolvers. On Friday they were set to guard the Louisville and Nashville yards in East St. Louis. There was a large crowd of strikers present with a number of spectators, but no attempt was made to interfere with the trains. The mob, however, jeered the gang of ruffians imported from Texas, Tennessee, and other States to act as deputy sheriffs, and after a time some mischievous boys began throwing stones. The armed officers then deliberately levelled their rifles and fired several volleys into the crowd, killing five men and one woman, and wounding two men and a child. There was but one striker among the killed. The outrage drove the strikers to frenzy, and that night the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad freight depot at East St. Louis was set on fire, and property valued at $150,000 was destroyed.

Rhode Island Declared for Prohibition by constitutional amendment on April 7th. It elected the whole of the Republican State ticket with the exception of the Republican candidate for Attorney-General. The Prohibitionists indorsed Colonel Metcalf, the Democratic candidate for that office, and he was elected. The exact figures of the majority in favor of the prohibition amendment have not been published at the time of going to press, but they are said to be overwhelming. A great jubilee meeting was held at Providence on Thursday night. One hundred guns were fired in honor of the passage of the prohibition amendment, and the largest hall in the city was packed by a jubilant audience, who listened to speeches of thanksgiving that Rhode Island had been the fourth in the sisterhood of States to put prohibition into the fundamental law. A Law and Order League was formed at the close of the meeting.

A Shocking Railroad Disaster Occurred near Deerfield, Mass., on April 7th. The eastern express, which passes that point about six o'clock in the evening, was running along the edge of the embankment, which is two hundred feet above the Deerfield River, when the track settled under it and the cars rolled down the embankment. Some halted on the edge of the river, and others rolled into the water. They caught fire from the overturned stoves, and immediately piercing shrieks told the sad tale of suffering going on within. There were about fifty people in the train, of whom ten were killed and thirty severely injured. How any escaped alive is a mystery. Some of the cars turned over five times in the descent. They were, of course, broken up when they reached the bottom, thus enabling passengers who were able to move to climb out and avoid death by drowning or burning.

Mr. Gladstone's Scheme for the Pacification of Ireland was presented to the British Parliament on April 8th. The following are its principal features: An Irish Parliament to be established in Ireland to legislate for the whole country except in matters appertaining to the crown, the national defence, and foreign affairs. The Parliament to consist of three classes. The first, twenty-eight peers who now sit in the British House of Lords, and who will have seats for life in the Irish Parliament; the second class to be seventy-five members, who must be worth $20,000 each, to be elected for ten years by voters who pay a rent of over $125 a year; the third class two hundred and six members elected for that Parliament only, by household suffrage. That will give a house of three hundred and nine members, who will sit and vote together, or, if they prefer, separate into two houses, of which the first and second classes will constitute one house and the third class the other, and either house can veto the work of the other. There will still be a viceroy, who will be appointed by the Queen. England will control the police, and the Irish Government will pay for them. England will also regulate the tariff and the excise, and collect the proceeds. The Irish Parliament must not establish or endow a national church. Ireland must contribute toward the interest on the national debt and the expenses of the imperial government. Her share will be one fifteenth of the whole. Her present income would pay that tribute and $2,020,000 over, which the Irish Parliament could dispose of. Ireland would not be allowed to send representatives to the British Parliament.

The Principle Underlying Mr. Gladstone's scheme is one that has already been adopted in governing Canada and Australia. It is that the people governed must choose the men to legislate for them. They have confidence in the justice and beneficence of laws enacted by men who know the country and whom they have elected. At present the Irish people know that English and Scotch statesmen have far more to do with making laws for Ireland than have Irishmen. They consequently distrust even good laws. If they are misgoverned when they have a Parliament of their own, their discontent will naturally show itself by electing another Parliament to take its place, and there will be no need to send dynamite to Westminster. They may even become loyal like the Canadians, who, since they obtained their own Legislature, love the Queen better than people in England do, who see more of her. Whether under such a scheme Ireland would be better governed than she is now, may be doubted. The way Irishmen govern in New York does not make us hopeful. The concession of self-government, however, is undoubtedly just. In these days it would be disgraceful to govern her, as Russia governs Poland, by the sword, and in the present attitude of the Irish there is no alternative between that and self-government. Under English government the people are poor and miserable. Perhaps, being priest-ridden, they would be poor and miserable under any government; but when they say, as they did by their votes in overwhelming majority, "Let us try if we can do better for ourselves than you English have done for us," justice demands that they be allowed to try. This scheme gives them practically as much autonomy as our Territories have. After a time England may try the Federal system for the whole empire, and then Ireland, with Canada and Australia, will attain the autonomy of our States.

Students of Prophecy Should not Fail to mark Mr. Gladstone's proposal. It is one of the most conspicuous signs of our times. For many years expositors have told us that Ireland must be legislatively separate from England in the days that immediately precede the final tribulation. As far back as 1866—twenty years ago—the Rev. M. Baxter, writing of the condition of the world in the period of coming trouble, said: "Great Britain will be governmentally separated from Ireland on account of the latter being outside the Roman Empire—at least to the extent of a separate legislature being granted to Ireland, so that it will be practically governed by an Irish Parliament, even if a nominal connection with Britain is still maintained." This measure may be rejected, but the fact that the Premier of England—the most powerful statesman in Great Britain—deliberately proposes to establish an Irish Parliament indicates that the prophecy is near fulfilment. It cannot be long delayed, and the practical lesson it teaches is the near approach of the days which such an event heralds (Heb. 10: 25).

A Farewell Meeting to a Party of Missionaries about to proceed to Ceylon under the auspices of the American Board of Foreign Missions was held in New York on April 8th. The party consists of the Rev. Samuel W. Howland and wife, his sister, Miss Susan Howland, and Miss Hetty Houston, of Denmark, Iowa. The Howland family are not new to the work, having been in Ceylon on the mission for twelve years. During the past year they have been in this country collecting funds. At the ladies' meeting Mrs. Howland made an address, and the Rev. Mr. Howland spoke at the gentlemen's meeting, as did also the Rev. Talbot W. Chambers. The party sailed on Saturday in the Umbria.

At a Union Meeting Held in New York on April 5th, of the New York Conference, the New York East Conference, and the Newark Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, there were present about seven hundred and fifty ministers, a larger number, it was said, than were ever present at the General Triennial Methodist Conference of the United States, and representing in their united conferences 138,135 members of the Church. Bishop Hurst, in delivering an address of welcome, gave a sketch of early Methodist history, showing a growth from one pastor, Rev. Thomas Rankin, in 1773, in New York, and ten in the Colonies, to eleven thousand in 1886, in the United States. The reports of growth from all the States represented were encouraging.

The Mission in Chicago, Conducted by Sam Jones and Sam Small, closed on April 4th. At the concluding service the Casino Rink was crowded to excess. It is estimated that nine thousand persons were present, and over ten thousand were unable to gain admission. The collections for the afternoon and evening amounted to $1250. It is estimated that two hundred and sixty thousand persons have attended the revival services. Mr. Jones goes thence to Columbus, Miss., and thence to Baltimore. It is expected that Mr. Small and he will return to Chicago next September. The Interior of that city says of the services: "These brethren have been abundant in their labors and untiring in their efforts to sow the good seed of the Word of God. While great good has been done through the meetings led by them, still the time, we judge, has not yet come to estimate the full value of their preaching."

A Novel Church Organization has Been formed in St. Luke's Church, Brooklyn. It is known as the Neaniskoi, the word which is used in 1 John 2:14: "I have written unto you young men, because ye are strong," etc. It includes members of the young men's Bible class and the oldest boys in the Sunday-school of the parish. The objects are to band together young men for effective and systematic church work, to promote habits and principles of soberness, purity, and reverence, and to extend knowledge of religious and church principles. About fifty young men have joined the society, and solemnly took the obligation one by one after the rector, the Rev. George R. Van De Water. The vow prohibits drinking in public bar-rooms and saloons, and frequenting immoral places; and it enjoins temperance, purity, reverence, and abstinence from indecent and profane language.

The Services Held in Charleston by Messrs. Moody and Sankey stirred that city to an unprecedented degree. The pastors of the city prepared for the visit of the evangelists by holding special services and daily prayer-meetings in the principal churches. On the day appointed for the first service the train by which Mr. Moody travelled from Jacksonville, Fla., was delayed, and at the request of the pastors the service was conducted by Mr. J. E. K. Studd, the young Englishman, who has been holding services in our colleges and who, with his wife, had arrived the night before from Richmond. After the preliminary exercises Mr. Studd, in a simple, earnest manner, related the incident connected with his own and his brother's being brought under Mr. Moody's influence, and the steps which led to his brother consecrating himself to the work in China. Mr. Moody arrived before the conclusion of the service, and though he had been travelling all night and had not had time to go to his hotel, he delivered an earnest address. Dense crowds gathered at each of the services. Mr. Moody solved the colored question by preaching once every day in a colored church.

The Record of an Appalling Bargain was found in the room of a suicide in Omaha, Neb., on April 6th. A dispatch from that city says that a young and beautiful woman, refined and well educated, drifted there in a state of degradation, in which she continued to sink rapidly. It was learned that she had deserted a home in which she might have enjoyed every comfort of life. On Tuesday of last week she was found in her room dead from a heavy dose of morphine. In searching her apartment a memorandum was found written in blood, apparently taken from her own arm. It ran: "I—hereby sell my soul to the devil, in consideration of which he agrees to give me wealth, beauty, and the power to overcome all my enemies." It is probable that the woman was demented when she wrote the memorandum. It is unconceivable that any one in their sober senses would make such a bargain and put it on record. There are, however, many people who act on the same principle, serving the devil for wealth and worldly advancement; but they generally cherish the hope that they will escape the penalty by a death-bed repentance. Christ's method is the only safe one (Matt. 4:8-10).

A Boy without a Country has recently been accepted by the United States as a future citizen. He was born, two years ago, on the high seas, while his parents were travelling from New York to France. His father was a naturalized German-American, and his mother an Italian. The mother died a few days after her arrival on French soil, and the father also died shortly afterward. The French Government refused to administer the father's estate or to appoint a guardian for the friendless infant, because neither of the parents was a French citizen. The father had abjured his allegiance to the Emperor of Germany, so the German minister would not interfere; and as the child was born at sea, and not on an American ship, the American Consul had no right to claim him as an American subject. He was, however, interested from benevolent motives, and now, after two years' correspondence, he has been permitted to take charge of the little national outcast. It may be hoped that the boy, when he grows up, will be satisfied with the citizenship conferred upon him. A matter of still greater moment to him will be that of becoming a member of the kingdom of heaven. Happily that citizenship has been secured for him if he will avail himself of its privileges (Eph. 2:19).

A Touching Story of a Dog's Fidelity Comes from California. The Stockton Mail states that a German traveller named Vosguards was a passenger, on February 2d, by steamer from that city to San Francisco. The traveller had a small dog, of which he seemed to be very fond. At Black Slough landing the man went ashore for a few minutes, and when he returned to the steamer the dog missed him, and was left behind. He leaped into the water, and followed in the boat's wake, but could not overtake the steamer. Vosguards went into tears, and begged the captain to stop or let him ashore, but the boat kept on her way. A man who happened to be standing on the levee four miles below Black Slough caught sight of the dog, which was steadily swimming on after the steamer—although the latter was out of the dog's sight—called the canine ashore, and took him to a landing. The persistent doggie was taken to Stockton the next day by the incoming steamer, and a telegram was wired to Vosguards. That the dog should have continued swimming after his master after he could no longer see him is proof of his yearning attachment. There come times in the Christian's experience when the dog's example would be useful. While living in the world the world's cares, temptations, and sin cause him to lose sight momentarily of his Lord, but if he follows in His footsteps and earnestly seeks His face he comes into His presence again (Isa. 54:8).

Help was Refused by a Shipwrecked Crew recently. Captain C. A. Todd, who arrived at Baltimore last week from Galway, reports that on his voyage he sighted the French brigantine Dix Frères. She was dismayed and in a sinking condition. Captain Todd sent his boat to take off her crew, but only four men would leave the ship. The captain and the other sailors acted in a strange manner, and declared they would remain. Warnings and entreaties were useless, and finally the infatuated men went below, leaving no one on deck. The four men who were saved say that there was a large quantity of rum on board, and that the captain and his men were drinking heavily. As the sea was very rough and a high wind blowing nothing could be done, and they were left to their fate. Deliverance was offered and refused; what more could be done for them? Thousands of men are going down to eternal death all around us, of whom the like may be said (Prov. 1:24-27).

A Treasure was Found in a Field Last Week in South Carolina. A dispatch to the Times from Batesburg, S. C., says that a well-known farmer near that city, while ploughing his field across the Saluda River, was astonished to see the ploughshare turn up a quaint looking old earthen pot. Continuing his row, the farmer paid no attention to the pot, but on the return trip he stopped to examine it, and found that it contained gold coin of some kind. Gathering his new-found treasure, he wended his way to a Batesburg bank, and after the cashier had carefully examined the "find," it was pronounced to be worth $12,000. News of the discovery soon spread over the county, and in a half dozen hours a whole crowd of people were examining the field in search of other hidden treasure. The coin is old and quaint, and bears evidence of having come from different nationalities. How it found its way into the field or when it was deposited is not conjectured. It is evident that no time was lost by the people who heard of the find in looking for something like it for themselves. It is a pity that the same eagerness is not displayed by people who hear that a neighbor has found that greater treasure to which the Saviour likened a treasure hid in a field (Matt. 13:44).

A Faithful Swedish Lady was Married in Kansas City, Mo., recently. She arrived in New York eight months ago seeking her lover. About a year before she was living in Stockholm with her father, who was a toy manufacturer of some wealth. One of her father's employes, named Hanson, loved her, and sought her in marriage, but the father refused his consent, because Hanson, though respectable and industrious, was poor. Hanson then emigrated to America, promising to return and marry her when he had made his fortune. He did not make a fortune—in fact, was scarcely able to keep himself from starvation. Becoming discouraged he ceased to write to the girl he loved. Her father died eight months after Hanson left, and then the girl, refusing all offers for her hand, sailed for America to find her lover. She was cheated and robbed in New York of all the money she had with her, and had to work as a domestic servant. She never relinquished her search however, and finally, two weeks ago, she received intelligence that Hanson had found work in Kansas City. She set out for that place immediately, and the Missouri journals now chronicle the marriage of the happy pair. We can imagine how the husband, if he is a true man, must love the wife to whose untiring effort he owes his happiness. In that higher relation, of which marriage is a type, the conditions were reversed. How much ought Christ to be loved, having endured humiliation and suffering to win His bride, whom He redeemed with His blood (Eph. 5:25-27)?

ACCEPTANCE FOR THE PERFECT.

A Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"It shall be perfect to be accepted: there shall be no blemish therein."—LEVITICUS 22: 21.

The Requirements of the Law—Carefulness before God—Blood Everywhere—I. The Rule Given—Offerings Must be Perfect—Self Righteousness Excluded—The Hereditary Taint—The Actual Blemishes—Priestly Performances Futile—II. The Perfect Sacrifice of Christ—In Nature—In Life—The Proportion of the Offering to the Debt.

THE ceremonial law, as ordained by the hand of Moses and Aaron, called the worshippers of God to great carefulness before Him. Before their minds that solemn truth was ever made visible, "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God." Nothing might be done thoughtlessly. Due heed was the first requisite in a man who would draw near unto the thrice-holy God, whose perfections demand lowly and considerate reverence from all those who are round about Him. The spirit must be awake, and on the stretch, if it would please the great Father of spirits. There were little points—I may truthfully call them minutiae—upon which everything would depend as to and its acceptance with the Lord. Of every ceremony, it might be said: "It must be perfect to be accepted." There was the rule, and the rule must be followed with the most careful exactness. God must have the minds and thoughts of men, or He counts that they are no worshippers.

This is no easy lesson to learn, dear friends; for I am afraid that in our usual worship we are not always as thoughtful as we ought to be. Mark well our singing. Do we join in it with the heartiness, the solemnity, and the correctness which are due to Him who hears our psalms and hymns? I may not judge, but I have my suspicions. Look at the way we pray. Is it not to be feared that at times we rush into God's presence and utter the first words that come to hand? Are not liturgies repeated with minds half asleep? Are not extempore prayers uttered in the most formal manner? I refer both to public and private prayer. Moreover, see the style in which some will even preach. With facility of language they will deliver themselves of their own thoughts, without seeking the anointing from on high, and the power of the Spirit of God. I do not say that any of you ever go into your Sunday-school classes without thought; I do not say that any of you ever take your tract district, and go from door to door without seeking a blessing; I will not say that any of you ever come to the communion-table without examining yourselves, and discerning the Lord's body; but, if I do not say it, I may think it, and possibly that thought may be true. Oh, my brethren, let conscience sit in judgment, and decide this matter!

BLOOD EVERYWHERE.

Under the law of Moses, the guilt of sin and the need of atonement were always most vividly brought before the mind of the worshipping Israelite. If you stepped within the holy place, everywhere you saw the marks of blood. Our very delicate-minded friends, who raise the silly objection that they cannot bear the sound of the word "blood"—what would they have done if they had gone into the Jewish tabernacle, and had seen the floor, and the curtain, and every article stained, like a shambles? How would they have endured to worship where the blood was poured in bowls upon the floor, and sprinkled on almost every holy thing? How would they have borne with the continual bespattering of blood—all indicating that without shedding of blood there is no remission of sin? Truly, there can be no approach to a thrice-holy God without the remission of sin, and that remission of sin must be obtained through the atoning blood.

The Israelite, if he thought rightly, must have been deeply aware that he served a God who was terrible out of His holy places, who hated sin, and would by no means spare the guilty, or pardon man without atonement. All the more would this be sealed home upon the mind of the Israelite by the knowledge that in every case the sacrifice must be unblemished. As he looked on the blood of the victim, he would remember the sacred rule, "it shall be perfect to be accepted." He saw in the necessity for a perfect sacrifice a declaration of the holiness of God. He must have felt that sin was not a trifle—not a thing to be committed, winked at, and blotted out, but a thing for which there must be life given, and blood shed, before it could be removed; and that life and blood must be the life and blood of a perfect and unblemished offering.

In this text we have law and gospel too; there is the law which tells us that the sacrifice must be perfect to be accepted; and behind it there is the blessed hint that there is such an unblemished sacrifice which is accepted, which we may by faith bring to God without fear of being rejected. Oh, for grace to learn both law and gospel at this time!

I. First, then,

of our text, "It shall be perfect to be accepted," may be used to shut out all those faulty offerings whereon so many place their confidence. It most effectually judges, and casts forth as vile, all self-righteousness, although this is the great deceit wherewith thousands are buoyed up with false hopes. Alas! this is the destroyer of myriads. If you can come up to this rule you shall be saved by your righteousness; but if you cannot reach this mark, if you come short in any degree whatever, you must fail of acceptance. It is not said: "It shall be partially good to be accepted;" or "it shall be hopefully good." No. "It shall be perfect to be accepted." It is not written, "It shall have no great and grievous blemish;" but "There shall be no blemish therein." See you not the height of the standard, the absolute completeness of the model set before you?

Why, look ye, sirs, ye that hope to be saved by your own doings, your nature at the very first is tainted! God's Word assures you that it is so. There is evil in your heart from the very beginning; so that you are not perfect, and are not without blemish. This sad fact spoils all at the very beginning. You are yourself blemished and imperfect. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one. If the fountain be tainted, shall the streams be pure? Do you think it possible that you, who are a fallen man in your very parentage, in whom there is a bias toward evil, can possibly render perfect service unto God?

TAINTED SERVICE.

Look again; for I feel sure that there must have been a blemish somewhere as matter of fact. As yet you are not conscious of a blemish, or of a fault; and possibly there is some justification for this unconsciousness. Looking upon you, I feel inclined to love you, as Jesus loved that young man who could say of the commandments, "All these have I kept from my youth up." But I must beg you to answer this question—Has there not been a blemish in your motives? What have you been doing all these good things for? "Why, that I might be saved!" Precisely so. Therefore, selfishness has been the motive which has ruled your life. Every self-righteous man is a selfish man. I am sure he is. At the bottom, that is the motive of the best life that is ever lived which is not actuated by faith in Jesus Christ. The law is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." But you have loved yourself, and lived for yourself; how then can you have kept the first precept of the law?

Moreover, it is not only your nature and your motive which are imperfect. My dear friend, you certainly must have erred somewhere or other, in some act of your life. If you can say that you have served God and man without fault throughout all your days, you can say much more than I would venture to do. The Scripture also is dead against you when it says, "there is none righteous; no, not one." If you can say that in no one action of your life, select what you may, was there anything blameworthy, anything that fell short, anything that could be censured, you say very much more than the best of men have ever claimed for themselves.

ABSOLUTE PERFECTION.

It must be perfect to be accepted; there must be no blemish in it. This is a death-blow for your self-confidence; for there was a time, some day or other in your life, in which you did wrong. What! have you no hasty temper? Have no quick words escaped you, which you would wish to recall? What! have you never murmured against God, or complained of His providence? Have you never been slothful when you ought to have been diligent? Have you never been careless when you ought to have been prayerful? Have you always spoken the truth? Has a falsehood never fallen from your lips? Can you say that your heart has never desired evil—never imagined impurity? Recollect, the thought of evil is sin; even a wanton desire is a blemish in the life, and an unchaste imagination is a stain upon the character in the sight of God, though not in the sight of man. "It shall be perfect to be accepted."

Have you never gone to live in an old house which looked like new? You had and varnish, and paper in superabundance; and you thought yourself dwelling in one of the sweetest of places, till, one day, it happened that a board was taken up, and you saw under the floor. What a gathering of every foul thing! You could not have lived in that house at peace for a minute had you known what had been covered up. Rottenness had been hidden, decay had been doctored, death had been decorated. That is just like our humanity. We put on fresh paper and varnish and paint, and we look very respectable; and yet from below an abomination of the sewer-gas of sin comes steaming up, enough to kill everything that is like goodness within us; while all manner of creeping lusts and venomous passions swarm in the secret corners of our nature. When lusts are quiet, they are all there. As surely as the chief of sinners are unaccepted, so surely are you; for a righteousness must be perfect to be accepted. There must be no blemish in it; and that is no case with your righteousness. You know it is not.

"Well," says one, "this is very hard doctrine." I mean it to be so; for I love you too well to deceive you. When a door has to be shut to save life, there is no use in half-shutting it. If a person may be killed by going through it, you had better board it up, or brick it up. I want to brick up the dangerous opening of self-confidence, for it leads to deception, disappointment, and despair. The way to heaven by works is only possible to a man who is absolutely perfect; and none of you are in that condition. Do not pretend to it, or you will be arant liars. I put no fine face upon it—you are not perfect, no, not one of you; for "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God."

FUTILE MUMMERY.

Thus, then, our text shuts out all self-righteousness. It also shuts out all priestly performances. There is a notion among some people that the priest is to save them, alias the minister, for men easily in these charitable days make even Dissenting ministers into priests. I have heard people say: "Just as I employ a lawyer to attend to my temporal business, and I do not bother my head any more about it; so I employ my priest or my clergyman to attend to my spiritual business, and there is an end of it." This is evil talk, and ruinous to the man who indulges in it.

I will speak of this priestcraft very plainly. Recollect, "it shall be perfect to be accepted;" therefore all that this gentleman does for you must be perfect. I do not know what it is that he does, I am sure. I never could make out what a priest of the Roman or Anglican order can be supposed to do in his highest function of the mass. I have seen him walk this way, and I have seen him walk that way; and I have seen him turn his back, and it has been decorated with crosses and other embellishments; and I have seen him turn his face; and I have seen him bow; and I have seen him drink wine and water; and I have seen him munch wafers; and I have seen him perform many genuflections and prostrations; but what the performance meant I have not been able to gather. To me it seemed

A MEANINGLESS DISPLAY.

I should not like to risk my soul on it.

Everything, you know, depends upon the intention of the priest. If a good intention be not there, according to the dictates of his own Church, it is all good for nothing, so that your souls all hang upon the intention of a poor mortal in a certain dress. Perhaps he has not after all been rightly anointed, and is not in the apostolical succession! Perhaps there is no apostolical succession! Perhaps the man himself is living in mortal sin! Ah, me! there are many dangers about your confidence. Are you going to hang your soul on that man's orders or disorders? Mine is too heavy to hang upon so slender a nail, driven into such rotten wood.

This text makes a clean sweep of all other kinds of human confidences. Some are deceived in this sort: "Well," they say, "I do not trust in my works; but I am a religious person, and I attend the sacrament, and I go to my place of worship pretty regularly. I feel that I must certainly be right. I have faith in Jesus Christ and in myself." In various ways men thus compose an image whose feet are part of iron and part of clay. With that kind of mangle-mangle, many unconsciously are contenting themselves. But hear ye this word, "it shall be perfect to be accepted; there shall be no blemish therein." If we trust Christ and nothing else, that will be perfect; but if you are trusting Christ up to fifteen ounces in the pound, and yourself for the last ounce of the sixteen, you will be a lost man; for that last ounce is an ounce of imperfection, and therefore you cannot be accepted of God.

II. This brings me to note, with great delight of heart, that as this rule shuts out all other confidences, so this rule shuts us up to

THE SACRIFICE OF JESUS.

O beloved, if I had the tongues of men and of angels, I could never fitly tell you of Him who offered Himself without spot unto God, for He is absolutely perfect; there is no blemish in Him!

He is perfect in His nature as God and man. No stain defiled His birth, no pollution touched His body or His soul. The prince of this world himself, with keenest eyes, came and searched the Saviour, but He found nothing in Him. "In all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." There was not the possibility of sinning about the Saviour—no tendency that way, no desire that way. Nothing that could be construed into evil ever came upon His character. Our perfect sacrifice is without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing.

Look at His life of obedience, and see how perfect that was. Which commandment did He ever break? Which duty of relationship did He ever forget? He honored the law of God, and loved the souls of men. He gave the character of God perfect reflection in His human life. You can see what God is as you see what Christ is. He is perfect, even as His Father who is in heaven is perfect. There is no redundancy, or excess, or superfluity in His character, even as there is no coming short in any point.

Look at the perfection of His sacrifice. He gave His body to be tortured, and His mind to be crushed and broken, even unto the death-agony. He gave Himself for us a perfect sacrifice. All that the law could ask was in Him. Stretch the measure to its utmost length, and still Christ goes beyond, rather than falls short of the measure of the requirements of justice. He has given to His Father double for all our sins. My heart rejoices as I think of Gethsemane and Calvary and of Him who by one offering hath perfectly sanctified all who put their trust in Him. "It is finished," said He, and finished it is forever. Our Lord has presented a perfect sacrifice. "It shall be perfect to be accepted;" and it is perfect. "There shall be no blemish therein;" and there is no blemish in it. Glory be to God Most High!

THE PASSOVER BLOOD.

That delightful passage in Exodus came flashing up to my mind just now, where the Israelite sprinkled the blood on the lintel and the two side-posts. Then he shut the door. He was inside; he did not see the blood any more. The blood was outside upon the posts, and he could not see it himself; but was he safe? Yes, because it is written, "When I see the blood, I will pass over you." It is God's sight of the blood of His dear Son that is the everlasting safeguard of all who are in Christ. Though it is most precious and sweet to me to look at that blood once shed for many for the remission of sins, and I do look at it; yet, if ever there should come a dark night to me in which I cannot see it, still God will see it, and I am safe.

THE THANKSGIVING OFFERING.

Well, now, as is too often the case, I have run on so much upon the first points that I have not time enough for much more; but I was going to finish up by saying that I address myself for a minute or two to Christians only. Listen, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that know the Lord! You are saved. You have not, therefore, to bring any sacrifice by way of a sin-offering, but you have to bring sacrifices of thanksgiving. It is your reasonable service that you offer your bodies a living sacrifice unto God. If you do this you cannot bring an absolutely perfect sacrifice, but you must labor to let it be perfect in what is often the biblical sense of perfection.

Beloved brethren, you must take care that what you bring is not blind, for the blind were not to be offered. You must serve God with a single eye to the glory of God. If you attend a prayer-meeting, or teach a class, or preach a sermon, you must not do it with a view to your own selves in any way, or it cannot be accepted. The sacrifice must see; it must be intelligent, reasonable service, having for its object the glory of God. It must in that sense be perfect to be accepted.

NO BROKEN BITS.

And as it must not be blind, so it must not be broken. Whenever we serve God, we must do it with the whole of our being, for if we try to serve God with a bit of our nature, and leave the rest unconsecrated, we shall not be accepted. Certain professors prefer one class of Christian duties, and they neglect others; this must not be. Christ gave "Himself" for you, and you must give your whole self to Him. To be acceptable the life must be entire; there must be complete consecration of every faculty. How is it with you? Have you brought to the Lord a divided sacrifice? If so, He claims the whole.

Would God that the best of our lives, the best hours of the morning, the best skill of our hands, the best thoughts of our minds, the very cream of our being, were given to our God! But, alas! Christ's cause is sent round to the back door to get the broken meat; and, "Mind you do not leave too much meat on the bone," is the kind of instruction that is given to her who hands it out. Christ Jesus is sent to the dust-heap for the odds and ends. Cheese-parings, and candle-ends are given to the Missionary Society. Perhaps the statement is too liberal: it would be well if they were. To God's altar we ought to bring the best bullock from the stall, and the best sheep from the fold. I leave you to yourselves to judge whether it be not so. If you are not over head and ears in debt to the mercy of God in Christ, then it is not so; but if you are debtors to divine mercy beyond all compute, you shall each one reckon up for himself—"How much owest thou unto my Lord?" If it be a debt you can never calculate, then give the Lord from this day forth the fulness of your being. May God grant that you and your offerings may be accepted in Christ Jesus! Amen and amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

An Indian Monkey Temple.*

ON the way to Calcutta I stopped for a day at the holy city of Benares, the Hindoo Mecca, and the headquarters of Brahminism. We drove to the Monkey Temple, situated just outside the native town. Along the road leading to the temple there were monkeys chasing each other up and down, sitting on the stone walls, and climbing about the trees, their numbers increasing until we reached the temple itself. So far as its architecture is concerned, this temple amounts to almost nothing. In the centre of a paved yard stands a small stone pagoda, no larger than a sentry-box, in which is a stone image of a hideous black goddess (Doorga), hung with wreaths of marigolds, beside which a stuffed monkey would be beautiful. Surrounding this open yard is a high stone wall like the walls of a house, furnished all around with shelves and niches for the accommodation of the monkeys. Adjoining this enclosure is a fine tank; a widespreading banyan overshadows the place, and that is all there is of this venerated monkey temple.

Buying half a gallon of gram from a priest at the entrance, we stepped within the enclosure, and then another priest, who was with us, cried out: "Ah! ah! ah!" Directly there was a grand rush through the doorways, over the walls and from the top of the banyan, as about a hundred and fifty monkeys of all ages, sizes, and degrees of fatness came crowding around us to be fed. Some impudent rascals snatched handfuls of gram and scampered off, cramming it into their cheeks as they ran; some took the food timidly and with suspicion; but when we threw handfuls of it on the floor there ensued a vigorous game of "Grab-and-Snatch-it." So long as the gram held out we were the centre of attraction, and each pair of watchful brown eyes was fixed upon us. Some fat old fellows sat and gravely looked at us, others made wry faces, some winked, and some grinned from ear to ear. A few were quarrelsome, and there was continual biting and squealing, while after the feeding was over others busied themselves in examining each other's bodies for vermin, just as I remember seeing people do in the streets of Naples more than once.

These monkeys are all very sacred—next to the Brahmin bull, in fact—because [the people are taught that] they are descendants of Hunuman, the famous monkey-god of Southern India, who aided Rama in the conquest of Ceylon, by forming a bridge of rocks opposite Menaar. The figure of Hunuman is often found in Hindoo temples in the guise of a man, with a black monkey face and a long tail. . . . Some Anglo-Indians have assured me that at Benares any one killing a monkey would be almost torn in pieces by the natives. In the bazaar we met stalking along the narrow street, crowding the people right and left, and sticking his nose into one basket of grain after another as freely as if he owned the whole city. And is he not monarch of all he surveys? These brutes become so accustomed to servile reverence that they are bold and insolent, and whoever does not make way for them will very likely get trampled upon if not knocked down. The most daring European never ventures to strike a Brahmin bull in this city, nor will the most profane dare to swear at one if natives are within hearing. Any Hindoo would rather kill ten Christians than one Brahmin bull, and it would no doubt be safer for a Christian to kill ten natives than one of these brutes, provided he escaped the British authorities. We also met in Benares specimens of another venerated creature—

THE FAKIR.

I shall never forget an apparition I encountered suddenly one day in the bazaar while on a shopping expedition. My baboo and I were standing at a grain stall buying some rice, when there suddenly appeared at my elbow a man entirely naked except a very small and very dirty rag around his loins, and a staff in his hand. He was tall, lank, and bony; his beard was tangled, full of dirt, and came far down his hairy breast. His long matted hair hung around his shoulders like a bundle of untwisted hemp ropes. His body was mangy and caked with dirt of a year's standing, apparently, his claws were long and dirty, and he was certainly the most disgusting object I ever saw in human form. . . . This was one of the fakirs, called "holy men" (there are nearly ninety thousand of them, it is said), whose feet and garments are kissed by men and women, and who are, in popular estimation, saints!

FIXING A WEATHER-VANE ON A CHURCH TOWER.

Two or three years ago a handsome church that was being built in one of the smaller Belgian towns was fast approaching completion. One thing, however, was still lacking—the gilded vane that was to crown the summit of the tower. But owing to some mistake, the scaffolding was found not to have been carried high enough up to enable the workmen to fix this weather-vane. At this juncture two of the men came forward, and offered to get over the difficulty by the one of them standing on the broad shoulders of his companion.

The broad-shouldered man planted his feet firmly on the last narrow plank raised high in air, and grasping a projecting pole to steady himself, he bent forward while his slighter-built comrade sprang nimbly upon his shoulders; and this done, handed him the colossal vane, the brazier full of molten lead, and the necessary tools. Meanwhile a large crowd had gathered in the market-place below, and had flocked to every window whence they could catch a glimpse of the proceeding.

The operation of fixing and soldering the weathervane occupied only a few minutes, but each minute seemed to be long hours to the anxious spectators. At last the dangerous job was completed, and with a sigh of relief the multitude breathed freely once more, and exclaimed aloud: "Thank God!"

Impatient to congratulate their brave fellow-citizens, the people wondered why the broad-shouldered man tarried so long on his lofty perch, and why, when he at last began to descend, his usually elastic step was slow and tottering. Fearing something was amiss, they hastened to the foot of the scaffolding, just in time to see him sink powerless to the ground. The sad cause of his weakness was soon apparent, for his shoulders, arms, and breast were found to be covered with burns. Little had the gazing crowd guessed of the awful agony that noble fellow had endured; for all the time he had been supporting his companion on his shoulders, the latter in his eagerness over his work had unwittingly allowed the molten lead to drop down upon him. Yet he stood all the while as steadfast and immovable as a rock, never betraying the torture he was in by the slightest outward sign, or even allowing a groan to escape his lips, remembering that the life of his comrade had been confided to his charge, and knowing well that the least movement on his part would have hurled his friend down to instant death.

The wounded hero was conveyed to the hospital, where, after a long period of severe suffering, he at length recovered. The tale of the martyr-like fortitude displayed by this workman on behalf of his fellow soon spread, not only over the whole of Belgium, but was carried beyond its borders, and from far and near tributes of admiration were showered upon the man who had so nobly placed his own life in jeopardy for the sake of his friend.

M. PASTEUR AND HIS PATIENTS.

THE distinguished French chemist to whom the children were sent who were bitten recently by a mad dog at Newark, N. J., is now famous the world over. The fact that the children felt no evil consequences from the bite, while the Newark pound-keeper, who was also bitten, has died in fearful agony from hydrophobia, is an evidence of the efficacy of M. Pasteur's methods.

His discovery is one of the most remarkable of our time. It consists in inoculation analogous to that used as a preventive to small-pox. He obtains virus from an animal afflicted with rabies, and with that inoculates another animal, and obtains from the latter virus more attenuated in force. With that virus he inoculates another animal, and again collects the virus, with which he inoculates a fourth, and so on until he obtains virus of a very weak form. With this he inoculates the human sufferer from the bite of a rabid animal. After a few days he uses the virus next in potency, going backward through the series until the patient is inoculated with the virus taken from the first animal operated upon. Then the sufferer is pronounced safe.

A newspaper correspondent, who visited M. Pasteur recently, says: "I was ushered into the office, and received by a short, fat gentleman of a benevolent countenance, and very wrinkled face. His manner is simple, affable, and yet dignified. There is no air of condescension, not a trace of anything to suggest the suspicion of his being a quack. This is M. Pasteur. He was busy when I entered answering the questions of fashionable ladies, patronesses doubtless of his proposed institute. One of them was a Russian princess.

The most severe test to which his system has yet been subjected is its application to persons bitten by a rabid wolf. Vulpine hydrophobia is much more serious than the canine form of the malady. The correspondent was present when nineteen Russian Mujiks arrived for treatment. Some of them were torn and lacerated to a frightful degree.

A PEASANT'S FIGHT WITH A WOLF.

"One of the finest men I ever saw," says the correspondent, "was one of these Mujiks, a coachman in the prime of life, who, to save a woman from the jaws of the wolf, engaged in an epic struggle with the rabid animal. He saw the wolf on the woman, and went up to seize it by the scruff of the neck, knowing that if he did so it would relax its hold to turn on him. He meant to hold it in such a way that it could not bite him until he or somebody else could kill the brute, but it was too quick for him, and caught him by the left arm. He seized the neck with the right hand, and, getting astride on the wolf, pressed it down with all his weight on the ground, and then got a knee firmly on its loins. When the brave Mujik coachman, with his left arm all the time in the mad wolf's maw, was kneeling on the animal, he saw a hatchet, and called to the owner to give it to him; but the owner, an avaricious man, refused, saying: 'No, no; if I do, the skin will be spoiled.' The unconscious hero then stretched out his right hand to seize the implement, in doing which he had to relax the pressure of his knee, which enabled the wolf to seize the other arm. His left arm was nearly useless from injuries inflicted on the muscles, but he resolved that either he or his rabid adversary should perish. Making a supreme effort, he got it between his knees, with which he held the body tight, threw himself forward, clutched the hatchet, half raised himself, and with the left hand inflicted such a blow on the neck and shoulders as to cleave the body in twain. What was remarkable in him was that he did not seem to know that he was worthy of any sort of admiration." He was inoculated, and at last accounts no symptom of the dread malady had appeared. The doctor is now collecting subscriptions to found and support an institute for the treatment of rabies.

A Scotch Laird Among Fishermen.

AN ARISTOCRATIC EVANGELIST.

THE village of Arndilly, in Scotland, is principally inhabited by fishermen. They are not a very promising class to work among by the evangelist. Their lives are hard, and their livelihood precarious. Good work may be done in their midst, but the men whom God has used in the work most successfully have been men of consecrated lives, full of patience and love. One of the most earnest of these, a man who might be seen almost every day, in all weathers, going from house to house, reading and praying with the sick, talking to the men as they mended their nets and ready for any good work, was Hay Macdowall Grant, or, as his tenants loved to call him, "the Laird of Arndilly." His sister was the wife of the Rev. Robert Aitken, the father of the eminent evangelist so blessed recently in New York, the Rev. W. Hay Aitken.

In conversations with his distinguished nephew, the Laird of Arndilly, at various times, related the history of his commencing evangelistic work. Mr. Aitken says that his uncle was converted under the ministry of Rev. Robert Hall, having been previously deeply solemnized by the sudden death of two near relatives. Some years afterward he came into possession of the Arndilly estates, and became a neighbor of his sister and her devoted husband.

One Sunday afternoon in February, 1856, Mr. Robert Aitken said to his wife: "I wish you would take the two children and go down to Arndilly." He pressed the matter so much that she at last consented. When they had reached Garthland, Mrs. Aitken was taken so alarmingly ill that her children wrote for their father to come to her. He hurried down, but his wife soon so far recovered as to be able to proceed with her husband and children to Arndilly. The morning after their arrival, Mr. Aitken characteristically said to his brother-in-law: "I cannot be idle; you must find me some work to do." Meetings were arranged for in the neighboring barns, and the churches of the nearest town—Roths—were thrown open for evangelistic services. Several were converted, and a good work began. Before Mr. Aitken left, a deputation of earnest Christians living on the estate called to beg him to persuade the laird to carry on the meetings. Mr. Aitken urged it, but the laird shrank from the cross. When he was left alone, however, and he found the people had arranged a meeting, and had no one else to address them, he tremblingly began, and, of course "found God greatly helping him." After an absence of three weeks, during which time he says he gave "the enemy time to choke or steal the good seed sown," he found the people as much in earnest as ever.

Mr. Brownlow North, a personal friend of the laird, had begun to preach about a year previous to this time; and when, after one of his meetings, his friend came to him anxiously inquiring: "I say, North, tell me the meaning of all this," he affectionately urged Mr. Grant himself to set about doing something for God; for unless he did, "what mark had he of being a Christian at all?" It was to Mr. North that he communicated the joyful intelligence—how joyful only those who have had a similar experience of working and watching can realize—"I have got my first soul."

One evening, as he was returning from preaching in a church fifteen miles away from his home, he saw on the roadside a woman weeping bitterly. He was passing on when she called out: "Oh, Mr. Grant, do not go by without giving me a word; do stop and speak to me!" She had heard him preach, and the arrow of conviction had entered her soul. They talked and prayed together till her sorrow was turned into peace through believing. "Arndilly" was now fairly enlisted in the blessed service, and clad in his tartan shooting-suit he was to be seen continually at work for God among the people, the Holy Spirit owning and blessing his labors.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

Land at Last.

THE foregoing extracts from Juliet's journal show that she was making spiritual progress.

So much had been achieved in Juliet's soul. She saw conduct in a new light. Not yet had she realized Christ as her own Saviour, nor indeed did she know her need of a Saviour. She was, however, a very different girl from the gay, pleasure-loving maiden of delicate and fastidious taste, who took her part in the amateur theatricals on board the Quebec not many days before. Then wickedness was not the most shocking thing she could imagine. A good person who blundered in grammar, who was not refined in manner, was more repulsive to her than an irreligious person who was well-dressed, well-educated, and faultless in behavior. But since then she had learned much. The girl whom she had heard ridiculed on that fatal night, and had herself laughed at, was the girl to whom she owed her life. Her gay friends had done nothing for her; she was sure that not one of them, situated as Maria was, would have acted as she did. Not one of them would voluntarily have died in her place. It was a noble deed that Maria did that night, and gradually Juliet was coming to the realization of its grandeur and the motives that prompted it.

Juliet had abundant opportunity for reflection now. The men were very kind to her in their rough way, but with them she could have no communication. They supplied her wants, and she smiled her gratitude, but not even her thanks were understood. Much of her time she spent in the cabin appropriated to her use, thinking and writing in her journal. The latter occupation was a necessary vent to her over-burdened soul. Slowly and painfully she was travelling mentally over a road new to her, and was as utterly without guidance as she would have been if she herself had been navigating the Bergen. That her past life had been a wasted one she knew. With all her education and refinement, such self-sacrifice as that Maria Selden had shown would have been impossible to her. Was it, she often asked herself, religion which gave that grandeur of character? She did not know, but she would read and learn if ever she got out of this dreary ship. Meanwhile she continued her record of each day's events.

"August 5.—A large flight of white sea-birds. I hope that we are not far from land. I had such a strange dream last night. I thought that I was again struggling in the dreadful, dreadful waves, and that a white lovely hand was held out. I knew it to be Maria's; but it was not cold or wet, but warm—warm with life and love. Maria drew me out of the water, but not to the desolate raft; she spread out large white wings like the sea-bird's, and up we soared together into the air! I shall never, never soar! She smiled so joyously in my dream; I never gave her cause to smile! What misery it is to remember how I spent the few last hours that might have been passed by her side! Alone and sad on the deck, Maria must have heard the sound of our laughing and singing below, and have felt how useless her loving warning had been! I can never bring back those hours! My tears are dropping on the paper; I can hardly see to write."

It will be evident from these few extracts from a journal prolonged through several weeks how constantly the thoughts of Juliet Erle recurred to the friend who had died for her sake. One of the most soothing thoughts to the poor girl was her intention, should she ever return to England, of raising a beautiful white marble monument to the memory of Maria Selden. Miss Erle regarded her gray plaid shawl almost as a sacred relic. Juliet's repentance for the past was not the repentance of life-giving faith;

she mourned not for her sins as committed against God. While she half idolized the memory of the friend to whom she owed her preservation from death, Juliet thought little of the Friend who had done and suffered for her a thousand times more. The idea crossed not her mind that she herself, in a new and holier life, would be the noblest monument to Maria, and that she would best fulfil the last prayers of that friend by—in a spiritual sense—taking up the mantle which Maria had left behind her.

With one more extract, which closed the journal written on board the Bergen, we will end this story of the voyage.

"September 5.—Joy! joy! land in sight, land and buildings upon it! I am half wild with delight! The captain roused me early this morning with a broader smile than usual on his face, and made me come upon deck! Oh, the bliss of seeing something different from icebergs or waves upon the horizon, something even like a little simple church, with pine trees growing beside it! I could have shouted and danced for joy. We were sailing toward the land. Oh, for more speed, for lightning speed! I tried to ask the name of the tiny settlement; it does not look like a town. The captain said 'Nannock Igloe,' or something like it. When I looked puzzled he growled like a bear, then laughed at his own joke, and his men laughed heartily too. The captain repeated 'Nannock' two or three times, then pointed to the skin of a white bear which he wears as a jacket.

"What is that sound which faintly reaches my ear? The tinkle of a church bell across the sea! I shall be among Christians and civilized people again! I almost fear that I am in a dream! I must rush up again on deck, and have the witness of my eyes as well as my ears that this frightful voyage is ending at last."

Yes, the voyage was ending at last! The boat was let down to convey the rescued girl to the shore, and rocked on the heaving waves. There was no luggage to get ready; poor Juliet had literally nothing but what she wore, and the journal stuck into her waist-band, for her hands must be free to help her in descending the rough rope ladder, never intended for lady's feet. Juliet, eager as she was to escape from her floating prison, could not quit it without some expression of gratitude to the rough Norsemen whose hospitality she had experienced, but not enjoyed.

Standing on the deck in her dress, once so gay and now so faded, Juliet drew from her neck her gold chain with her pretty little watch and half a dozen fanciful charms suspended to it, and tried to place them in the broad hairy hand of Captain Logbrog. But the Norseman drew back, shook his shaggy head, and gave his characteristic grin. He would not rob the poor child of her baubles, he said.

Juliet understood the gesture and broad smile, though not the words that were spoken. The young lady glanced at the men who clustered round; Logbrog again shook his head, and motioned to his guest to return watch and chain to their former places. Then the captain held out his strong hand; Juliet could not but place hers within it, though the grip which she had to sustain reminded her of that of a bear.

Then over the vessel's side she went, and down the rope ladder, the men below helping her in their rough, kindly way; for the boat was tossing on the surf, and she had some difficulty in reaching her seat. Then the sailors bent to their oars, the men above looking over the side to watch the departure of their little mermaid, for by that name Miss Erle was spoken of among them. They cheered her as the boat pushed off from the vessel.

"Right glad will the little mermaid be to stand on dry ground again!" said the captain, as he waved his farewell. "She never took kindly to fishing or blubber, and looked among us much as a coral necklace might look round the gullet of a porpoise."

"But e'en old Jollof can't say as she brought us bad luck," observed Karl.

With intense interest Juliet from the boat surveyed the shore to which each stroke of the oars brought her nearer. Beside the church she saw a neat, rather formal-looking little house, chiefly constructed of wood, from one of the chimneys of which a little column of smoke was rising.

A strange-looking group of people, unlike any whom she had ever seen before, were watching for her landing on the pebbly beach, on which the foamy billows were rolling. Short, squat, broad-shouldered people they were. Juliet could scarcely distinguish whether they were men or women, for not a skirt was to be seen among them. All were clad in thick trousers, and thick, clumsy seal-skin boots. But the long carefully braided black hair of the shorter members of the group, the strings of glass beads, or foxes' teeth twined round the waist as a girdle, and perhaps their smaller features, gave an impression that some of the party must belong to the sex called fair. Fair here was hardly an appropriate word, as the complexions of all were brown.

A few of the dames had lines tattooed on their broad, flat, good-natured faces. All doubt as to one being a woman was removed by a brown baby's little round head protruding from the large hood which its mother wore as an appendage to her jacket, another woman had her tiny infant cradled in her huge down-lined boot.

But Juliet's eager gaze did not rest long on the Esquimaux, who were, in her eyes, simply a set of uncouth barbarians. From the deck of the Bergen she had with joy detected two Europeans among the group. These were simply clothed in garments unlike those of the people around them, with fur caps on their heads, for the season was not yet far enough advanced to make thick-flapped hoods indispensable articles of dress. Juliet saw that the shorter European looked elderly; in any costume he would have been recognized as a pastor. The younger man, of very prepossessing appearance, seemed in the prime of manhood; he wore a well-trimmed beard and mustache of a light brown color.

"How astonished these good people will be to see a civilized lady dropping as it were from the skies!" thought Juliet; "not that I look much like a lady, in this dreadful costume." Her hat had been crushed out of shape, its ribbons were a faded wisp; her dainty boots, never intended for immersion in salt water, were threatening to part company with their soles; one of their wearer's feet was distressingly visible under the kid. Nothing seemed uninjured save the plaid, which remained as a memorial of Maria.

"Oh! I do hope that these gentlemen, if gentlemen they be, will speak in some comprehensible tongue!" thought Juliet to herself. "They are certainly not French or Italian; I should hardly think them English. They must be extraordinary persons to dwell among such people, such horrid savages, and in such a desolate place! I only see one house fit for Christians to live in; the other dwellings are low, round-shaped, and so funny, fit homes for these strange little dwarfs! Where on earth am I landing now!"

Juliet had not much time for speculation, for the boat's keel was grating on the pebbles, and a wave that had been chasing after it overtook it at the moment of landing, and, with a shower of salt spray, gave the sea's good-by to her who so long had been its unwilling guest. Juliet could not help laughing at her own wretched plight, as, drenched and dripping, she was helped to land by the two Europeans. Doubtless they were much surprised at the most unexpected apparition of a lady on that wild, desolate coast, but they were too courteous to show such surprise. The younger man, Fritz Edelstein, handed Juliet out of the rude boat as he might have done out of an elegant carriage; and the elder, with both his hands, shook hers in kindly greeting. "Welcome, sister," he said; "welcome to Eshcol, in the name of the Lord!"

The sound of the English tongue, and the delight of springing on shore, were too much for the over-strained nerves of Juliet. From laughing she burst into hysterical weeping, which made the Esquimaux entertain doubts whether this strange new specimen of humanity could be in her senses.

With intuitive delicacy Fritz Edelstein said that he must give the good news of a guest's arrival to Sister Anna, and hurried off to the house, first saying a few words in their own language to the staring Esquimaux, which had the effect of making them move off. Brother Wilhelm Stillstrom waited quietly till Juliet had regained her self-possession, and then offered her his arm. They proceeded a few steps in silence, till the rough pebbles accomplished the work of taking off the sole of one of Juliet's kid boots. "I am so sorry—it is rough walking," said the kindly stranger; "will you wait till I send to my wife for a pair of her shoes?"

It was such a comfort to Juliet to know that she should find one of her own sex at the station, that she made light of her little misfortune, and though at the cost of some pain, stumbled on slowly over the pebbles, glad that the younger European was not present to see her awkward gait. "Do tell me where I am," she said to the pastor, on whose arm she was leaning.

"At the Moravian settlement of Eshcol, on the Labrador coast," was the reply.

"I thought that the captain said something about Nannock, when he pointed toward this place."

"Oh! that is the old Esquimaux name. But we, as the Lord's servants, chose another name more suitable to remind us of His great love."

"Is Eshcol suitable?" said Juliet, glancing at the gloomy pines, which seemed to be the only trees that would grow in the place. "Eshcol makes one think of vines—was it not famed for some huge cluster of grapes?"

"And we have our grapes rich and luscious to eat with our manna," said the gray-haired Moravian. "My child, the grapes which feasted the Israelites in the desert did not grow in the desert; they were brought from the Land of Promise, an earnest of the future inheritance in a country flowing with milk and honey. So we in our pilgrim life have rich promises to feed on, to rejoice in even in our desert, and in memory of what cheered God's people, we have called our settlement Eshcol."

The Moravian's tone was cheerful, nor was there the slightest trace of sadness in the glance which he gave to the little home which the two were slowly approaching.

"You must wonder to see me here," said Juliet Erle. "I am the sole survivor, alas! of the passengers who started from Liverpool in the large steamer Quebec, which sank somewhere off the coast of Newfoundland. I was picked up by a fishing-vessel, and have been for weeks—I know not how many—cruising about these cold seas."

"Praised be God for so wonderful a preservation!" cried Wilhelm.

"And now—oh! tell me how I can get back to England again!" exclaimed Juliet.

"It seems to our short-sightedness very unfortunate that our missionary ship, the Harmony, should have left this station but yesterday on her homeward voyage," said the sympathizing Moravian. "I grieve that you came not a little earlier. Your only chance of returning home before the visit of the Harmony next summer, will be if some whaling vessel chance to touch here. I think that the Bergen, which brought you here, may be on her way back to Norway."

"Oh! I could not go in that or in any other fishing-vessel again!" exclaimed Juliet, with almost a shudder.

"Then we shall have the pleasure of keeping you here as our guest," said the Moravian missionary kindly. "And here comes my good wife, to take her share in bidding you welcome."

And a cordial welcome it was from the gentle, pleasant-looking woman, who came forth from the little dwelling to meet them.

Sister Anna was some way past forty, yet scarcely a silver thread appeared in the hair, smooth as satin, braided over the broad placid brow on which not a wrinkle was seen. A spotless cap formed a suitable frame, as it were, to a face on which were seen kindness and calm common sense. So neat were the darns and the patches in the Moravian's slate-colored dress, that Juliet Erle, at first sight, did not notice that there were any.

What a delight it was to Juliet to enter through the porch, secured from cold by double doors, into a pretty little parlor, spotlessly clean, with framed pictures and illuminated texts hanging on the walls, and even small elegancies in china on carved brackets in the corners.

"It looks so bright—so pretty—so home-like!" she cried, fresh from the miseries of a voyage in the Bergen.

"Fritz has a great taste for carving," observed Sister Anna, with a little innocent pride in her home; "and we are often sent pretty things by kind friends far away. But let me show you your room."

Juliet followed into a smaller apartment, also exceedingly neat; it was made bright by a gay coverlet hastily produced from Anna's stores, and placed on the bed prepared for the stranger. Juliet did not know that the younger missionary, like the Norwegian captain, had given up his own room to the guest, for the little dwelling held but two sleeping apartments.

"What is to become of you, Brother Fritz?" asked Pastor Wilhelm, the two being alone in the parlor together.

"Oh! I can be stowed away anywhere!" was the cheerful reply. "I'll roll myself up in a blanket, and if Sister Anna will grant me a corner in the kitchen, I'll promise not to avail myself of the opportunity of making a foray on her cranberry stores."

JESUS AND NICODEMUS.

S. S. Lesson for April 25th, John 3: 1-18. Golden Text, ver. 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

What Nicodemus Did not Know—Christ's Direct Teaching—The Standpoint of Nicodemus—The Signification of the Water—The Entrance of Spiritual Life Perceptible—A Cardinal Principle Unfolded—The Perfect Remedy—Its Rejection the Fatal Sin.

NICODEMUS had, perhaps, long been interested in Jesus. And yet, coming as an inquirer, he needed the cover of night lest his compeers should discover that he, who professed to know so much, was willing to admit his ignorance, and learn of One whom they despised. His first words to Jesus were "Rabbi, we know." The Apostle Paul teaches us that "if any man think that he knoweth anything, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know" (1 Cor. 8: 2). Jesus took Nicodemus out of his depth, and immediately showed him what he did not know. Nicodemus, judging Jesus by what he saw, said: "We know that Thou art a teacher come from God." Jesus' answer was, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Nicodemus said: "We know." Jesus said: "I say unto thee," for with Jesus every interview must be a personal one, something definite between Himself and ourselves. This is the word which He speaks to every human soul, "I SAY UNTO THEE," Except thou be born again, thou canst not see the kingdom of God. It is not simply that we cannot enter the kingdom. We have no power so much as to perceive there is a kingdom of God, until we ourselves have to do with it. A man born blind can have no conception of what it is to see, nor a man born deaf, what it is to hear, and equally so the unspiritual man—the man not yet born again cannot conceive what spiritual life is. Nicodemus very naturally asked, "How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born?" All his ideas were from the standpoint which he occupied. He was of the earth, earthly, and nothing spiritual had, as yet, developed in him. He could reason, but he could not perceive spiritual things. "The things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God . . . the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2: 11-14). The answer of Jesus to His last question was as follows: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

"Born again" is in the Greek "born from above," and the Spirit of God is from above. No doubt the term "water" here would signify "the washing of water by the Word" (Eph. 5: 26), and "being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever" (1 Pet. 1: 23). By the Word and by the Spirit of God enters into the man—a life which is not of human origin. "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name: Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1: 12, 13). "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." It is this which the natural man cannot comprehend. He can reason, he can argue, he can aspire, he can pray, but all this is on the human plane. He needs to have something of God in order to understand God. The spiritual world is utterly distinct from the natural world, as much so as the animal kingdom is separate from the mineral kingdom. If Nicodemus would receive Christ, believe on His name, and yield himself up to Him, then Nicodemus would become spiritual; otherwise he remained without the new birth, without the spiritual life. Jesus continued: "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born from above. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof"—there is evidence of its presence, no one can doubt the wind is there; but, "thou canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." No human eye can see the incoming of the Spirit of God; no human perception, however keen, can mark whence He cometh and whither He goeth, and yet the presence of the Spirit of God in any man is as manifest as the sun in the sky or the daylight upon the earth. None who know God's Spirit can fail to perceive when spiritual life enters into another. He recognizes something which he himself has known and experienced. "We speak and testify that we have seen." "Nicodemus answered, and said unto Him: 'How can these things be?' Jesus answered, and said unto him: 'Art thou the teacher of Israel, and understandest not these things?'" (R. V.).

THAT WE DO KNOW,

Israel was God's witness in the world to spiritual life. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and all the prophets had been spiritual men. They knew the things of God; they talked with God; they heard Him speak; they had practically to do with Him. And here in the very presence of the Son of God was a teacher of Israel, who did not so much as know the very elements of the life of God! "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?" A man without spiritual life is out of the range of heavenly things.

A CARDINAL PRINCIPLE.

Our Lord now unfolds a principle which Nicodemus, up to this time, had totally ignored. "No man hath ascended up to heaven." The first step toward oneness with God must come from above—from His side. If Jesus had never come down to earth, man could never have reached up to heaven. "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." Because Jesus came down, and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, it is possible for man to rise up to sit with Christ in heavenly places, and to dwell forever with the Lord. But our blessed Lord explained to Nicodemus the first steps toward God. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: That whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Christ's allusion to the serpent in the wilderness, presupposed that all men had come under the power of the serpent. "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God." All need healing and life, but "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son." Just as the brazen serpent was within reach of the eye of every bitten Israelite—he had not so much as to lift his hand, he had not so much as to make an effort, he had not so much as to utter a prayer but only to turn his eye toward the serpent, and immediately he lived; just so the sinner has but one thing to do, and that is to turn toward Jesus. No effort on his part, no struggling, wrestling prayer, no gigantic efforts to free himself from the power of evil habits, or the chains of sin which may have bound him—none of these things can save the soul. But receiving Jesus, accepting the gift which God has given, owning the only begotten Son of God as his personal Saviour, this can save any man and every man, whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish, but have everlasting life. The world has been sinful enough. "Every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart is only evil continually" (Gen. 6: 5). "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked" (Jer. 17: 9). "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3: 23). Yet "God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world."

THE PERFECT REMEDY.

Fully conscious of all the sin which existed, yet God sent His Son with a remedy, not with a condemnation, "not to condemn the world; but that the world through Him might be saved." "He that believeth on Him is not condemned." Oh, how this disproves the accusations against God which we hear on many hands from those who are inclined to be sceptical, that God creates man with an evil heart, and then condemns him for the evil of that heart! God does not condemn us for what we are by nature, but that when He offers us His own Son to save us and to take possession, dwell within us and live out His own holy life, we are unwilling to receive Him. God has provided a perfect remedy for sin, its punishment, its power, its consequences, its influence, and because man will not take the remedy man is condemned. He is not condemned for an evil heart which he cannot help, but he is condemned for not submitting that evil heart to Him who can cleanse and take possession of it. "He that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God."

God is no tyrant, He could not, and would not condemn us unjustly, but, having created us with free will, with the power to choose life and we yet refuse, how can He do other than condemn? But it is with sorrow, "O that they were wise that, they understood this, that they would consider their latter end" (Deut. 32: 29). "Ye will not come unto Me that ye might have life" (John 5: 40). But oh, how blessed it is that our beloved Lord does not come to us with words of condemnation, but with arms outstretched to save whosoever will!

THE GRACE THAT TRIUMPHS.

By REV. RAY PALMER, D.D.

"My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness."—2 Cor. 12: 9.

Thy pledge, dear Lord, was it not meant for me?
Else were Thy words unmeaning to my ear;
For I am weak and helpless without Thee,
Then only strong when I can feel Thee near.

Thou givest strength when, weary of the way,
In spirit chafed with care, and dark and sad,
I lift to Thee my tearful eyes, and say,
"Thou only, Lord, canst make me strong and glad."

"Lo! I am with thee." Ah! Thy gracious voice
Wakes quicker throbbings in this fainting heart,
Rekindles hope, and bids my soul rejoice,
And firmer grows my step, and fears depart.

With Thee what sorrows can I not endure?
What ills can daunt while Thou art by my side?
Strong in Thy strength, at every step secure,
Thy peace shall in my tranquil soul abide.

From each sore cross Thy grace new joy can bring,
Can make each wearying toil-yield sweeter rest;
Mid deepest gloom can bid my spirit sing
With the sweet rapture of one fully blest.

Upon Thine arm, O Strong One, let me lean;
Then shall I triumph by Thy love and might;
For Thou art ever with me, though unseen,
And Thou at last shalt change my faith to sight.

The Latest Work of Rev. Dr. Ray Palmer.

Voices of Hope and Gladness.

By Rev. Ray Palmer, D.D.

A Choice Collection of his Poems and Lyrics. Bound in rich cloth, bevelled boards and gilt stamp on side, and gilt edges. 12mo, price, $1.50.

"This elegant volume from our foremost Christian lyric is a thing of beauty to the eye as well as a melody of 'Hope and Gladness' to the heart. Its elegant binding, gilt edges, tinted and stiff paper with several delightful illustrations, form a rich setting for the gems of holy song and sacred meditation which shine throughout its pages.

"In these various forms of devotional literature, the fruit of Dr. Palmer's later years, one perceives the same lofty, cheerful Christian sentiment, the same profound religious experience and spiritual fervor which characterize his precious hymns, such as 'My faith looks up to Thee,' 'O Jesus! Sweet the tears I shed,' 'Why should these eyes be tearful,' etc., the first of which he wrote fifty years ago.

"There is here much genuine rhythmical structure, true poetic sensibility, felicitous versification and expression, but the sweetest charm of these lyrics is the fact that they are Christ-songs, outpourings of the heart to its 'Best Beloved.' This it is also that makes them 'Voices of Hope and Gladness,' a title so expressive and so typical of the general tone which pervades all that the author writes, the tone of trustfulness, of brightness, of cheerfulness which Christian faith alone can inspire, and which will make these radiant pages a blessed solace to contrite hearts as well as a medium of 'quickening and helpful spiritual power.' It is in every way one of those books that will make the careful reader purer and stronger and happier."—Lutheran Quarterly.

GERMANY'S NONAGENARIAN EMPEROR.

The Birthday Celebrations—A Memorable Scene Eighty Years Ago—His Good Mother—The Boy Soldier—An Entry in a Diary—The War of Liberation—First Meeting with Louis Napoleon—Political Troubles—The Revolution of 1848—Becomes Regent—Crowns Himself—The Last Twenty Years—The Universal King.

ON March 22d, this year, the venerable Emperor of Germany completed his eighty-ninth year. He entered his ninth decade well, hearty, and happy. Long before he had left his couch thousands of Berliners had assembled outside the palace, watching for his appearance at the historic window. The roads were in anything but a pleasant state for walking, for the thaw had replaced the snow and ice by thick mud and slush. The crowd, however, paid no heed to such trifles, and when at last the old hero, having got through the ordeal of receiving the official greetings, showed himself, the air was rent with deafening cheers.

CONGRATULATIONS.

The first person who entered the Kaiser's study that day was the Kaiserin. The meeting of the aged couple was very affecting. Hardly had they embraced when the ushers tapped at the door and introduced the Court Marshal, Count von Pückler, who, being blind and decrepit, had to be led to his master to congratulate him. Soon after a long array of distinguished arrivals drove up to the palace, including the Crown Prince and Princess, the King of Saxony, the Crown Prince and Princess of Sweden, and the Prince and Princess William, with their three little sons, each carrying a bouquet in his hand, which he presented to his great-grandfather with a pretty speech learned for the occasion. Berlin was in fête on the occasion. The most touching incident of the day was a pilgrimage of the Imperial family to a little oak cradle in which the future Emperor lay just eighty-nine years ago. It is still as good as new, and lately did service for the Kaiser's great-grandchildren, the sons of Prince William.

Eighty years ago, on a dull, gloomy day late in October, 1806, a beautiful and distinguished lady with a few attendants entered Schwedt, a small town on the banks of the Oder, in the province of Brandenburg. She was flying through Prussia to the Russian frontier. Her first business on her arrival at Schwedt was to seek out another party which had preceded her. It was composed of a tutor and two boys. She found them, and the two boys were wrapped in their mother's arms while she caressed them and wept over them. The lady was Queen Louise, the wife of Frederick William III., King of Prussia. The younger of the two boys, then nine years old, is still living. He is the potentate whose portrait appears on the first page—William, Emperor of Germany. The battle of Jena had been fought a few days before that meeting at Schwedt, and it was the news that in that battle Napoleon had defeated her husband and the Prussian army which sent with her two sons toward the frontier. "In the future," said the beautiful Queen, addressing her sons, "In the future, when your mother no longer lives, call this unhappy hour up in your memories. Shed tears over your mother's memory, as I now weep over the prostration of my country. But do not be satisfied with tears. Act; develop your powers. . . . Strive to reconquer from France the glory of your fathers. Let yourselves not be carried away by the degeneration of this age. Be men and strive for the name of soldiers and heroes." Not long afterward Queen Louise died broken-hearted, but her words lived in the heart of her younger son. If her sight had been prophetic, even that hour of darkness would have been illumined by a vision that would have consoled her. Could she have looked across an interval of sixty-four years she would have seen the boy she was then caressing, a white-haired, stalwart soldier-king, returning in triumph to his capital with a Napoleon a captive in his train. Her solemn adjuration to her boy in 1806 was realized in 1870, and the disaster of Jena retrieved in the victory of Sedan.

Young as William was when the tears of his mother fell upon his brow, it is probable that her influence was a power in the formation of his character. She was no ordinary woman. While still a mere girl she had been brought from Mecklenburg to become the wife of the Crown Prince, and had been introduced into a court that was a perfect cesspool of debauchery. The King, her husband's father, was an abandoned, vicious man, whose rule in court and State was directed by a bevy of fat mistresses, and whose life was made up of disgusting orgies. His example was followed by his nobles, and the whole court was vicious and corrupt. The young girl in the midst of this debauchery was preserved by God from contamination, and the home of the heir to the throne was, under her influence, the one bright and pure spot in the reeking mass of moral filth. There the present Emperor of Germany was born on March 22d, 1797, and was trained for the duties of his high station. He is now in his ninetieth year, and his character still shows the marks of his mother's influence.

THE BOY SOLDIER.

On January 1st, 1807, being then not ten years old, he was appointed an officer in the Prussian Army by his father, King Frederick William III. He was then the youngest member of the army, as now he is the oldest. He accompanied his father in the two campaigns of the War of Liberation, and near Mannheim took part in a battle with the French. Soon afterward, at the battle of La Fère Champenoise, he bore through the terrific storm of artillery the order to advance, and won by his gallantry his first military decoration, the Russian order of St. George.

LIFE PRINCIPLES.

After the war he resumed his interrupted studies, and though he was not a brilliant, he was a thoughtful, student. In a diary which he kept in those days is an entry which shows that in his eighteenth year he entertained right views of his responsibilities. He wrote: "I take pleasure in my high station, not on account of the distinction which it gives me among men, but because in it I can work the better and accomplish the more. My rank ought always to remind me of the great duties which it imposes upon me, the great exertions which it requires of me, and the great temptations against which I have to battle. I will never forget that a prince is also a man, and before God only a man sharing with the meanest of his people the weakness and the wants of human nature; that the laws which control others are written likewise for him, and that he, like them, will one day be judged according to his conduct."

IN FRANCE.

It was in 1813 that the young man was called from his studies to take his share in the horrors of war. With his father he crossed the Rhine on New Year's eve, and for the first time put his foot on French soil. During that campaign he looked down on Paris from the blood-stained Heights of Belleville, while as yet Mortier and Marmont were fighting furiously against the impending German occupation of the capital. While William and his father were quartering in the Hotel Villeroi in the Rue Bourbon, Napoleon I. was sullenly protesting against fate in that Cabinet of Fontainebleau where Macdonald found the fallen master of Europe seated in motionless dejection "in a small arm-chair before the fireplace, in a dressing-gown of dingy white dimity, and wearing his slippers without stockings." His wife, poor repudiated Josephine, was fretting and dressing at Malmaison; for companion her daughter Hortense, with her two little boys. William never saw the great Napoleon, but in Hortense's boy, whose head he patted when, visiting at Malmaison, he saw a child with whom later he was to have momentous relations. That child lived to be the Napoleon III. whose guest William was to be first at Compiegne and afterward in the Tuileries, and whom he was to see for the last time on that eventful morrow of Sedan, when the two clasped hands finally on the threshold of the Château Bellevue.

POLITICAL TROUBLES.

From 1815 to 1864 no great war disturbed the course of Prussia. But the interval was not uneventful. While Frederick William III. was engaged in the struggle with Napoleon, his appeals to his people for support were accompanied by solemn pledges that, when once peace was restored, he would voluntarily surrender his prerogatives as an autocrat and introduce representative institutions. The promise was never fulfilled. But the people were generous to a king so old, and whose life had been so full of trouble. He died June 7th, 1840, having reigned forty-two years, and left the despotic power intact to his eldest son, the brother of the present Emperor. Then the people clamored for the concession solemnly promised them by the late King. Some unimportant concessions were made in the direction of a Constitution, but they were insincere, and the end of 1847 found Prussia with only the semblance of Constitutional Government and an avowal by the King that he would never be "bound by a sheet of paper." Finally, on February 12th, 1848, a bill was introduced in the Baden Chamber to summon a German Parliament. That was the signal for revolution.

Popular meetings were held throughout Germany, and everywhere there were conflicts between the military and the people. On March 21st, after a fight in the streets of Berlin, in which two hundred and sixteen men were killed fighting behind barricades, the King surrendered. He sent away his troops, sent his brother, the present Emperor, to London, he being unpopular with the people, and summoned a Constitutional Convention, which assembled in Berlin on May 22d, 1848. A period of anarchy followed, in which arsenals were plundered and popular disturbances frequent. On December 5th the Constitutional Convention was dissolved, and the King and his ministers framed a Constitution to suit themselves.

Prince William was immediately recalled from London and was heartily welcomed by the people. He was the most unpopular man in Prussia when he went away, but the people were sick of anarchy and disgusted with the incapacity of the Convention. They wanted order just then more than they did a Constitution, and they believed that the King's brother was a man who could secure order. He was put at the head of the army, and at once entered upon the task of crushing the insurrection in Baden and the Palatinate. He accomplished it in six weeks, and afterward was appointed Military Governor of Westphalia. Still, in spite of his vigor, the Prussian patriots had confidence in him, for he sternly refused to adopt the policy of reaction which was being urged by his brother's ministers now that the suppression of the popular revolt was accomplished. He declared for confirmation of the concessions his brother had made, and insisted on their being observed.

KING OF PRUSSIA.

In 1858 the King was seized with mental illness, and he having no children William was made Regent. Three years later the King died, and on January 2d, 1861, William succeeded him. The coronation took place at Königsberg, on October 18th. That he was not a convert to Constitutional doctrines was clearly proved at the time. Though it had been necessary to make concessions to the people, and though he was too honest a man to fail in his promise, William still held the stupid doctrine of the "divine right of kings," and considered himself King by God's will and not by the will of the people. At the coronation he seized the crown and put it upon his own head as a sign that it belonged to him, and was not given to him. Since then he has repeatedly avowed this belief in public, and no doubt the old man still retains it in his creed.

The most momentous step William ever took, and one that has colored every event of his reign and has changed the history of Europe, was taken in 1862. He took Otto von Bismarck from a diplomatic post and made him his chief adviser. Since that time Bismarck has been the virtual ruler of the country, and William has loyally supported and in a sense obeyed him. The events of the past twenty years are fresh in the recollection of the public, and only require brief mention.

In June, 1866, war was declared against Austria, and after a short campaign, in which William I. and the royal princes took part, Austria was compelled to make a humiliating peace. The powerful effects of the needle gun created quite a panic in the Austrian army, and her generals found it would be useless to prolong the struggle. In 1867 the King of Prussia became the head of the North German Confederation, comprising twenty-two States, representing a population of twenty-nine millions.

The terrible Franco-German War of 1870-71 followed, the ultimate result of which was the complete realization of Prince Bismarck's idea of a united Germany, and on January 18th, 1871, King William of Prussia was proclaimed German Emperor, within the Hall of Mirrors, in the Palace of the French Kings at Versailles, in the presence of the German princes, under the standards of the army before Paris, and surrounded by representatives of the regiments.

TWO ATTEMPTS AT ASSASSINATION.

On May 11th, 1871, an attempt was made to assassinate the Emperor in Berlin. The crime was committed by a young Socialist tinker, named Emil Hoedel, of Leipzig. He fired two shots from a revolver, but neither of them hit the Emperor, who stood up in his carriage and asked whether they were aimed at him. A second attempt upon his life was made on June 2d, 1878. His Majesty was driving in the magnificent leafy avenue called Unter den Linden to the Zoological Gardens, when two shots were fired at him from the window of a house, and he was wounded in several places, but not seriously. The would-be assassin was a Dr. Nobiling, who afterward died of wounds he had inflicted upon himself.

William I. married on June 11th, 1829, the Princess Augusta, daughter of Charles Frederick, Grand Duke of Weimar. Their eldest child and only son, Frederick William, the Crown Prince of Germany, married the Princess Royal, the eldest daughter of Queen Victoria, on January 25th, 1858. They have several children, the eldest of whom, Prince William, is the father of three sons, born in 1882. The Emperor has therefore looked on the faces of his great-grandchildren.

THE UNIVERSAL KING.

Imperial and Royal personages, their relations and concerns naturally appear to the citizens of a great republic to occupy an inordinately large place in the thoughts of European society; but it must be remembered that old associations, such as those of courts and rulers, and of the days when kings were really the leaders of the people, are slow to die. There are many indications that they are dying, for in the most enlightened European nation the monarch has been stripped of all but the semblance of power, and in others his power has been curtailed. The social position accorded them is still imposing, but as people grow more intelligent and thoughtful they are less than ever inclined to intrust legislative or executive power to one family, to descend from father to son, taking the risk whether that son may be a wise man or a fool.

The real difficulty—and thinking men of all ages have been puzzled by it—is, how to get the wisest and best of the nation to rule it. We know well enough that even our own system of election, probably the best and most successful the world has ever seen, does not always secure that end. History tells us how every other system has failed. The world will yet see in the rule of the Prince of Peace the problem gloriously solved. When He comes, whose "right it is to reign," who is wisdom and righteousness incarnate, He will rule until all enemies are put under His feet, and even those who now contend most earnestly for the rule of the chosen of the people will be satisfied, for "To Him every knee will bow" . . . and every tongue confess that Jesus is Lord" (Phil. 2:11). So the ascription will be universal, "To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen" (Jude 25).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Quite Safe in Deep Water.—At a recent meeting Mr. Hopkins said: "A steamer was going through a narrow and rocky channel, where navigation was very dangerous. A gentleman went up to the captain, and accosted him thus: 'I suppose you know all the rocks and the dangers along this channel?' 'No, indeed, I do not,' he rejoined; 'they are quite unknown to me.' 'Well, how are you going to get along in safety?' 'I know where the deep water is,' was the reply. Ah, friends, how safe he was; how free from danger! Can you say, although you know not the dangers that lie before you, you know where the Deep Water is? If so, how secure and safe you are!"

A Terrible Unmasking.—Mr. Wright remarked: "I knew a lady who had every appearance of being a devoted Christian. She taught in a Sunday-school, went about distributing tracts, and performed many works of charity, and it could have been truly said of her, 'she went about doing good.' Last December she fell ill, and was laid aside from all her good work, for in a few days she was on her death-bed. The night on which she died her friends were gathered around her bed. Half an hour after they thought she was gone, she suddenly started up in bed, and with thrilling distinctness she cried, 'I am lost. I have been in hell and to hell I return.' With these words she fell back upon her pillow—dead. Dear friends, that is a real case that happened only last December. This lady had trusted to her good works and not to Christ for salvation."

A Man Thrown Out of Window.—"There is a soldier in the barracks just now who formerly delighted in all that was bad, but sixteen months ago he came to the loving Saviour, and that man has suffered much, and is still suffering, for Christ's sake. When he first came out for Christ, he returned to the barracks, and that night before retiring to rest he knelt down before thirty of his comrades. They immediately began to pelt him with anything they could get their hands upon, saying as they did so, that they would knock this religion out of him. But they did not rest there; they opened the window and threw him out. That man has fought several battles while he was in Satan's service, and now he is no less courageous in fighting a more fearful battle, with his hand clasped firmly in Christ's, because he feels he was plucked as a brand from the burning."

The Best Swimmer of the Crew.—Mr. Mackenzie remarked: "When I was in the North some time ago I witnessed a scene which I shall not soon forget. Three or four Norwegian vessels were anchored when a severe storm swept over the north-east coast, and one of the vessels struck on the sands, and in a short time all on board were struggling for life. One after another sank beneath the waves in view of the pitying throng which stood gazing, yet unable to lend a helping hand to rescue the poor perishing ones, who were soon to be plunged in a watery grave. At last only two remained grasping to a part of the vessel still above water. Oh, how eager those poor fellows were to be saved! Their eyes were looking imploringly toward the shore, when a huge billow came rolling down carrying the two men with it. But here a brave fellow plunged into the surging water, and brought to shore one of them, the captain, and the only one saved of the whole crew. As soon as he regained consciousness he asked for one man, and when told that he was drowned, the strong fellow wept like a child for his companion, who, he said, was the best swimmer in the crew. He missed one stroke, and lost his life. Sinner, adrift on the ocean of time, struggling for eternal life, do not miss a stroke, lest your frail bark prove a wreck on the shores of eternity. Commit thyself to His keeping, for the Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost."

"$500 to Anyone Who Will Save Him!"—Mr. Campbell White related: "I heard recently of the terrible wreck of an American vessel. When the life-boats were being lowered to save the perishing crew, the brave hearts of some of the men trembled to venture in, for the water was exceedingly rough. One after another of the crew was swept from the deck and seen no more. A piercing cry of distress was heard from the crowd that stood on the shore, and a man's voice was heard above the storm to cry, as a poor young fellow was swept from the deck, 'Five hundred dollars to the man who will save that poor fellow.' 'Why give so much for one,' was asked, 'when so many are perishing?' 'Because he is my brother,' was the reply. Dear fellow-workers, are those poor creatures whom we see perishing all around us not all our brothers and sisters? And are we not commanded to stretch forth our hands and do what we can to save them, and it is only through love for them and love for our Saviour that we will succeed."

A Scare for Bill's Infidelity.—Mr. Mather, who was with the British troops recently in the Soudan said: "I heard of an infidel who went about from place to place lecturing, trying to bring man down to the level of beasts, telling them to eat, drink, and die, for there was no hereafter. He went to a mining village, and there got a few ignorant colliers to believe his message. There was one man among them who professed to believe what this infidel lecturer had said, and one day, when working in the mine, he was vigorously asserting his new views when a large piece of coal came rumbling down and struck him. He was fearfully wounded, and lay groaning at the bottom of the pit, and his cry was, 'O God, help me.' 'There is no God,' said his comrades. 'Yes, there is a God,' replied the wounded man, 'and if He does not come to my help now I shall go to hell.' 'But, Bill,' continued his comrades, 'you have just told us that there is no God, no heaven, and no hell, and why need you fear?' But this accident scared all the infidelity out of poor Bill, and he was a changed man in Christ Jesus from that time. 'The Gospel is the power of God unto salvation.'"

Groping in the Dark.—The Rev. Mr. Edgar related: "I was acquainted with a young man who was once reading the last chapter of the Book of Revelation. He stopped in his reading, and putting his thoughts into words, he said: 'Ah, I read here that nothing but the pure and holy can enter heaven, and nothing that defileth or maketh a lie can enter therein; and if that be the case I shall never be in heaven, for heaven is a holy place, and I am not holy, and so can never expect to be there.' So he gave up in despair. He continued to grope in this darkness for some time, and at length the thought came to him, as if it were sent by the Lord Himself: 'If ever I am to enter heaven it must be by the influence of another, for it cannot be anything in myself, for I am utterly unworthy.' Some time afterward he was listening to a preacher who was relating 'the old, old story of Jesus and His love.' As the young man listened, his heart was filled with tender thoughts of Him who poured out His life on Calvary for sinners. His head dropped on the bookboard as new thoughts came rushing like a flood upon his mind, for he now saw that this Holy Child Jesus came down and opened up a way that by Him he could enter heaven. But still a feeling of unfitness kept him back, and while he was in this undecided state, he seemed to hear the voice of Jesus saying: 'Now, young man, I have invited you, and if you still refuse to come unto Me, I can do without you, but you cannot do without Me.' These words were enough."

THIRTY-EIGHT times does the Bible make reference to this configuration of the features and quick expulsion of breath which we call laughter. Sometimes it is born of the sunshine, and sometimes of the midnight. Sometimes it stirs the sympathy of angels, and sometimes the cachination of devils. All healthy people laugh; whether it pleases the Lord or displeases Him, that depends upon when we laugh and at what we laugh. My theme this morning is the laughter of the Bible—namely, Sarah's laugh, or that of scepticism; David's laugh, or that of spiritual exultation; the fool's laugh, or that of sinful merriment; God's laugh, or that of infinite condemnation; heaven's laugh, or that of eternal triumph.

SARAH'S LAUGH.

I. Scene: an Oriental tent; the occupants, old Abraham and Sarah, perhaps wrinkled and decrepit. Their three guests are three angels, the Lord Almighty one of them. In return for the hospitality shown by the old people, God promises Sarah that she shall become the ancestress of the Lord Jesus Christ. Sarah laughs in the face of God; she does not believe it. She is affrighted at what she has done. She denies it. She says: "I didn't laugh." Then God retorted, with an emphasis that silenced all dispute: "But thou didst laugh." My friends, the laugh of scepticism in all the ages is only the echo of Sarah's laughter.

God says He will accomplish a thing, and men say it cannot be done. A great multitude laugh at the miracles. They say they are contrary to the laws of nature. What is a law of nature? It is God's way of doing a thing. You ordinarily cross the river by the Bridge; to-morrow you change for one day, and you go across Wall Street Ferry. You made the rule; have you not a right to change it? I ordinarily come in at that door (pointing to a side entrance) of the church. Suppose next Sabbath I should come in at the other door? It is a habit I have. Have I not a right to change my habit? A law of nature is his way of doing things. If He makes the law, has He not a right to change it at any time He wants to change it? Alas for the folly of those who laugh at God when He says: "I will do a thing," they responding: "You can't do it." God says that the Bible is true—it is all true. Bishop Colenso laughs. Herbert Spencer laughs. John Stuart Mill laughs. All great German universities laugh. Harvard laughs—softly! A great many of the learned institutions of this country, with long rows of professors seated on the fence between Christianity and infidelity, laugh softly. They say: "We didn't laugh." That was Sarah's trick. God thunders from the heavens: "But thou didst laugh!"

The Garden of Eden was only a fable. There never was any ark built; or, if it was built, it was too small to hold two of every kind. The pillar of fire by night is only the northern lights. The ten plagues of Egypt only a brilliant specimen of jugglery. The sea parted because the wind blew violently a great while from one direction.

The sun and moon did not put themselves out of the way for Joshua. Jacob's ladder was only horizontal and picturesque clouds. The destroying angel smiting the firstborn in Egypt was only cholera infantum become epidemic. The gullet of the whale, by positive measurement, is too small to swallow a prophet. The lame, the dumb, the blind, the halt cured by mere human surgery. The resurrection of Christ's friend only a beautiful tableau, Christ and Lazarus and Mary and Martha acting their parts well. My friends, there is not a doctrine or statement of God's Holy Word that has not been derided by the scepticism of this day.

I take up this Book of King James's translation. I consider it a perfect Bible, but here are sceptics who want it torn to pieces, and now with this Bible in my hand, let me tear out all those portions which the scepticism of this day demands shall be torn out.

WHAT SHALL GO FIRST?

"Well," says some one in the audience, "take out all that about the creation, and about the first settlement of the world." Away goes Genesis. "Now," says some one, "take out all that about the miraculous guidance of the children of Israel in the wilderness." Away goes Exodus. "Now," says some one else in the audience, "there are things in Deuteronomy and Kings that are not fit to be read." Away go Deuteronomy and the Kings. "Now," says some one, "the Book of Job is a drama; that ought to come out." Away goes the Book of Job. "Now," says some one, "those passages in the New Testament which imply the divinity of Jesus Christ ought to come out." Away go the evangelists. "Now," says some one, "the Book of Revelation—how preposterous; it represents a man with the moon under his feet and a sharp sword in his hand." Away goes the Book of Revelation. Now there are a few pieces left. What shall we do with them? "Oh," says some man in the audience, "I don't believe a word of the Bible from one end to the other." Well, it is all gone. Now, you have put out

THE LAST LIGHT FOR THE NATIONS.

Now it is the pitch darkness of eternal midnight. How do you like it?

But I think, my friends, we had better keep the Bible a little longer intact. It has done pretty well for a good many years. There are old people who find it a comfort to have it on their laps, and children like the stories in it. Let us keep it for a curiosity anyhow. If the Bible is to be thrown out of the school, and out of the court-room, so men no more swear by it, and it is to be put in a dark corridor of the city library, the Koran on one side, and the writings of Confucius on the other, then let us each one keep a copy for himself; for we might have trouble, and we would want to be under the delusions of its consolation; and we might die, and we would want the delusion of the exalted residence at God's right hand which it mentions.

Oh, what an awful thing it is to laugh in God's face, and hurl His revelation back at Him! After a while the day will come when they will say they did not laugh. Then all the hypercriticisms, all the caricatures, and all the learned sneers in the Quarterly Review will be brought to judgment, and amid the rocking of everything beneath, and amid the flaming of everything above, God will thunder: "But thou didst laugh!" I think at Christianity I ever remember was Theodore Parker's. He made the Word of God seem ridiculous, and he laughed on at our holy religion until he came to die, and then he said: "My life has been a failure; a failure domestically, I have no children; a failure socially, for I am treated in the streets like a pirate; a failure professionally, because I know but one minister that has adopted my sentiments." For a quarter of a century he laughed at Christianity, and ever since Christianity has been laughing at him. Now, it is a mean thing to go into a man's house and steal his goods; but I tell you the most gigantic burglary ever enacted is the proposition to steal these treasures of our holy religion. The meanest laughter ever uttered is the laughter of the sceptic.

II. The next laughter mentioned in this Bible is or the expression of spiritual exultation. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter." He got very much down sometimes, but there are other chapters where for four or five times he calls up the people to praise and exult. It was not a mere twitch of the lips; it was a demonstration that took hold of his whole physical nature. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter."

My friends, this world will never be converted to God until Christians cry less and laugh and sing more. The horrors are a poor bait. If people are to be persuaded to adopt our holy religion, it will be because they have made up their mind it is a happy religion, and they do not like an ultra-bilious Christianity. I know there are morbid people who enjoy a funeral. They come early to see the friends take leave of the corpse, and they steal a ride to the cemetery; but all healthy people enjoy a wedding better than they do a burial. Now, you make the religion of Christ sepulchral and hearse-like, and you make it repulsive.

I say plant the rose of Sharon along the church walks, and columbine to clamber over the church wall; and have a smile on the lip, and have the mouth filled with holy laughter. There is no man in the world except the Christian that has a right to feel an untrammelled glee. He is promised everything is to be for the best here, and he is on the way to a delight which will take all the procession with palm branches, and all the orchestra harped and cymballed and trumpeted to express. "Oh," you say, "I have so much trouble!" Have you more trouble than Paul had? What does he say? "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. Poor, yet making many rich. Having nothing, yet possessing all things."

THE MERRIEST LAUGH I EVER HEARD

has been in the sick-room of God's dear children. When Theodosius was put upon the rack, he suffered very great torture at the first. Somebody asked him how he endured all that pain on the rack. He replied: "When I was first put upon the rack, I suffered a great deal; but very soon a young man in white stood by my side, and with a soft and comfortable handkerchief he wiped the sweat from my brow, and my pains were relieved; it was a punishment for me to get from the rack, because when the pain was all gone, the angel was gone." Oh, rejoice evermore!

You know how it is in the army—an army in encampment. If to-day news comes that our side has had a defeat, and to-morrow another portion of the tidings comes, saying: "We have had another defeat," it demoralizes all the host. But if the news come of victory to-day and victory to-morrow, the whole army is impassioned for the contest. Now, in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, report fewer defeats; tell us the victories; victory over sin and death and hell. Rejoice evermore, and again I say rejoice.

III. The next laughter mentioned in the Bible that I shall speak of is or the expression of sinful merriment. Solomon was very quick at simile; when he makes a comparison we all catch it. What is the laughter of a fool like? He says: "It is the crackling of thorns under a pot." The kettle is swung, a bunch of brambles is put under it, and the torch is applied to it, and there is a great noise and a big blaze, and a sputter, and a quick extinguishment. Then it is darker than it was before. Fool's laughter! The most miserable thing on earth is a bad man's fun. There they are, ten men in a bar-room. They have at home wives, mothers, daughters. The impure jest starts at one corner of the bar-room, and crackle, crackle, crackle it goes all around. In five hundred such guffaws there is not one item of happiness.

They all feel bemeaned, if they have any conscience left. Have nothing to do with men or women who tell immoral stories. I have no confidence either in their Christian character or their morality.

So all merriment that springs out of the defects of others—caricature of a lame foot, or a curved spine, or a blind eye, or a deaf ear—will be met with the judgments of God, either upon you or your children. Twenty years ago, in this city of Brooklyn, I knew a man who was particularly skilful in imitating the lameness of a neighbor. Not long ago, a son of the skilful mimic had his leg amputated for the very defect which his father had mimicked years before. I do not say it was a judgment of God. I leave you to make your own inference. So all merriment that which starts at the counter of the drinking restaurant, or from the wine-glass in the home circle—the maudlin simper, the meaningless joke, the saturnalian gibberish, the paroxysm of mirth about nothing, that you sometimes see in the fashionable club-room or the exquisite parlor at twelve o'clock at night, are the crackling of thorns under a pot. Such laughter and such sins ends in death.

When I was a lad a book came out entitled "Don Jour's Patent Sermons;" it made a great stir, a very wide laugh all over the country, that book did. It was a caricature of the Christian ministry, and of the Word of God, and of the day of judgment. Oh, we had a great laugh! The commentary on the whole thing is that, not long ago, the author of that book died in poverty, shame, debauchery, kicked out of society, and cursed of Almighty God. The laughter of such men is the echo of their own damnation.

IV. The next laughter that I shall mention as being in the Bible is the laughter of God's condemnation. "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." Again, at him." Again: "I will laugh at his calamity." With such demonstration will God greet every kind of great sin and wickedness. Bad men build up villainies higher and higher. Good men almost pity God because He is so schemed against by men. Suddenly a pin drops out of the machinery of wickedness, or a secret is revealed, the foundation begins to rock; finally, the whole thing is demolished. What is the matter? I will tell you what is the matter. That crash of ruin is only the reverberation of God's laughter.

"THE LORD WILL LAUGH

On Wall Street there are a great many good men and a great many fraudulent men. A fraudulent man says: "I mean to have my million." He goes to work reckless of honesty, and he gets his first $100,000. He gets after a while his $200,000. After a while he gets his $500,000. "Now," he says, "I have only one more move to make, and I shall have my million." He gathers up all his resources; he makes that last grand move, he fails and loses all, and he has not enough money of his own left to pay the cost of the car to his home. People cannot understand this spasmodic revolution. Some said it was a turn in Erie Railroad stock, or in Western Union, or in Illinois Central; some said it was Jay Gould; some said it was one speculator, some another. They all guessed wrong. I will tell you what it was: "He that sitteth in the heavens laughed."

A man in New York said he would be the richest man in the city. He left his honest work of chair-making, and got into the city councils some way, and in ten years stole fifteen million dollars from the city government. Fifteen million dollars! He held the Legislature of the State of New York in the grip of his right hand. Suspicions were aroused. The Grand Jury presented indictments. The whole land stood aghast. The man who expected to put half the city in his vest-pocket goes to Blackwell's Island; goes to Ludlow Street Jail; breaks prison, and goes across the sea; is re-arrested and brought back, and again remanded to jail.

Why? "He that sitteth in the heavens laughs."

Rome was a great empire; she had Horace and Virgil among her poets; she had Augustus and Constantine among her emperors. But what mean the defaced Pantheon, and the Forum turned into a cattle-market, and the broken-walled Coliseum, and the architectural skeleton of her great aqueducts? What was that thunder? "Oh," you say, "that was the roar of the battering-rams against her walls." No. What was that quiver? "Oh," you say, "that was the tramp of hostile legions." No. The quiver and the roar were the outburst of omnipotent laughter from the defied and insulted heavens. Rome defied God and He laughed her down. Thebes defied God and He laughed her down. Nineveh defied God and He laughed her down. Babylon defied God and He laughed her down.

There is an immense difference between God's laugh and His smile. His smile is eternal beatitude. He smiled when David sang, and Miriam clapped the cymbals, and Hannah made garments for her son, and Paul preached, and John kindled with apocalyptic vision, and when any man has anything to do and does it well.

HIS SMILE!

Why, it is the apple orchards in full bloom. It is morning breaking on a rippling sea. It is heaven at high noon, all the bells beating the marriage peal. But His laughter—may it never fall on us! It is a condemnation for our sin. It is a wasting away. We may let the satirist laugh at us, and all our companions laugh at us, and we be made the target for the merriment of earth and hell; but God forbid that we should ever come to the fulfilment of the prophecy against the rejectors of the truth: "I will laugh at your calamity." But, my friends, all of us who reject the pardon of the Gospel are to come under that tremendous bombardment.

God wants us all to repent; He counsels, He coaxes, He importunes, He begs us. He comes down out of heaven. He puts all the world's sin on one shoulder, He puts all the world's sorrow on the other shoulder, and then, with that Alps on one side and that Himalaya on the other, He starts up the hill back of Jerusalem to achieve our salvation. He puts the palm of His right hand on one long spike, and He puts the palm of His left hand on another long spike, and then, with his hands spotted with His own blood, He gesticulates, saying: "Look! look! and live! With the crimson veil of My sacrifice I will cover all your sins. With my dying groan I will swallow up all your groans. Look! live!"

But a thousand of you this morning turn your back to that. And then this voice of invitation turns to a tone divinely ominous, that sobs like a simoon or an equinox through the first chapter of Proverbs: "Because I have called and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel and would none of my reproof, I also will laugh at your calamity." Oh, what a laugh that is! A deep laugh. A long, reverberating laugh. An overwhelming laugh. God grant we may never hear it. But in this day of merciful visitation yield your heart to Christ, that you may spend all your life on earth under His smile and escape forever the thunder of the laugh of God's indignation.

V. The other laughter mentioned in the Bible, the only one I shall speak of, is or the expression of eternal triumph. Christ said to His disciples: "Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh." That makes me know positively that we are not to spend four days in heaven singing long-metre songs. The formalistic and stiff notions of heaven that some people have would make me miserable. I am glad to know that the heaven of the Bible is not only a place of holy worship, but of magnificent sociality. "What," say you, "will the ringing laugh go around the circles of the saved?" I say, yes; pure laughter, cheering laughter, holy laughter. It will be a laugh of congratulation.

When we meet a friend who has suddenly come to a fortune, or who has got over some dire sickness, do we not shake hands, do we not laugh with him? And when we get to heaven and see our friends there, some of them having come up out of great tribulation, why, we will say to one of them: "The last time I saw you, you had been suffering for six weeks under a low intermittent fever;" or to another we will say: "You for ten years were limping with the rheumatism, and you were full of complaints when we saw you last. I congratulate you on your eternal recovery." Ye shall laugh. Yes, we shall congratulate all those who have come up out of great financial embarrassments in this world, because they have become

MILLIONAIRES IN HEAVEN.

Ye shall laugh, it will be a laugh of reassociation. It is as natural for us to laugh when we meet those we haven't seen for ten years, as anything is possible to be natural. And when we meet our friends, over whose departure we lamented ten, twenty, thirty years before, will it not be with infinite congratulation? our perceptions quickened, our knowledge improved? We will know each other at a flash, and have to talk over all that happened since we have been separated, the one that has been ten years in heaven telling us of all that has happened in the ten years of his heavenly residence, and we telling him in return what has happened during the ten years of his absence from earth.

Ye shall laugh. I think George Whitefield and John Wesley will have a laugh of contempt for their earthly collisions, and that Toplady and Charles Wesley will have a laugh of contempt for their earthly misunderstandings, and the two farmers who were in a lawsuit all their days will have a laugh of contempt over their earthly disturbance about a line fence. Exemption from all annoyance. Immersion in all gladness. Ye shall laugh.

Yes; it will be a laugh of triumph. Oh, what a blessed thing it will be to stand on the wall of heaven, and look down at Satan, and hurl at him defiance, and see him shake his chains, and we free from his clutches! Yes; it will be a laugh of royal greeting. You know how the Frenchmen cheered when Napoleon came back from Elba. You know how the English cheered when Wellington came back from Waterloo. You know how the Americans cheered when Kossuth arrived from Hungary. You remember how the Romans cheered when Pompey came back victor over nine hundred cities. Every cheer was a laugh. But oh, the mightier greeting, the gladder greeting, when the snow-white cavalry troops of heaven shall go through the streets; according to Revelation, Christ, in the red, the crimson coat, seated on a white horse, and all the armies of heaven flying on white horses; but when we see and hear that galloping cavalcade, we shall cheer, we shall laugh.

Does not your heart beat and cry this morning at the thought of that great jubilee upon which we are soon to enter? I pray God that when we get through with this world and are going out of it, we may have the same vision that a Christian had when he said he saw written all over the clouds of the sky and they asked him, standing by his side, what he thought that letter W meant. Oh, he says, that stands for Welcome. So may it be when we quit this world. W on the gate, W on the door of the mansion, W on the throne. Welcome, Welcome, Welcome.

I have preached this sermon with five prayerful wishes: That you might see what a mean thing is the laughter of scepticism, what a bright thing is the laugh of spiritual exultation; what a hollow thing is the laugh of sinful merriment; what an awful thing is the laugh of condemnation; what a radiant, rubicund thing is the laughter of eternal triumph. Avoid the ill, choose the right; be comforted, be comforted. Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh—ye shall laugh!

AN INFIDEL OVERCOME.

MR. HAMMOND'S work among children in London has been frequently mentioned in the secular press, and some of the reports were discussed at an atheistic club recently. The idea of conversion, and especially of the conversion of children, was ridiculed. The club was of opinion that the conversions were merely mental excitement, which could be produced as easily by an unbeliever as by a Christian. They therefore delegated one of their number to attend Mr. Hammond's meetings, to mingle in the inquiry meetings, and to convert some child "just as the Christians pretended to do."

The person delegated, therefore, went to the meeting in the Y. M. C. A. hall at Finsbury Park, and when the inquiry meeting began he went among those who remained, and finding quite a small boy he began to talk with him. The boy began to cry as he spoke to him, evidently having before been brought under deep conviction of sin. The infidel could not understand this, and when the little boy (supposing that he was a Christian man like the others, trying to help the children to trust in Christ) asked him to pray with him, the infidel, to carry out his arranged project, kneeled down, but the hand of God rested upon him. He dared not mock God. He could not pray, and he remained on his knees, dumbfounded for several minutes, himself a convicted sinner. He rose from his knees and ran out of the hall, as if pursued by an invisible agent, resolving never to go again; but the unseen hand drew him back. For three days he was in great distress about his soul. He remained to the inquiry meetings.

The gentleman who narrated this incident at Mr. Hammond's meeting afterward, talked with him, and said: "I found him under deep conviction of sin, and pointed him to Christ as his all-sufficient Saviour."

He took back all his books and badges to the infidel club, and told them that these meetings were no sham, that children could be converted, and that he had seen them converted while trying to prove the falsity of the work, had been convinced of the reality, and he begged his old companions to follow his example.

MAGIC WATER.

THE perversity of the world in refusing the living water freely offered by Christ (John 4: 10-14), which has been found by all who have taken it the unfailing remedy for spiritual malady, is brought into strong light by contrast with the conduct of some people in North Carolina. They are going in crowds to a newly-discovered mineral spring of "magic water," as the colored people call it, to try it for the cure of physical disorders. A dispatch to the New York Times says:

"A curious spring has been discovered in Ashe County, N. C. A woodcutter recently working some distance from his home told the lad who accompanied him to search the neighborhood for a spring, as the water carried from their home was too warm to be refreshing. Following the stream by the roadside, the boy reached a point where it again came out by the roadside. This spot was a tangled mass of briars and overhanging shrubs, but the boy penetrated the thicket and, following the curve, found near the edge of the stream, but literally in its bed, a spring.

"He cleaned out the dead leaves, twigs, and other rubbish, and put the spring in 'running order.' In so doing he had to thrust his arm almost to the elbow into the water. This arm was in a swollen and inflamed condition from poison oak, and had been so for some time. The next morning it was noticed that as much of the arm as had been in the water was improved. The change had been so sudden that its relief was attributed to its having been so long in the water on the preceding day. The boy determined to try a second application of his new remedy, and on the next morning his arm was well. The boy's father then tried the efficacy of the water upon sores which had annoyed him for many weeks, and in a marvellously short time was entirely relieved.

"He then concluded to keep secret the locality of the spring, allowing no one to go to it but himself, but always keeping a supply of water at his house. The neighbors swarmed to his house to try the magic water. Many were healed of various maladies, and all were eager to know where the spring was situated. The old man kept his secret, however, going under cover of night to fetch the water. Finally he was followed to his life-giving fountain. In less than twenty-four hours every briar and bramble for many a yard around had been beaten down by the feet of men and hoofs of horses, so great was the throng coming and going. From that day people came from far and near, driving sometimes thirty or forty miles in a wagon and waiting several days for a chance to fill their barrels. "Only a partial analysis of the water has as yet been made. A New Orleans chemist says its specific gravity is 1.001, and that it is largely charged with carbonic acid. It contains iron, the sulphates, chlorides and carbonates of calcium and magnesia."

A CURE FOR BAD TEMPER.

AT the close of a meeting at which the subject of besetting sins had been spoken of, a gentleman accosted one of the speakers with the words: "I should like to tell you my case," and added: "I keep a school, and for years my temper was sadly tried by my boys. Being, as I trust I am, a converted man, and a professing follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, I felt that by giving way to my temper I was dishonoring my Lord and Master. This was a sad grief to me. It was a bad example for my boys, and I knew it must mar my influence with them.

"I struggled against it. I made it a subject of earnest prayer. Night after night I confessed my sin, and sought strength to overcome it, but all in vain. I then wrote down and kept on my desk a memorandum of my transgressions, hoping that the constant sight of the reminder of my sins might serve as a check and cure, but still in vain. The outbursts of temper broke over all such barriers. Again and again I confessed and wept over my sad and sinful habit. This state of things went on for weeks and months. I knew not what to do. All my efforts were fruitless; all my good resolutions were broken. I was at length so driven to utter self-despair as regarded this matter that one night I fell upon my knees, and cried unto the Lord and said: 'It is no use, Lord; I give it up; undertake for me.'

"It is now five years ago since this happened. The Lord did undertake for me; He did for me what I could not do for myself. Since that time I have never once been out of temper with my boys, nor have I once felt the inclination to be so."

GOSPEL DAWN IN INDIA.

AT the anniversary of the Calcutta Bible Society celebrated in that city on February 25th, the Lieutenant-Governor, in the course of his speech, referred to an incident which recently took place at Pooree, the famous shrine of the idol Juggernaut and one of the most sacred shrines in all India. Vast multitudes of pilgrims still make painful journeys to the place, but the temple priests are no longer able to extort money as in former days. A wealthy rajah not long since visited the temple, and after performing the customary rites sent to the head Brahmin to know how much he should pay for the privileges enjoyed? The answer was a prompt demand for 25,000 rupees ($9450), whereupon the rajah coolly walked off without giving anything.

Another amusing illustration of the decline of reverence for the shrine was given by His Honor. At the annual airing given to the idols, the ponderous car was dragged out several miles with the utmost difficulty, but enough willing hands could not be found to drag it back again. The priests were for a time in the utmost consternation. If the car was not taken back within seven days, it would be illegal, according to the traditions, to move it again for five years. In this emergency they had recourse to the Collector, who weakly yielded to their importunity, and gave them assistance in getting the great idol back to his temple. For this unwarranted meddling he received a gentle wiggling, but the incident shows how rapidly old-time Hinduism is losing its hold on the people. Not many years ago the people were so eager in their efforts to lend a hand in dragging the car that they threw one another down, and often those thus prostrated were crushed beneath the wheels.

WOMEN IN MOROCCO.

THE Mission to the Kabyles and other Berber races is actively engaged in teaching Gospel truth to the women in Tangier and other cities in Morocco. One of the missionaries gives the following incidents illustrating the condition of the female population in that country:

"In the houses of the Moorish women a terrible state of things exists. They are considered to have no souls, consequently no provision is made for their spiritual needs. There are the mosques, which are attended five times a day, but by men only, the women being debarred this privilege. Neither are they able to read, so that their life is pitiable indeed. They therefore gladly welcome the visits of the lady missionaries, and attentively listen to the Word of God.

"Their condition is illustrated by the following incident: An Eastern prince, on returning from a visit to Europe, astonished his sister by describing what he had seen, and the manner in which women were treated there, but she replied, 'It cannot be so; thou art mad.' He went on to say that women in Europe were even taught to read. 'Ah, my poor brother, now I know thou art mad,' was the reply, and she declared it was useless for him to attempt to teach her to read. Shortly afterward she saw him in the courtyard with a book, apparently attempting to teach a donkey to read. With tears in her eyes, she exclaimed, 'Oh, my brother, thou art indeed mad! Who but a madman would try to teach his donkey to read?' 'Then,' he replied, 'thou art no better than this donkey. It is useless for me to try and teach him to read, and thou sayest it is useless to try and teach thee!' She acknowledged the force of this argument, learned to read, and became an educated and intelligent woman.

A YOUNG LAZARUS.

DR. T. J. BARNARDO, whose rescue work among the slums of London is well known, thus describes one of his protégés:

"Among the candidates for admission at an 'out of work' dinner, I came across one poor fellow whose ragged dress was a real curiosity, suggesting several conjectures. First, could he be colder if divested of it than he was when he wore it? Second, how ever could he contrive to get it off? Third, having once got it off, how ever could he get it on again? It was indeed fearfully and wonderfully made, like, as one who was present said on beholding it, 'nothing in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.'

"The lad was a beggar by profession and by compulsion; the compulsion arising out of his necessities, and the profession simply, as it were, the fine art of the thing, so that, having to do it, he did it. Just so. The lad's story was more wonderful even than his dress. The latter could be cut off and burned, as I had the satisfaction of seeing done next day; but the story! ah me! will he ever get that out of his heart and life?

"He was thrust out upon the streets at eleven years of age, where for eight years he had lived a jack-o'-lantern kind of life—flitting hither and thither, often pursued, but seldom caught. What that boy suffered on his way to manhood would fill as many pages as I can only give it lines; but there he stood before me, without one friend on God's earth, a piece of social drift. Yet, spite of all, he had a good face—a face which when feeling the reality of your sympathy as you talked with him, cast aside its professional-beggar expression of feature, and reflected a mind capable of higher thoughts.

He had not fared so well as a beggar that he was enamored of the streets; and, as may be guessed, the late severe weather was one too many for him. So he jumped in a moment, as a hungry carp would at a fat caddis, at the prospect of a home for which he would have to work hard. Do not ask me to give his real name. Call him Lazarus, if you will, for he had many sores and often lay at Dives' gate. There was this difference, however, between him and his biblical namesake: he was often so hungry that he was more like to devour any dogs that came in his way than to allow them to perform in quietness any beneficent offices toward him. But his homeless wanderings are, I trust, at length over; and it will be the poor lad's own fault if ever from this hour he lacks a friend, a home, or a meal. And it will be our fault if he does not learn while with us of the better Friend and the fairer home beyond, the knowledge of which has been to so many other 'waifs' like himself the stimulus to a nobler life."

A RUNAWAY BOARDER.

It was prophesied of Christ that He would open the prison to them that were bound (Isa. 61: 1). There are many, however, who are held captive by Satan who will not avail themselves of the victory the Saviour won over their tyrant. Even though they know that liberty may be had, they will not recover themselves out of the snare (II Tim. 2: 26). They do not show the audacity that a prisoner captured in our war displayed, and who was taxed with it, much to his confusion, recently. The St. Louis Republican relates the incident:

"A few days ago, while an old gray-haired man was sitting in one of our hotels, a stranger got off a train which had just arrived and passed through the waiting-room. He eyed the old man closely, and over the face of the latter there flashed a look of recognition.

"Pardon me," said the stranger, "your face has a familiar look to me, yet I cannot place you! Perhaps I'm mistaken."

"Oh, no," answered the elderly gentleman, "I know you are not mistaken. I know you. You used to board with me."

"Is it possible?" said the stranger.

"Yes, sir; and you left without paying your board."

"That, sir, cannot be," said the new-comer, very much confused.

"Oh, but it can. I say you left without paying your board, and you left in the night."

"By this time the stranger was furious. He grew red with anger, and intimated that only the gray hairs of the tormentor saved him from violent treatment.

"You need not get mad," said the old man, coolly, and enjoying immensely the stranger's discomfiture. "You did all these things and left your baggage behind you."

"See here, old man, who are you, any way, and where are you from?"

"I am Captain Jack Warner, and you are Quartermaster Murphy, and you escaped from the prison at Libby while I was commissary of that institution."

"The stranger warmly clasped the hand of the old ex-rebel, 'are you, indeed, the old commissary? Well, you are right. I did board with you; and I gave you the slip, too,' he continued, laughing.

Quartermaster Murphy belonged to a New York regiment and was captured and sent to Libby. It was the practice of the Confederates to allow those persons who were practitioners of medicine to attend the sick in the prison hospital. They were allowed the freedom of the grounds, to go and come at will. One day a green sentry would not allow the men to pass, when he was sharply reprimanded by Captain Gibbs, and told that those men who wore red ribbons on their coat lapels (this was the insignia of the doctors) should pass unmolested. Murphy overheard this and profited by it. In the inside of his vest he had some red flannel, and, tearing off a strip, he pinned it to his coat, and, watching his opportunity, he got past the guard and reached the Union lines in safety.

"The meeting described is the first since those days when, as captor and captive, they dwelt within the walls of the famous Southern prison."

TEN COMING GREAT EVENTS.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

SECOND EVENT: THE RISE OF ANTICHRIST.

Where he will Appear—The Time—His Conquests—Become Federal Head of the Ten Kingdoms—His Description in Prophecy—The Portrait of a Napoleon—Jerome Napoleon's Characteristics—The Fatal Number in his Name—A Revival of the Second Headship—The Way for an Alliance with a Pope Prepared—Lucien Bonaparte a Candidate for the Papal Chair.

As shown in the preceding chapter, the old Roman Empire will in the last days of this dispensation be reconstituted in ten kingdoms, which will eventually become Republics united federally for offence and defence. The executive head of this federation will be the being known in prophecy as Antichrist. He will arise eight or nine years before the End, as an Eleventh Little Sovereign among the Ten Sovereigns—The Little Horn of Daniel 7: 24 and 8: 8-25—who shall at first rule over some little kingdom partitioned out of one of the four Græco-Macedonian Horn-kingdoms of Greece, Egypt, Syria, or Thracian Turkey. He will be a Sovereign "of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences, and of crafty policy, destroying many by peace."

Antichrist shall then presently, according to Daniel 11: 21-42; 9: 27; 8: 9, "stand up in the place of the King of the North (Syria), and obtain the kingdom of Syria by flatteries," and make a seven years' covenant with the Jews seven years before the End, and "wax exceeding great toward the South, and toward the East, and toward the pleasant land" (Judæa), and subsequently wage three wars against Egypt, and then about two and a half years after the covenant he will advance from being merely King of Syria to be Head of France, and afterward of all the Ten Nations, then Red-Republics, as represented by the scarlet wild-beast (Rev. 17). He will subsequently be the Imperial Antichrist during the final three and one half years (Rev. 13: 1-8). The Antichrist

WILL BE A NAPOLEON.

For (1) his personal proper name must be etymologically in the Greek tongue Apollyon—in the Greek aorist Apoleon (Rev. 9, 11). And (2) "the number of his name" must be 666, in other words, the numerical value of the letters of his name in the dative inscription form, must altogether amount to 666 (Rev. 13: 18); and this is the case with the Greek word Ναπολεωντι, each letter of which in the Greek alphabet has the following numerical value:

Ν α π ο λ ε ο ν τ ι } = 666

And (3) the Antichrist must be a representative of the Napoleon dynasty "healed of its deadly wound inflicted by the sword" of war at Waterloo and Sedan, so that "all the world shall wonder" when they behold the Napoleon empire "that was and is not and yet is," i.e., that was existent, non-existent, and re-existent (Rev. 13: 3-14; 17: 8). He will however first be King of Syria for two or three years before reviving the Napoleon dynasty over France and Europe.

More than fifty clergymen and fifty laymen have shown in their treatises that the Napoleon dynasty became in 1806 the seventh governmental leadership of the Roman empire—"the seventh head that continued but a short space," until 1815, when it was "wounded to death by the sword at Waterloo;" but it yet shall be healed and re-established over France and Europe, and become more powerful than even in the time of the first Napoleon, and again possess military occupation of Rome and restore the temporal power of the Pope (Rev. 17: 10).

It seemed a few years ago that if any Napoleon rose to imperial power it would be the young Prince Louis, who was the head of the Bonaparte family. But physically and mentally he was not the man so graphically described in prophecy. Prince Louis Napoleon* was born in 1856, the lineal successor of his father, the late ex-Emperor Louis Napoleon III. (who died in January, 1873). But (it was remarked in the pamphlet, "The Coming Napoleon," published in March, 1873), "though he has the number 666 contained in his name, yet he is lacking in the characteristics of being a king of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences, and a despised person (Daniel 8: 23; 11: 21). It will remain to be seen whether some Napoleon who is more of a fierce countenance and a vile person does not after some time take his place."

Prince Jerome Napoleon, the cousin of the late emperor, who was born in 1823, seems the most likely of the Bonapartes to become the Personal Antichrist. He alone, of all of them, is a man "of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences"—i.e., of defiant aspect, and of great sagacity, and also "a vile person," notoriously ridiculed and vilified, and a Voltairian Infidel and Democrat, all of which the Antichrist is predicted to be in Daniel 8: 23; 11: 21, 36, 37. He has also been nicknamed in France, the Red Prince, because of his Red-Republican political views.

The Antichrist's ten-kingdomed confederacy is in its advanced stage represented as a scarlet-colored, or red-republicanized ten-horned wild beast in Revelation 17, when Bonapartism, Red-Republicanism, and Romanism will coalesce.

This Prince Paul Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte's face is the very image of the first Napoleon Bonaparte's, and the fatal number 666 is discovered in the Greek nominative for P. Jerome Napoleon; thus:

Π ι ε ρ ο μ ε Ν α π ο λ ε ο ν

80, 10, 5, 100, 70, 40, 5, 50, 1, 80, 70, 30, 5, 70, 50 = 666

Also, 666 is the sum total of the letters of the name P. Jerome Bonaparte, in Hebrew.

It is remarkable that Lucien Bonaparte, who at his ordination in 1858 was pointed to by the Rev. R. A. Purdon as likely to be Pope in the future, is now a Cardinal, and therefore eligible to be elected Pope some day. Should that event take place the way would be prepared for the alliance between Antichrist and the Papacy. A Napoleonic Pope would be the natural ally of the Napoleonic Antichrist.

* (Note added in 1880.) Since this paragraph was printed here in 1873, Prince Louis Napoleon was killed in the Zulu war, in June, 1879, and thus Prince Jerome Napoleon has become the head of the Napoleon dynasty as here predicted.

† There will be three successive forms of the ten-kingdomed confederacy, or ten-horned wild beast—1. When it primarily appears as the result of extraordinary conquests of France over Germany and other nations, before the eleventh little horn arises and subdues three of the ten horns, and consequently before the seven years' covenant. Later on, two years after the date of the covenant, there will distinctly exist ten horns at the time of the first-fruits' ascension of watchful Christians—the catching up of the man-child, for the ten-horned dragon is to watch to devour it (Rev. 12: 3-5). 2. When it comes scarlet-colored or red republican with the Scarlet Woman seated upon it—i.e., the then Papal Mohammedan Hierarchy seated in temporal power, upon the ten nations as their State Church, drunk with the blood of saints (Rev. 17: 3-8) during an interval of several months immediately preceding the final three and a half years. In this red republican sanguinary form it will be under its seventh Napoleonic headship revived, although as yet uncrowned, as Military Dictator over ten new military governors of the ten nations. 3. When it becomes leopard-colored—i.e., monarchical with ten-crowned horns under the Antichrist as Emperor for the final three and a half years (Rev. 13: 5). And then the Romish-Mohammedan Apostasy will no longer be seated on it, but as a two-horned satellite accompanying it. In this form it at last perishes (Rev. 19: 19).

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Compromise on the Vexed Question of the Senate's Secret executive sessions has been suggested and appears likely to be adopted. It was evident in the debate on the subject last week that the number of senators in favor of open sessions is increasing. There are not yet, however, sufficient votes to affect the change. The strong opinion in the country in favor of publicity will in the end have its effect on some waverers. It is therefore proposed, as a concession which may postpone the reform Senators Edmunds, Blair and Ingalls, so much dislike, that the journal of executive sessions be published. This will simply record the motions and resolutions offered in executive session, but will not give the speeches of individual senators. A large number of nominations were acted upon last week so the deadlock appears to be broken.

The Nomination of Senator Jackson, of Tennessee, to succeed the late Judge Baxter, as Circuit Judge, has given general satisfaction. He is everywhere spoken of both by Republicans and Democrats as a man of broad views, strict integrity, and profound legal knowledge. The Senate confirmed the nomination without reference to a committee. This appointment is of unusual importance at this time, because it was in Judge Baxter's court that the Bell Telephone suit was to be tried. There is some suggestion about removing it to another court now, because the new judge has a personal quarrel with Senator Harris, who has a large pecuniary interest in the suit. It is, however, believed that Judge Jackson is the kind of man who would try the case on its merits without regard to personal feeling.

An Amendment to the Arbitration Bill has been proposed by Senator Sherman. It completely changes its character and aim. The Senator proposes that an Arbitration Commission be appointed consisting of twelve members, of whom two shall be selected from the Senate, and three from the House. The Commission to "investigate all the controversies that have arisen or are likely to arise between employers and the employed," and to make its report to Congress. How long it would take any commission to investigate past controversies, without exercising its prophetic powers, may be imagined. If the Commission ever lived to complete its labors, which is improbable, the amendment provides a pitfall for its report, where it would be safe from producing any practical result. Why the report should be sent to Congress instead of dropping it into the sea or burning it, does not appear. The end would be practically the same, and the way of getting rid of the report would be less expensive. It may be hoped that General Logan or some other Senator who has the interest of the people at heart, will expose the true character of this amendment, and advocate the enactment of the House bill, in which there is some real promise of good.

The Strike in the Southwest was Maintained throughout last week. Voluntary subscriptions at the rate of $3000 a day are acknowledged by the Knights as received to aid them in their struggle. Their prospects are, however, far worse than a week ago. Since the companies obtained military assistance they have been able to move their freight. Under the protection of the bayonets freight trains have been dispatched with some approach to regularity, and the new employés are getting accustomed to their work. The Knights are still anxious for arbitration. Mr. Powderly has made another appeal to Mr. Gould to end the strike, and avoid a long and expensive litigation in the courts. There has been a reply published from Mr. Gould. The reading of the two letters leads disinterested persons to abandon hope of a peaceable settlement, and to wish that some tribunal existed for the arbitration of this and similar disputes. When abuse and recrimination take the place of sober argument, a decision from an authority both parties were bound to respect would be a public benefit.

Eleven New York Aldermen and ex-Aldermen were arrested on April 13th, and a twelfth was captured the next day. The charge against them is of taking a bribe of $20,000 each for their votes, granting the franchise to the Broadway surface railroad. The Board which voted the franchise consisted of twenty-four members, of whom two voted against the steal. Of the other twenty-two, two are dead, one is an informer in custody, three have absconded, and sixteen have been arrested and admitted to bail. Three of the arrested men and one of those who have fled are members of the present Board of Aldermen. We notice that the arrest is spoken of in the press as a disgrace to the city. That is not quite so. The arrest is creditable; it was the election of such men that was a disgrace.

The Tornado Which Passed Through Minnesota on April 14th, was one of the most destructive of recent times. The three towns of St. Cloud, Sauk Rapids, and Rice's Station, which lay in its path, became scenes of devastation and death. A telegram from St. Cloud draws a graphic picture of the phenomenon. It states that the first warning of the approach of the tornado was the rolling of the clouds which hung low, and a noise like the crackling of fire. The funnel-shaped cloud was then near at hand, its tail dragging along the ground. Every one with presence of mind at once rushed to the cellars. In a few minutes the storm struck the city destroying everything in its path. Even the earth was ploughed up by it to the width of six hundred feet. In the track of the tornado stood the Manitoba freight-house and cars filled with freight. The whirlwind lifted the heavy cars from the tracks, and cast them to pieces in a shapeless mass. The iron rails were torn from the ties and twisted like the smallest wires. Fifteen cars were demolished. Seventy-four persons were killed in the three towns, and over two hundred severely injured. Among the killed were ten members of a wedding party, and included the bridegroom, the bride's mother, and the officiating clergyman.

Mr. Gladstone's Scheme for the Settlement of the Land Question in Ireland, which he explained in the House of Commons on Friday last, is of an extremely intricate character. In its present form it deals only with the smaller holdings. Mr. Gladstone proposes to buy these from any owners wishing to sell, and re-sell them to occupiers on easy terms. The money to pay for the land he proposes to raise by the issue of Government stock, at three per cent, amounting to $250,000,000. Of this, fifty millions will be issued next year, and one hundred millions each in 1888 and 1889. The maximum rate of purchase will be on the basis of twenty years' rental, but Mr. Gladstone expects that much will be bought at a lower price. This, with other provisions contained in the bill, suggests the suspicion that the Land bill is framed to draw support to the Home Rule scheme. An Irish landowner may be induced to vote for Home Rule if he sees a prospect of selling his estate to the Government for a lump sum equivalent to twenty years' rent. The bill is evidently objectionable to the Irish members who think the terms far too liberal to the landowners. They would prefer leaving the land question to be settled by an Irish Parliament. They may, however, discover that the only way to obtain Home Rule is to allow the British Parliament to purchase the consent of the landowners by some such scheme as this.

A Most Significant Feature of Mr. Gladstone's speech on the Land Question was that he made admissions which have never before come from the lips of a British Premier. He said: "The history of Ireland was one long indictment against its landowners. Agrarian crime had originated and increased under the absenteeism of landlords and raising of rents, as their expenses while away from Ireland increased. Oppression married to misery had a hideous progeny. Crime had been endowed with vitality to perpetuate itself and hand down its miserable inheritance from generation to generation. England was not clear of responsibility, for the deeds of Irish landlords were English deeds. With the power in our hands we have looked on and done nothing. After the union, absenteeism became general. National sentiment ceased to have a beneficial influence on the relations between landlord and tenant. The union itself was obtained against the sense and wish of every class by wholesale bribery and unblushing intimidation." This is what Irishmen have been declaring for many years, but British statesmen have denied it. Mr. Chamberlain's opposition appears to be based on the admissions Mr. Gladstone thus made. The clumsy cable report of his speech means this if it means anything. He appears to think that if the landowners have behaved so badly and have wrought so much trouble for the empire they do not deserve to be so liberally dealt with.

The Sudden Appearance of Cholera in Italy is reported. The European correspondent of the New York Herald cabled to that journal on April 15th that rumors of seizures had been prevalent for some days, and added: "To-day I have information that there have been sixty-two undoubted cases, with several deaths, of which three are undoubtedly from Asiatic cholera. There are also some cases in the country immediately around Brindisi, but it is difficult to get at the precise facts on account of the reticence of the local authorities. Cases of cholera are reported from Trieste. The outbreak of the disease in Italy is said to be more serious than was at first stated. The authorities there, it is alleged, are hiding the truth regarding the ravages of the disease. The Austrian authorities have again established a cordon on the Italian frontier, and every precaution will be taken to prevent the spread of the epidemic."

The Official Inquiry into the Wreck of the Oregon has been commenced. An important witness was the Superintendent of the Cunard Line, who testified that he examined personally the condition of the bulkheads and compartments of the Oregon before sailing her last trip, and thought these and the doors were satisfactory. He explained the failure of the doors to close by the presence of some foreign body washed into the door grooves of the compartments during the collision. He also testified that the Oregon's boats were in excess of the requirements of the English statutes. A diver who examined the vessel on Tuesday of last week states that she is broken in two by a rent eighteen feet wide; this was doubtless done when she struck the bottom. The hole from which the vessel sank was also examined. The sides were bulged inward, which fact disproves the dynamite theory. There were also marks on the Oregon's side showing where the colliding vessel had scraped the paint off.

The Appeal on Behalf of Burmah to Sunday-school children made by the Rev. Edward Judson, of New York, son of the famous missionary, Dr. Adoniram Judson, has received a liberal response. Mr. Judson asked the Baptist Sunday-schools of the country for ten cents from each scholar to enable the Baptist Missionary Union to send missionaries into Northern Burmah, which has recently been made accessible by its annexation to the British Crown. He has already received $15,000.

A Converted Hebrew Lady was Baptized by Mr. Freshman at the Hebrew Christian Church in New York on March 21st. She ascribed her conversion to the blessing of God on Mr. Freshman's teaching. In the course of an interesting letter which was read at the ordinance, she said: "I gained the information which led to my finding all proofs necessary for me in the Book of Isaiah, I being at the time of my conversion almost a stranger to the New Testament. Jesus has given me a new heart. A Hebrew once receiving the blessed Spirit of God cannot mistake Him for any other."

Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, is now laboring on the Pacific Coast, having finished a six months' mission tour in Nebraska. In a recent letter to the Witness he thus sketches his arrangements: "I have been the instrument of saving, through the grace of God, a great many human souls since I came here. I stop in Laramie the first week, in Utah the next week; Nevada for some time; California about a month; Victoria and different points in that section whatever time is profitable."

An Infamous Traffic has been Discovered by the Canadian authorities. A telegram from Quebec dated April 17th says that wholesale trading in young and innocent girls for purposes of prostitution has come to the notice of the authorities. Disreputable houses in Chicago, New York, Boston, and other cities in the United States have agents here who ingratiate themselves with young women and induce them to go to the States, where they are drawn into a life of infamy. Their trade has been carried on to an alarming extent, sometimes fifteen females being shipped in a week. The prices paid to the agents are in accordance with the looks of the girls, varying from $20 to $200. The police, Government authorities, and clergy held a consultation to-day over the abduction of two young women to Chicago by a female who intends to dispose of them for immoral purposes. The poor girls left by the Grand Trunk Railway on Monday night, and every attempt has been made to arrest the culprit within the Canadian line. The American Consul has been consulted, and an important letter has been drafted for the British Consul at Washington. It is stated that over fifty girls have been sent to one Chicago house within a year.

The Liquor-Dealers in Rhode Island are endeavoring to reverse the decision of the people at the recent election. It appears that in some places there has been a technical informality in the election. All the ward and town clerks in the State have been called upon to provide certified copies of the voting lists, and the clerks are to make a certified copy of the registry lists, showing the time each person registered, and when and by whom his tax was paid. This is being done at the request of prominent lawyers, who, it is understood, are to carry before the Supreme Court the question as to whether a vote cast by a registered voter whose tax was paid by other persons than himself is legal or illegal, and the certified lists referred to are to be used in discriminating between the registry voters, providing the courts decide in the negative. This is done, undoubtedly, in the hope of quashing the vote on the prohibitory amendment. It is illegal to pay taxes for others, but the practice has prevailed in Rhode Island for years. We learn, through the kindness of a subscriber, that the telegraphic report on which our paragraph on the election was based contained an error. Colonel Metcalf, the successful candidate for Attorney-General, was not the Democratic candidate, but the regular Prohibition nomination, which the Democratic Convention indorsed.

A Cherry-tree Valued at Nine Hundred Dollars was recently cut down to make room for a railroad. The tree stood in the way of the Southern Pacific narrow gauge railway extension that is being pushed at Almaden, and the owner asked about $900 for the tree. Experts were appointed, and he then showed that it had for years yielded him crops each of which sold for sums equivalent to the interest on the amount named. They finally agreed to award him $600, and the tree had to go. Probably the man who planted it had little idea of the value to which it would attain. It is so with much of the work we do. A good book written, a word spoken in season may be blessed of God to the conversion of some man whose whole after life will be fruitful in beneficent service (Eccles. 11:6).

A Man with Only One Object in Life was recently met in Mexico by an American traveler, who says that one of his fellow-passengers was a German. "He was a man of prepossessing appearance, always ready to engage in conversation, but he had no eye for the scenery which delighted me so much." By profession he pretended to be a musical composer, and his whole discourse was of pianos. His journey through the country was for the purpose of tuning pianos, and his heart was certainly in his work. "When I travels," said he, "I care nothing for scenery, or anything—only pianos. One time in Central America I see a volcano with fire come out of it, but I wouldn't look at it. I had no time for such things. I think only of pianos. When I go into a place, and find no pianos there, I go me right out again, quick, always." That man is likely to be successful in his business. It is a pity that the same singleness of purpose so seldom characterizes Christians, who have infinitely better reason to forget everything but their Master's commission (1 Cor. 2:2).

An Appropriate Stone for a Monument was presented to a family for erection in Greenwood Cemetery last week. The rapid increase in the traffic over the Brooklyn Bridge has rendered better terminal facilities necessary. In making them the trustees had to remove the granite block at the end of the southern roadway at the New York terminus. It appears that this block was the first stone set in the construction of the structure which is now the wonder of the world. The trustees have therefore resolved that "in memory of the public services rendered by the late William C. Kingsley in the history of this bridge, hereby authorize the President to tender to the family of Mr. Kingsley the pedestal referred to, to be used as a monument over his grave in Greenwood Cemetery, and to be inscribed under their directions." A more appropriate disposition of the stone could not have been made, as it identifies the man with his work. What a wonderful sight our cemeteries would be, if every grave were so identified! Some graves would be unmarked as a sign of a life wasted, while for others no monument would be so suitable as a stone from a ruined home. Too many forget that their life makes such an imperishable record with which they will one day be confronted (1 Cor. 3:13).

A Man Who Wants to Know His own Name applied to the officials at Castle Garden, New York, last week for assistance. He is about twenty-four years of age, and is an intelligent man of distinguished appearance. He said that his earliest recollection was of a voyage across the ocean, and he thought that at the time he must have been about four years old. He was in charge of an Italian who was cruel to him. In New York he was taken to a house somewhere in the neighborhood of Rose Street, and the Italian taught him to play the violin. He was beaten, starved and subjected to much hardship. He was sent out into the streets to beg, and remembers various places where he stood playing his violin and picking up pennies thrown to him. As soon as he was able he ran away, and going into the country found kind people, who helped him to maintain himself by honest work. Close observance of himself and searching of his memory lead him to believe that he is the son of refined and aristocratic parents, from whom the padrone stole him in his infancy. He wanted the Castle Garden records searched for the record of the padrone's arrival twenty years ago. There is some confirmation of his suspicion in the fact that about that time inquiries were made from Italy for a child that had been stolen from the noble Colvello family. The Castle Garden officials are at work upon the clue. Something analogous to these traces of a higher nature which the Italian discovered in himself exists in all the human race. It confirms the revelation of the Bible that ours is a fallen race which has lost its sonship, and can recover it only through Christ (Rom. 5:18).

An Attempt to Set a Broken Neck has been made by some hospital surgeons on a patient at Elizabeth, N. J. Three years ago a young man who was exercising in a gymnasium, fell from a horizontal bar and was taken up unconscious. The doctors said he had broken his neck, and would not live many hours. He was taken home, and there recovered consciousness. He continued to live, but could not move a muscle below his neck. He lay in a helpless condition for two years, affectionately nursed by his family. A year ago the surgeons thought that his vitality was sufficiently established to bear an operation. An incision was made over the spine, and the vertebrae were exposed. It was found that splinters of bone had been crushed into the spinal column pressing on the nerves and checking the operation of the spinal cord. They were removed, and an effort made to restore connection between the uninjured parts. But there was a space of four inches which could not be bridged over. The heart and the brain were thus separated, and the operation was a failure. The patient recovered from its effects, but was never able to move a limb. He died on April 14th last, about a year after the operation. His motionless condition was that of existence rather than life. It resembled the condition in which many Christians are spiritually. While they are not dead they are not active in God's service. Only those who are in Christ, deriving their life and strength direct from Him in a constant uninterrupted stream, can do real service in His cause (John 15:5).

The Heroism of a Little Girl Twelve Years old saved the lives of two children in Virginia during the recent heavy snow-storm. The Evanston Chieftain states that a farmer and his wife, being called to that city by the sudden illness of a daughter, left at home four children, the eldest of whom was Minnie, only twelve years of age. The parents were unable to return that night, and the younger children became lonely and scared. Minnie did her best to calm them, but at last, finding their alarm serious, yielded to their entreaties to take them to a ranch three and a half miles away where they had friends. The children plodded through the soft snow until they became tired and sleepy. Minnie carried the youngest until she, too, was worn out. Finally, when half way between the two places, it was found impossible to go farther. Then the brave girl took the cloak from her shoulders and made a bed in a sheltered spot on which she placed the three children. She took off her dress and warm skirt and wrapped around them. Leaving them there she ran, all thinly clad as she was, to the top of a bank and cried loudly for help. Happily her cries were heard, and a man on horseback rode to their succor. One child died from the effects of the exposure, and little Minnie's life was in the balance for several days. Eventually she and the other two were saved. When those children grow up they will be very ungrateful if they forget the noble girl who perilled her life that winter night to save them from death; yet how few people, comparatively, there are who give their love to One who actually laid down His life to save them from eternal death (11 Cor. 8:9).

WHY THEY LEAVE US.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

(Suggested by the death of CHARLES STANFORD, D.D.)

"Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory, which Thou hast given me: for Thou lovedst Me before the foundation of the world."—JOHN 17: 24.

The Last Step of Our Lord's Petition—A Long Step—Its New Tone—The Line of Graves—Who Holds the Magnet—The Answer to the Riddle of Death—I. The Home-Word—The Dear Relationship—The Father's House—The Place for Home-Gathering—II. The Home Impetus—A Testamentary Appointment—III. The Home Character—IV. The Home Companionship—The Occupation—V. The Home Atmosphere—The Celestial Conscript.

THE prayer of the Saviour rises as it proceeds. He asked for His people that they might be preserved from the world, then that they might be sanctified, and then that they might be made manifestly one; and now he reaches His crowning point—that they may be with Him where He is, and behold His glory. It is well when in prayer the spirit takes to itself wings. The prayer that swings to and fro like a door upon its hinges may admit to fellowship; but that prayer is more after the divine pattern which, like a ladder, rises round by round, until it loses itself in heaven.

This last step of our Lord's prayer is not only above all the rest, but it is a longer step than any of the others. He here ascends, not from one blessing which may be enjoyed on earth, to another of higher degree; but He mounts right away from all that is of this present state into that which is reserved for the eternal future. He quits the highest peaks of grace, and at a single stride His prayer sets its foot in glory: "That they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am."

IN ANTICIPATION.

There is this to be noticed also concerning this divine prayer, that not only does it rise as to its subject, but it even ascends as to the place which the Intercessor appears to occupy. Has it not been so with yourselves in prayer at times, that you have hardly known where you were? You might have cried with Paul, "Whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell." Do not these words of our Lord Jesus remind you of this? Was He not carried away by the fervor of His devotion?

Where was He when He uttered the words of our text? If I follow the language I might conclude that our Lord was already in heaven. He says, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory." Does He not mean that they should be in heaven with Him? Of course He does; yet He was not in heaven; He was still in the midst of His apostles, in the body upon earth; and He had yet Gethsemane and Golgotha before Him ere He could enter His glory. He had prayed Himself into such an exaltation of feeling that His prayer was in heaven, and He Himself was there in spirit. What a hint this gives to us! How readily may we quit the field of battle and the place of agony, and rise into such fellowship with God that we may think, and speak, and act, as if we were already in possession of our eternal joy! By the ardor of prayer and the confidence of faith we may be caught up into Paradise, and there utter words which are beyond the latitude of earth, and are dated "from the Delectable Mountains."

THE NEW TONE.

Nor is this all; for still the prayer rises, not only as to its matter and place, but in a very singular way it also takes to itself a higher style. Before, our Lord had asked and pleaded; but now He uses a firmer word: He says, "Father, I will." I would not force that word so as to make it bear an imperious or commanding meaning, for the Saviour speaketh not so to the Father; but still it has a more elevated tone about it than asking. Our Lord here useth the royal manner rather than the tone of His humiliation. He speaketh like unto the Son of God; He addresses the great Father as one who counteth it not robbery to be equal with Him, but exercises the prerogative of His Eternal Sonship. He saith, "I will."

There ought to be much for our edification in a text like this, which in subject, place, and style rises to such an elevation. It is the apex of this wonderful pyramid of prayer; the last round of the ladder of light. O Spirit of the Lord, instruct us while we behold it!

THE LINE OF GRAVES.

I have taken this text because it has taken hold on me. Our beloved brother, Charles Stanford, has just been taken from us. I seem to be standing as one of a company of disciples, and my brethren are melting away. My brethren, my comrades, my delights, are leaving me for the better land. We have enjoyed holy and happy fellowship in days of peace, and we have stood shoulder to shoulder in the battle of the Lord; but we are melting away. One has gone; another has gone; before we look round another will have departed. We see them for a moment, and they vanish from our gaze. It is true they do not rise into the air like the Divine Master from Olivet; yet do they rise, I am persuaded of that; only the poor body descends, and that descent is for a very little while. They rise, to be forever with the Lord. The grief is to us who are left behind.

What a gap is left where stood Hugh Stowell Brown! Who is to fill it? What a gap is left where stood Charles Stanford! Who is to fill it? Who among us will go next? We stand like men amazed. Some of us stood next in the rank with those who have been taken. Why this constant thinning of our ranks while the warfare is so stern? Why this removal of the very best when we so much need the noblest examples? The Master is gathering the ripest of His fruit, and well doth He deserve them. His own dear hand is putting His apples of gold into His baskets of silver; and as we see that it is the Lord, we are

BEWILDERED NO LONGER.

His word, as it comes before us in the text, calms and quiets our spirits. It dries our tears, and calls us to rejoicing as we hear our heavenly Bridegroom praying, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given me, be with Me where I am." We understand why the dearest and best are going. We see in whose hand is held the magnet which attracts them to the skies. One by one they must depart from this lowland country to dwell above, in the palace of the King, for Jesus is drawing them to Himself. Our dear babes go home because "He gathered the lambs with His arm and carrieth them in His bosom;" and our ripe saints go home because the Beloved is come into His garden to gather lilies. These words of our Lord Jesus explain the continual home-going; they are the answer to the riddle which we call death.

I. Let us begin as our text begins, and thus the first thought about the continual gathering to the house above will be the rallying word: "Father." Observe, our Lord had said, "Holy Father," and toward the close of the prayer He said, "O righteous Father;" but in commencing this particular petition He uses the word "Father" by itself alone; this relationship is in itself so dear that it agrees best with the loftiest petition. I like to think of that name "Father," as used in this connection. Is it not the centre of living unity? If there is to be a family gathering and reunion, where should it be but in the Father's house? Who is at the head of the table but the Father? All the interests of the children unite in the parent, and he feels for them all.

The whole of this sermon through, I want to show you that it is right that we should part with our brethren and joyfully permit of their going home; and surely I may at once ask you—What can be more right than that children should go home to their Father? From Him they came, to Him they owe their life; should they not always tend toward Him, and should not this be the goal of their being, that they should at last dwell in His presence? Wherefore, whenever we think of heaven let us chiefly think of the Father; for it is in our Father's house that there are many mansions, and it is to the Father that our Lord has gone, that He may prepare a place for us.

"FATHER!" why, it is a bell that rings us home. He who hath the spirit of adoption feels that the Father draws him home, and he would fain run after Him. How intensely did Jesus turn to the Father! He cannot speak of the glory wherein He is to be without coupling His Father with it. This is the consummation which the First-born looks for, and to which all of us who are like Him are aspiring also—namely, that God may be all in all; that the great Father may be had in honor, and may be worshipped in every place. Since, then, we are from Him, and of Him, and to Him, and for Him, this word "Father" calls us to gather at His feet. Shall any one of us lament the process? No; we dare not complain that our choicest brethren are taken up to gladden the great Father's house.

II. Secondly, I want your thoughts upon

THE HOME IMPETUS.

The force which draws us home lies in the word, "I will." How shall the chosen get home to the Father? Chariots are provided. Here are the chariots of fire and horses of fire in this prayer. "I will," saith Jesus, "that they be with Me;" and with Him they must be. Examine the energy of this "I will" for a moment, and you will see, first, that it hath the force of an intercessory prayer. If He asks that we may be with Him where He is, He must assuredly have His request. More than intercession is found in the expression "I will." It suggests the idea of a testamentary bequest and appointment. The Lord Jesus is making and testament, and He writes, "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given Me, be with Me." No man who makes his will likes to have it frustrated. When I read in our Lord's testament the words, "Father, I will that they be with Me," I ask, "Who is to hold them back?"

HIS LAST WILL

Now read my text: "I will that they be with Me;" the Son of God wills it. How are the saints to be hindered from what the Lord wills? They must rise from their beds of dust and silent clay; they must rise to be with Jesus where He is, for Jesus wills it. By your anxious care you may seek to detain them; you may sit about their bed and nurse them both night and day, but they must quit these dark abodes when Jesus gives the signal. You may clutch them with affectionate eagerness, and even cry in despair, "They shall not go, we cannot bear to part with them;" but go they must when Jesus calls. Would you cross His will? Would you set at naught His testament? You could not if you would; you would not if you could. Rather be inclined to go with them than think to resist the heavenly attraction which upraises them. If Jesus saith, "I will," then it is yours to say, "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt. They were never so much mine as they are Thine. I never had so much right to them as Thou hast who hast bought them. They never so truly could be at home with me as they will be at home with Thee in Thine own bosom; so my will dissolves itself into Thy will, and I say with steadfast resignation, 'Let them go.'"

III. But now I want to conduct you farther into the text. We have had the home-word and the home-bringing impetus, and now let us carefully note

THE HOME CHARACTER.

"Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am." The description is: "They also, whom Thou hast given Me." The Greek is somewhat difficult to translate. The translators of the Revised Version were, no doubt, excellent Greek scholars, and if they had known a little more English, they might have come a little nearer to a perfect translation; but they do not always appear to think the common English reader to be worthy of their consideration. This is their translation in the present instance: "Father, that which Thou hast given Me, I will that, where I am they also may be with Me." This, to speak plainly, sounds very like nonsense. It is the translation which a boy would present to his tutor at school, but it is of small use to the general reader. It is literal, no doubt; but literalisms are often another proof that the letter killeth. Translators into the English tongue might have contrived to have given us words with a meaning in them.

ALL TO BE THERE.

I merely quote the version to show you that there is here a something in the singular as well as persons in the plural. "Father, I will concerning that which Thou hast given Me, that they may be with Me where I am." Our Lord looked upon those whom the Father gave Him as one—one body, one Church, one bride; He willed that as a whole the Church should be with Him where He is. Then He looked again and saw each of the many individuals of whom the one Church is composed, and He prayed that each, that all of these, might be with Him and behold His glory.

We in our creature love lift up our hands, and cry, "My Lord, my Master, let me have this dear one with me a little longer. I need the companionship of one so sweet, or life will be misery to me." But if Jesus looks us in the face, and says, "Is thy right better than Mine?" we draw back at once. He has a greater part in His saints than we can have. O Jesus, Thy Father gave them to Thee of old; they are His reward for the travail of Thy soul; and far be it from us to deny Thee. Though blinded by our tears, we can yet see the rights of Jesus, and we loyally admit them. We cry concerning our best beloved, "The Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord." Does not the text sweetly comfort us in the taking away of one and another, since it shows how they belong to Christ?

IV. And now, advancing another step, Christ reveals to us something concerning in the glory land. Those who are taken away, where are they gone? The text saith, "I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory." By this language we are impressed with the nearness of the saints to Christ in glory—"that they may be with Me." Think for a moment: when our Lord used these words, and John took them down, the disciples were with Him. They had left the supper-table where they had feasted together. The Master had said, "Arise, let us go hence;" and it was in the very midst of them that the Lord Jesus offered this choice prayer. Learn, then, that in heaven the saints will be nearer to Christ than the apostles were when they sat at the table with Him, or heard Him pray. That was a nearness which might consist only in place, and their minds might still be, as they often were, far away from Him; but up in heaven we shall be one with Him in sympathy, in spirit, in conscious fellowship.

Yet do not drop the thought of place, lest you refine away the essence of the prayer. Let us see the spiritual clearly, but let us not, on that account, make the sense less real, less matter of fact. To the prayer that His saints may be with Him our Lord added the words, "May be with Me where I am." Our bodies will rise from the dust, and they must occupy a place; that place will be where Jesus is. Even spirits must be somewhere, and that somewhere with us is to be where Jesus is. We are to be, not metaphorically and fancifully, but really, truly, literally with Jesus. Who would be so cruel as to keep a saint from such a fair country? I would desire all good for my children, my relatives, my friends; and what good is better than to be where Jesus is?

Notice the occupation of those who are with Jesus; "That they may behold My glory." I do not wonder that Jesus wants His dear ones to be with Him for this purpose, since love always pines for a partner in its joys. When I have been abroad, and have been specially charmed with glorious scenery, I have a hundred times felt myself saying, almost involuntarily, "How I wish that my dear wife could be here! I should enjoy this a hundred times as much if she could but see it!" It is an instinct of affection to seek fellowship in joy. The Lord Jesus is truly human, and He feels this unselfish desire of every loving human heart, and therefore says, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory." Who would not go to this heaven? Who would keep a brother out of it an hour?

V. I must end by speaking of THE HOME ATMOSPHERE.

None of us can wish our departed friends back from their thrones. Since they have gone to be where Jesus is, and to enter so fully into the most blissful fellowship with Him and the Father, we would not have them return even for an instant to this poor country. We only wish that our turn for migration may come soon. We would not be too long divided from our fellows. If some of the birds have gone to the sunny land, let us plume our wings to follow them. There will be only a little interval between our parting and our everlasting meeting. Look at the many who died before we came into the world. Some of them have been in heaven together now for thousands of years. To them it must seem that they were only divided by a moment's interval; their continents of fellowship have made the channel of death seem but a streak of sea. Soon we shall take the same view of things.

Breathe the home atmosphere. Jesus tells us that the atmosphere of His home is love: "Thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." Love wraps up the whole in its

CLOTH OF GOLD.

Love is both the source and the channel, and the end of the divine acting. Let our saintly ones go home, beloved, if that is the design of their going. Since all comes of divine love, and all sets forth divine love, let them go to Him who loves them—let divine love fulfil its purpose of bringing many sons unto glory. Since the Father once made our Lord perfect by His sufferings, let Him now be made perfectly glorious by the coming up of His redeemed from the purifying bath of His atonement. I see them rise like sheep from the washing, all of them gathering with delight at the feet of that great Shepherd of the sheep.

Beloved, I am lost in the subject now. I breathe that heavenly air. Love surrounds all, and conquers grief. I will not cause the temperature to fall by uttering any other words but this: Hold your friends lovingly, but be ready to yield them to Jesus. Detain them not from Him to whom they belong. When they are sick, fast and pray; but when they are departed, do much as David did, who washed his face, and ate, and drank. You cannot bring them back again; you will go to them, they cannot return to you. Comfort yourselves with the double thought of their joy in Christ and Christ's joy in them; add the triple thought of the Father's joy in Christ and in them. Let us watch

THE MASTER'S CALL.

Let us not dread the question—who next, and who next? Let none of us start back as though we hoped to linger longer than others. Let us even desire to see our names in the celestial conscription. Let us be willing to be dealt with just as our Lord pleases. Let no doubt intervene; let no gloom encompass us. Dying is but going home; indeed, there is no dying for the saints.

O brethren, we shall soon know more of heaven than all the divines can tell us. Let us go home now to our own dwellings; but let us pledge ourselves that we will meet again. But where shall we appoint the trysting place? It would be idle to appoint any spot of earth, for this assembly will never come together again in this world. We will meet with Jesus, where He is, where we shall behold His glory. Some of you cannot do this. Turn from your evil ways. Turn to the right, where stands that cross, and keep straight on, and you will come to Jesus in glory. Blessed be the name of the Lord! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

The Mission to the Nestorians.*

THE mission to the Nestorians of Oroomiah and the adjacent mountains was opened by the American Board in 1834. . . . The Nestorians are known as a Christian sect, and not as a race of people. It has been impossible to determine whether they are of the Chaldaean, the Syrian, or some other stock. Dr. Grant attempted to establish their identity with the lost tribes of Israel, but it is conceded that the argument fails since it rests upon characteristics common to Orientals.

The written and spoken language of the Nestorians is Syriac. It is probable that at the first the so-called nation was a mixture of Chaldaeans and Syrians, and other people who were Christians of the Syriac Church, and speaking the Syriac language. In the persecutions which were inflicted on all who adopted the doctrines of Nestorius these people fled to Persia, where they found protection. . . . The heresy of Nestorius was that he taught the union of two natures in Christ in opposition to the then prevalent doctrine of one divine nature. He was condemned by the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and banished.

The Nestorian Church has no written standard of doctrinal belief. If we except the heresy which separated them from the parent church, it may be said that their ecclesiastical organization and ritual is the chief feature to which they owe their perpetuity. There are many practices and superstitions prevalent among the people, by which they are distinguished from other Oriental churches. All orders of the clergy are celibates. By a singular law the succession to the Patriarchate is inherited by the nephew of the Patriarch, the son of a brother. The people know little or nothing of Nestorius, and do not attribute their origin to him, except as they have been instructed by foreigners. They profess to be the spiritual progeny of SS. Thomas and Thaddeus. They are commonly known among Mohammedans by the name Nasara, or Nazarenes.

The progress of the mission is indicated by the statistics for the year 1871. In the report there is specified one station, that of Oroomiah, forty-eight out-stations, nine pastors, fifty-two preachers, forty-six teachers, one thousand and twelve pupils in different schools, nine organized churches, and over seven hundred communicants. The pupils and communicants are wholly from the Nestorians, as are the teachers and preachers and the attendants of the congregations.

PERSIAN MARRIAGE CUSTOMS.

The laws regulating marriage are dependent upon the religious faith of the parties contracting. The non-Mohammedan races are permitted to adhere to the religious laws of the sect to which they belong. Mohammedans are governed by Mohammedan law. By that law there are two kinds of marriage. One is called Ahdah, meaning covenanted, and the other is termed Sekah, or contracted. A Mohammedan may possess four wives of the first class and any number of the second class. Wives of the first class have priority of right, and their children inherit the property of their father. But all married women agree to a divorce, on receipt of a price agreed upon at the time of marriage. The Sekah wives contract for a limited period of time. The children of such marriages belong to the father if the mother is put away. This arrangement of marriage is the source of great corruption. The nuptial ceremonies of the second class are very brief, and consist in the repetition of a formula by a mullah which sanctifies the transient relation.

THE LATE REV. JAMES INGLE.

AN active life of toil and unremitting exertion in the cause of Christ closed a few weeks ago when this devoted Christian minister heard his Master's voice calling him from the scene of his labors.

James Ingle, though an American in Christian life and service, was an Englishman by birth. He was born at Sommersham, Huntingdon County, England, on May 12th, 1813. He was, therefore, in his seventy-third year when he died, on January 16th, 1886. He came to America with his parents when a boy. A pious mother's teaching and prayers led him in his youth to the Saviour, and at a camp-meeting of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, at the age of sixteen, he publicly declared himself on the Lord's side. He soon afterward commenced study for the ministry, and at the age of nineteen became pastor of the Cumberland Church at Boonville, Ind. Ten years later he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. As an itinerant minister he served in three whole counties—two in Indiana and one across the Ohio in Kentucky. It was new ground, and his labors were arduous and difficult; but his heart was in the work, and, giving to it all his energies, he was abundantly blessed.

The last years of his life were spent at the home of his only surviving son in Philadelphia. He paid him a visit in 1876, and the affectionate son noticing the debilitated physical condition of his father and mother, persuaded the aged couple to make their home with him, so that their last days might be gladdened by the devotion of filial affection. They removed there, and their declining years were thus relieved of anxiety and care. Mr. Ingle, while in Philadelphia, delighted to continue his service for Christ.

Benjamin Franklin Helping the Widow.

When no longer able to preach he distributed tracts, and visited the poor and sick. It was his delight to collect from subscribers copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other religious journals which they had read, and carry them to homes where religious literature was needed. Thus in many ways he continued to serve under the banner he had followed more actively in his younger days. Long after he was too infirm to leave his home, people came to him for comfort and advice, and he would sit on summer days at his window, and, beckoning a passer-by, would put a tract in his hand with a word of prayer or suggestive thought.

After his death, among his papers was found a brief memorandum which we have seen, and which will be a treasured possession for his aged widow and devoted son. "To all my Relatives," it was inscribed. "My time on earth is nearly up. I have been learning for years that Jesus is God; He is here with me now, and He gives me all the evidence I want that I am His. All may know that He is God and need have no fears. He loves to give the Spirit to all who want it. Glory to Jesus! I shall soon be beyond all sin." It was in that spirit of joy and peace that the good old man left the field of his labors and entered into rest.

FRANKLIN'S GIFT.

THE well-known incident of Benjamin Franklin's kindness to the poor widow is illustrated in the accompanying picture. It is known to every schoolboy in the country which holds Franklin's name in reverence, but it is so good and so characteristic of the man that it will bear repetition. This is how he himself narrated it:

"I shall be particular in my description of my first entry into the city of Philadelphia, that you may compare such unlikely beginnings with the figure I have since made there. I was in my working-dress, and was dirty from my being so long in the boat, and knew no one, nor where to look for lodging. Fatigued with rowing, walking, and want of sleep, I was very hungry, and my whole stock of cash consisted of a single dollar, and about one shilling in copper coin, which I gave to the boatman for my passage.

"I walked toward the top of the street, gazing about me, till I met a boy with bread. I inquired where he had bought it, and went immediately to the baker's he directed me to. Not knowing the prices, nor the names of the different sorts of bread, I told him to give me threepence worth of any sort. He accordingly gave me three puffy rolls. I was surprised at the quantity, but took it, and having no room in my pockets, walked off with a roll under each arm and began eating the other one. Then I turned and went down another street, and coming round, found myself against the wharf, near the boat I came in, to which I went for a draught of water, and being completely filled with my roll, I gave the other two to a widow and her child who came down the river in the boat with us, and were waiting to continue their journey. Thus refreshed, I regained the street, which was now full of well-dressed people, all going the same way. I joined them, and was thus led to a Quaker's meeting-house."

LOUISE GRANTLY'S TEMPTATION.

MRS. GRANTLY sat at her solitary breakfast-table in her luxuriantly furnished home. She was only two years married, but her meals were generally taken alone now. Time was, and that not long ago, when her husband could not have enough of her society, but now she saw but little of him. He would come down from his chamber in three hours' time with aching head and bloodshot eyes, and make a feeble pretence of eating a mid-day breakfast, and afterward would saunter off to his club, or to some gathering of gay friends, from which he would go to opera or theatre, and thence to some place where high play could be had, coming home long after midnight.

The days and evenings were very dreary to her, for her husband did not ask her to accompany him, and she had no lady friends near her. Time hung heavily on her hands, and when one day Mr. Grantly brought an old college friend of his own to his house, and Louise found him intelligent and refined, she welcomed his acquaintance. He admired and pitied her, and many a dreary hour was afterward brightened by his visits. He brought her books and music, and would stay and chat for an hour, until Louise in her loneliness grew to anticipate his coming with eager pleasure. She had no thought of evil until one day, in an unguarded moment, her friend dared to breathe words which were an insult to a faithful wife. Then she resolved she would never receive him to her home again, and kept her resolution. The suffering it cost her to keep it, revealed to her the treachery of her own heart, and showed her that unconsciously she had allowed an impure affection to enter there. But she suffered bravely, and for the first time in her life she prayed earnestly to her mother's God for strength to do right. At last she heard that her dangerous friend had left the city, and she rejoiced that temptation was farther away from her. But she missed him sorely, and the battle was hard to fight.

This morning as she sat alone at breakfast she opened the daily paper and looked at it almost mechanically. She scarcely noticed what she read until her attention was arrested by the sight of her own name in the personal column. "Would Louise G. call at the office of the paper for an important letter from R. S. H.?" She knew in a moment that the request was addressed to her, and who it was that had adopted this mode of communication. She determined she would never apply for that letter, but her resolution failed her. That evening she dressed hurriedly and went to the office. She hesitated even then, and had she known who would answer her inquiry she would never have asked for the letter. But at last she plucked up her courage and went to the little window, and in a low, timid voice, and with downcast eyes asked for the letter. The aged clerk gave her a scrutinizing glance, but she did not raise her eyes to his face. He took down a package of letters from a pigeon-hole, and selecting one from the number held it hesitatingly between finger and thumb. Louise saw the address and held her hand out for it.

"Pardon an old man, Mrs. Grantly," said the clerk, "a man who knew and loved your father, but I would much rather put this in the fire than give it to you."

Louise looked up then. "Oh, Major Harding," she said, "I did not know you were here." Then dropping her eyes again, she said: "I will take the letter, if you please; it is only from a friend."

"My dear madam, I cannot withhold it, as you ask for it; but, believe me, the writer is not worthy to be your friend or he would not stoop to clandestine correspondence which compromises you. As an old friend of your father, will you let me call upon you in the morning and bring you the letter? Perhaps you have no Christian friend to advise you. I should be thankful to serve you in that capacity." The old man was so evidently in earnest and so sympathetic in manner that Louise yielded.

On her return home she was surprised to see signs of unwonted excitement in the house. Lights were being carried from room to room, and a carriage stood at the door. She entered, and anxiously inquired what the matter was. She learned that her husband was stricken down with sudden illness, and that his life hung by a thread. The physician, whose carriage was at the door, gave her little hope of his recovery, and as she entered the sick-room her own gaze at the sufferer told her that he was right. She spent the night by her husband's side sorrowfully, almost remorsefully, waiting upon him.

Major Harding found her in a softened mood the next morning when he called with the letter, and she willingly consented to its being burned unread. The old man took advantage of the opportunity to speak solemnly and earnestly to her, telling her that he had known her as a child and took a fatherly interest in her. Louise, sadly in need of a friend, clung to the aged Christian and begged him to visit her again. He came frequently after that, and was permitted to see the sick man, who, knowing that death was very near him, listened attentively to his earnest appeals.

To both husband and wife that season of trial was the beginning of a new life. Under Major Harding's guidance both were led to Christ for salvation, and when, after a long and painful illness, Mr. Grantly rose from his bed a wreck of the man he had been, he had learned that in Christ were joys that the world could never give. Louise, grateful for her escape from peril, and for the renewal of her husband's affection, found life no longer a burden, but a trust to be joyfully expended in service for Christ.

AT THE MISSION.

Life at School.

JULIET was wondering how she could ask for clothes, but the thoughtful kindness of Sister Anna anticipated the request.

After leaving her guest for a few minutes, the good woman soon reappeared with an alpaca dress, surmounting a parcel of the whitest linen, and with a pair of boots in her hand.

"You will not mind putting this on," said Sister Anna, with a smile; "it was my wedding-dress many, many years ago, but I have only worn it on particular occasions, such as birthdays and feast days. Alpaca is too cold for this climate, but it will do till we can get your nice new brown rep ready." Again disappearing for a time, while Juliet changed her garments, Anna returned to her own room, and extracting from the bottom of her box a heavy piece of the warmest woollen cloth, proceeded to carry it, through the parlor, to the apartment, of Juliet.

Wilhelm and Fritz were still in the parlor.

"What's this?" cried the former. "What is my good wife going to do with the famous brown dress sent by our friends to keep her warm when the thermometer goes down to less than nothing?"

"That poor girl will want it," said Anna.

"But, my dear, can you spare it?" cried Wilhelm. "How we rejoiced over that piece of thick rep—and blessed the giver, and measured it out—and were delighted to find that there is enough of the stuff for a hood as well as a dress." The good man thought of his partner's liability to rheumatism, he thought of her rather threadbare gown, and the terrible winter before them, and he repeated in a somewhat regretful tone, with his hand on the rep, "Can you spare it?"

"We can spare whatever the Lord hath need of," said Anna, cheerfully; "hath He not sent this poor desolate girl to our care?" And so the new dress and the new pair of boots from England, and a good many other things besides, were freely bestowed on a stranger whose only claim was her destitution. Anna never even thought that it was a sacrifice that she was making, it was such pleasure to make another happy.

"I must see whether I cannot manage to get Anna a fur-lined cape," said the good pastor, thinking aloud, as he not unfrequently did.

Fritz made no remark, but resolved that he would do his best to bring home the hide of a fox or of a bear.

Though delighted to cast off her hateful pink dress, the fashionable Miss Erle was not altogether pleased with her borrowed costume. Sister Anna's wedding-dress was decidedly antiquated in style; did not touch the ground by nearly three inches, and was almost as much too wide in the band. Still, when Juliet had reduced her tangled tresses into order, using Sister Anna's brushes and comb, and glanced at herself in a mirror about four inches square, which she found in her neat little room, she was not dissatisfied with the reflection. "I shall not have to face such critics as Dora and Cecilia," she thought to herself; "Gertie is not here to laugh at my toilette; I shall look quite fashionable enough for the White Bear's Den." In better spirits than she had known for many a wearisome day, Juliet passed into the parlor, where hot breakfast, served in by Sister Anna herself, was awaiting the guest's appearance.

After her fare in the Bergen, everything on table was delicious to Juliet; the very sight of a white damask cloth was appetizing. Pretty stoneware after dirty pewter, hot rolls instead of stale biscuits, a tin of preserved butter and another of chocolate, opened to do honor to the guest, made the meal appear a luxurious feast. Juliet ate and praised, and ate again, nor noticed that the chief delicacies were untouched by Sister Anna, who was silently calculating whether, with an extra hungry mouth introduced into the little circle, her husband would be able to enjoy his much-needed comforts through the long coming winter.

One thing Juliet did notice, that her hostess seemed to do things as much by feeling as sight, and that whenever he could afford assistance, Fritz Edelstein helped her. He brought the hissing kettle and poured out the steaming water, stirred the fire, and threw on the log, and went to the press for more sugar. Juliet soon perceived that Sister Anna's sight was sadly failing, and the gentle Moravian soon alluded to this, but in no repining tone.

"I think that the snow-glare has injured my eyes," she observed. "I have tried the strongest glasses, but in vain. Perhaps, when Fritz is away, you will kindly thread my needles," she added, turning to Juliet.

"I shall be so glad to have something to do. I wish I could learn a new language. I used to be thought clever at languages, but I was stupid on board the Bergen. I suspect that the sailors' vocabulary consisted of nothing but the names of fish, and the weapons used in catching them. I don't believe that they had words to express any intellectual idea."

"What say you to attacking the Esquimaux tongue?" asked Brother Fritz, with a smile.

"If it match the appearance of those who speak it, I should say that it is singularly unpoetical," said Juliet, laughing at the remembrance of the baby's round head peeping out of the hood.

"I have heard beautiful thoughts expressed in the Esquimaux tongue," observed Fritz.

"And I delight in our Esquimaux hymns," said good Pastor Wilhelm, who thought more of their meaning than of their sound.

"Esquimaux would be a curious language to learn; it would make one quite unique as a linguist," said Juliet, gaily. "But who would teach me? did I see any learned professor in that graceful group on the shore?"

"I would gladly teach you," said Sister Anna, "were it not for my eyes. But as the days shorten, I fear that I should not distinguish one letter from another."

"Fritz is our best teacher," said Pastor Wilhelm; "he speaks the tongue like a native."

"Am I not a native?" said Fritz; "am I not a missionary's son, born—though not brought up—in this north-west land?"

"That does not make you an Esquimaux," observed Juliet; and the contrast which the fair, tall Moravian exhibited to the squat denizens of the White Bear's Den struck her as so ludicrous, that she burst into a silvery laugh.

"But—seriously—what say you to learning the language?" said Fritz, gently pressing his point. His anxiety arose from no wish to perfect Juliet's education, but his desire to enlist some feminine helper for Sister Anna, whose failing health and increasing blindness would render it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for her to do missionary work in the terrible winter. In the bright, intelligent girl, so very unexpectedly landed among them, Fritz hoped that he saw a Heaven-sent assistant to his suffering friend.

"I suppose you could not spare time to teach me?" said Juliet.

"I will teach you with pleasure," said Fritz, eagerly. Juliet felt a little gratified at the young man's readiness; she would have been less so had she penetrated its cause.

It was arranged that, except when engaged in expeditions into the interior, Fritz was to give an hour's instruction every day to Miss Erle. Juliet looked upon the lesson merely as a break in time that might otherwise be tedious; the language was to her as an ingenious puzzle to exercise her powers and show off her skill. She determined to work hard, and she kept her resolve. The hour passed with Fritz by the fire in the little parlor, while Anna moved slowly about her household avocations, and the Pastor visited his Esquimaux flock, was to Juliet the most pleasant part of the day. Many hours were spent in preparation for the lesson, and both master and pupil were surprised and pleased at the rapid progress made.

We will extract from Juliet's journal:

"October 15.—What a strange new chapter in my life! I have now been in the White Bear's Den for a month. All is becoming so familiar. One day is so like every other! There is the morning service for the Esquimaux (I have only attended it once, the scent of rancid oil sickened me), and our own evening service in English, which the good old Pastor conducts. The meals are regular as clock-work. I know every picture on the walls and in the photo-albums by heart. I have read every English book in the house; there is not a lively one among them. I have had as yet a good deal of occupation to prevent dying of ennui; but the long dreary winter is before us! Already the snow king has showered down his flaky treasures, and the gloomy pines are rimmed with white. Icicles hang from our eaves. Every herb in the little garden has withered. We have nothing left but mosses and lichens; save that reminiscences of summer remain in the bilberries, cranberries, and bog-berries which skilful Sister Anna has preserved for our winter use.

"The sun's daily visits are rapidly shortening, though happily we are not far enough north ever to lose his presence altogether. Flocks of birds have left for the south; would that I could fly away with them; how I envy them their wings! We have lost the black guillemot, with its silky hair-like feathers. We see no more the funny plump little puffins, or the elegant nuns in their black and white costumes. Fritz has taught me their names. Still the gulls sweep over the billows, but even they seem to me to be bending their course toward summer climes.

"I have seen reindeer, with their branching antlers and huge divided hoofs, but only when some wandering Esquimaux passed through our settlement, bringing their animals with them. The people here keep none. Yet one is constantly reminded of this being the land of the reindeer. Much of the people's clothing here is made of its skin, which the Pastor says is impervious to cold. Sister Anna has quite a store of pemmican, which, she tells me, is made by pouring one third of melted fat over pounded reindeer venison. It is not so distasteful as I expected.

"I have performed a great feat—actually made a dress for myself; I never before in my life attempted to do such a thing. Sister Anna is so blind that she could have given but little assistance, and as she seemed to take it for granted that if I had the materials I could make up a dress, I was ashamed to confess my ignorance. I own that my garment would astonish Madame Legrand, and make Gertie hold up her hands in horror. It has not much more shape than a sacque, and is of the dullest brown tint; nevertheless, I am vastly proud of it, and the warmth is delicious! I fear that poor Sister Anna made no small sacrifice in giving me her new piece of rep. Her own dress is becoming quite thin, though neat, as is everything that she wears. I shall send her out the thickest, handsomest, warmest stuff to be found in London when I get back. But it will not reach her, alas! till two of these cruel long winters are passed.

"My principal occupation—amusement—is learning the language. Fritz is surprised at my memory, and the quickness with which I catch the accent of the not altogether unmusical tongue. He said to me to-day (looking quite pleased), 'You will soon be able, Miss Erle, to take a Sunday class.' The idea of my teaching Esquimaux urchins is really too absurd. 'There is something else that I will take before a Sunday class,' quoth I. 'What may that something be?' asked Fritz. 'My leave of the White Bear's Den.' I like to tease Fritz a little; I should not have ventured on so saucy a speech to the saintly Wilhelm, or his dear good sensible wife. None of the Moravians approve of the use of the old name for their school, so to Fritz I call it by no other.

"October 20.—The ground is all frozen over. Fritz has gone on an expedition in a dog-sledge. The Esquimaux here keep dogs—savage, horrible, wolf-like creatures, that are quite enough, had I no other reasons, to keep me from visiting the native huts. It quite frightened me to see Fritz start to-day in a sledge! Talk of skill in driving a four-in-hand, I should like to see one of our fast young nobles, so proud of handling the ribbons, attempt to drive a dozen of these savage brutes, who tear up their food with wolfish voracity, and seem ready, with or without provocation, to fly at each other's throats! If one were thrown out of a sledge by accident, one would be afraid of being made a meal of at once! Fritz has a whip with a tremendously long lash, with which he can touch up even the leaders. He is evidently master of the situation; but I should almost as lief be drawn by tigers as by these Esquimaux dogs.

"October 22.—Life in the White Bear's Den has become terribly dull. I am quite tired of the Pastor's endless Esquimaux stories, which he tells with such a placid expectation that they will be as interesting to others as to himself. Sister Anna complains—no, she never complains, but she suffers much from rheumatic pains. Yet day by day I see her starting for her school in the native quarters, and her brown basket containing physic, or salve, or nourishing soup for the sick. What a life of wonderful self-denial she leads! But to these good Moravians all seems to come as a matter of course.

"October 30.—Fritz has returned. He has had preaching among some scattered Esquimaux hunters in the interior. He has brought back a prize—two skins, lovely, soft, silvery white skins of the Arctic fox. I do not know why I took it into my silly head that they were meant as a present for me; perhaps my wish was father to the thought. I was quickly undeceived. 'Sister Anna, these are to line your winter cape,' said Fritz, and was not the dear woman pleased! Fritz treats Sister Anna with such gentle respect, as if she were his own mother. I have offered to make up the skins; I only hope that I will not spoil the cape by my clumsy work.

"November 1.—Very hard at lessons again. I had made good progress in my tutor's absence; I wished to surprise him, and I succeeded.

"You have been most industrious," said Fritz.

"This was too much like encouragement given to some good little child; praise not accorded to talent, but commonplace perseverance. 'It was my only way of killing time,' I said, lightly; 'one would rather blow bubbles than do nothing at all. If there were Italian books here, would you not take to learning Italian?'

"Hardly," was Fritz's reply; 'I cannot afford to make paper boats of bank notes.'

"So he considers his time as bank notes, and mine only fit to be twisted into paper ships and thrown on the sea! I have never made any other use of it. Heigh ho! sometimes I fancy that an aimless life is a kind of treadmill, only we paint and gild it, and deck it with flowers. We seem always mounting and mounting, and only succeed in turning round a wheel; nothing comes of it all. I look from mine on these steady earnest Moravians, always pressing on, with a definite aim, at each step nearer to their goal. I have never had any aim but my own enjoyment, and the perpetual treading of my mill has not brought it nearer.

"What a trial her blindness must be to Sister Anna!" I observed to Fritz, when our friend had gone into the kitchen for some culinary work.

"She has had many trials," he said. "The graves of two of her children are in our little 'God's Acre,' and the other two are being educated in England. Unless they adopt a missionary life, their mother is hardly likely to see them again in this world."

"How dreadful!" I exclaimed. "I cannot imagine how a woman, a loving woman, can endure such separations! Then this frightful climate, with the thousand and one privations which it entails! I do not know what can make Sister Anna face, and so uncomplainingly, so serenely, the hardships of such a life!"

"Do you not know of the love of Christ that constraineth?" said Fritz, in a very low tone. It was the first time that he had addressed to me anything like a reproof, though I have had many a little sermon from the Pastor. This from Fritz brought the color to my cheeks, and the tears to my eyes. I did not choose that he should see that he had touched me, so I said, in as indifferent a manner as I could, 'I suppose that you have had to leave some one behind.'

"A dear father," replied Fritz. "He was for a few years a missionary, but it was found that to remain in such a climate as this would for him be certain death. A superintendent was needed at home for a training school, and to that post my father was appointed. He now prepares others for the work which he unwillingly quitted himself. He has sent his only son as his unworthy substitute here."

"And you can exchange letters only once in the year!" said I.

"We exchange books," replied Fritz, smiling.

"Each keeps a kind of journal; so that everything that interests the one interests also the other."

"I should like amazingly to have a sight of Fritz's journal. I wonder what description he has given of me; I fear one to mortify my vanity, could I see it. And yet I think that he takes a great interest in me. I should not like to think that it is exactly the same kind of interest that he would take in an unconverted Esquimaux! It was rather sadly that he asked that searching question, 'Do you not know of the love of Christ that constraineth?' Perhaps I do not know it. If I did, life would hardly be such a weary blank.

JESUS AT THE WELL.

S. S. Lesson for May 2, John 4:5-26. Golden Text, ver. 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Temptations Peculiar to Fatigue—How Jesus Met them—Speaks to a Stranger—The Woman's Surprise at His Condescension—What Jesus Could Give her—The Universal Need of Living Water—The Materialistic Idea—Deliverance from Sin the First Step—Conviction—Recognition of Christ's Authority—Her Call to her Friends.

JESUS was weary. "In all things made like unto His brethren" (Heb. 2:17); "in all points tempted like as we are" (Heb. 4:15), Jesus knew what physical weariness was. There are temptations peculiar to fatigue. It induces fretfulness, self-occupation, self-pity, especially where it is accompanied with sharp nerve-pain. But how did Jesus deal with fatigue? He did not urge Himself on to needless exertion, but when His disciples went away into the city to buy meat, He quietly took the opportunity to rest upon the well. Yet no sooner did something come before Him, which His Father permitted, than He accepted it at His hands, without question. There was a soul to be won.

A woman of Samaria came to draw water, and Jesus said to her, "Give Me to drink." It was a simple request from a tired stranger. The law of God was: "Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Deut. 10:19). But Jesus met with a rebuff—a heartless, unnecessary, unwomanly rebuff: "How is it that Thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" It was true that Jews had no dealings with Samaritans, but it was also true that kindness and sympathy for those in need always overstep national distinctions. The woman did not know to whom she was speaking. The world's Master and Creator was before her, who had said: "If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is Mine, and the fulness thereof" (Ps. 50:12). She did not know that He had more to give her than she could have to give Him; but He "said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God (John 3:16), and who it is that saith to thee, Give Me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of Him, and He would have given thee LIVING WATER."

Oh, how the world faints for want of the living water—"the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive" (John 7:39)! How many prayers are dead, powerless prayers, for want of the Holy Ghost! how many Christians even lead lives which are a mere drag of wearying effort to keep right for want of the Holy Ghost to dwell in them and reveal Jesus in them! Our blessed Lord knew that He alone could reveal to this sinful woman her own state and her deep need. The woman said: "Sir, Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep." Oh, what a revelation was that to her, and to all who receive His truth—"Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." This was something of which she had no conception; but oh, how true this is of the Holy Ghost! Water finds its own level. When we yield ourselves up to the Holy Ghost to be taught the truth about ourselves and about Jesus, He comes in and puts a new and heavenly light upon everything; He makes it easy to us to see ourselves in the wrong and to acknowledge it; He makes us see how blessedly Jesus atones for and cleanses us from sin; He makes us understand that we have no power, but at the same time how Jesus, dwelling in us, when we have received Him, is the very "Power of God" within us to do His will. He shows us that we do not need to go and slake our thirst at some earthly source, but that Jesus Himself is God's everlasting life within us: "He that hath the Son hath life: and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John 5:12).

HER MATERIALISM.

The Samaritan woman "saith unto Him, Sir, give me this water." It was in deep ignorance; her conceptions were all earthly; her only idea was "that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw" (R.V.). She wanted to be saved trouble and fatigue, and would thus make use of Jesus to serve her purpose. Oh, how many there are who would like the joy and peace of Christians while still clinging to their sins; they would like to have as much religion as would serve their purpose and minister to their own selfish life! How many would like to be healed by the Lord just to go on and live in their own way and dispose of themselves as much as ever! But Jesus came to give us happiness by taking away the sin which causes all our misery. He did not come to indulge us—as a foolish parent will minister to a child's selfishness by indulging all his senseless whims—but to separate us from sin and conform us to Himself, that we might bend to Him, not He to us, and that we might be made partakers of His very life, His very Spirit, and so be one with His interests.

"Jesus saith unto her, Go, call thy husband, and come hither." There was something—yes, much, in this woman's life which needed rectifying. Jesus could not and would not slur over sin; the evil must be brought to light, judged and put away, or no acquaintance with Him could be maintained. "The woman answered and said, I have no husband." Then the Searcher of all hearts replied: "Thou hast well said, I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that saidst thou truly." She was found out, and her sin was set before her face. Now was the moment of decision. When a sinner is brought face to face with his sin he must do one of two things: either justify, ignore, or excuse his sin, or else frankly acknowledge it. The woman said: "Sir, I perceive that Thou art a prophet." It was as much as to say: "Thou hast read my heart and life; it is all true."

Like many others when fairly awakened, she fell back on all the religion she had; it was nothing but a flimsy bit of controversy as to the place where God was to be worshipped. "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." Jesus brought her back from this miserable bit of controversy to the Person of God: "Woman, believe Me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. Ye worship ye know not what" ("they feared the Lord, and served their own gods, . . . their graven images"—II Kings 17:33, 41); "we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in Spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship Him.

"God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." Here was the need for the living water; here the inquirer was brought face to face with her own powerlessness. If what the Stranger had said was true, then all her past religion counted for nothing; she must begin again on a new foundation. In her self-despair she looked round for some rope to cling to; there was one, but it was in the future. "I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ: when He is come, He will tell us all things." It had been a doctrine, but now Christ's coming was a reality of which she felt the need. But her words were general, not personal—"He will tell us all things." "Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am He," or, rather, "I am that speak unto thee." Jesus was personal. He did not deal in generalities; He was after that one soul.

The woman, though so sinful, was intelligent, and understood allusions to Scriptures. She could recognize that the great I AM who appeared to Moses in the burning bush stood now before her as and a revolution was produced in her whole soul. The hard, captious, controversial spirit of half an hour ago was gone, and she "left her water pot, and went her way," a well of living water, to say to the men of the city, her former partners in sin, "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" Her testimony was one to abase self but to honor Jesus. She did not say: "See what a change has come over me," but, "Come, see a man," "Come, and see Jesus." All she said of herself was to her own disadvantage. "He told me all things that ever I did." Her character was well enough known in the city for men to know that the revelations had not been flattering to her; yet, instead of hiding up the fact and making the best of it, she made use of this very thing as a proof of His Messiahship.

Beloved readers, if we would worship God in spirit and in truth, we too must be willing for Him to lay His finger upon anything and everything in our spirit and in our life which is not of Him. If we would be wells of living water springing up uninterruptedly to fertilize ourselves and others, we must be ever drinking the water which Christ gives us. It is a blessed thing to be brought to a definite point in receiving the Holy Ghost to take entire possession of us, and to rule our whole life and conduct. But this definite blessing does not make us independent of God, but always more and more dependent. Just as in breathing it must be moment by moment, so in receiving the Holy Ghost there needs to be a continuous drinking in, as well as flowing out. Jesus said: "As . . . I live by the Father, so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me." Eating and drinking—i. e., continuous reception, alone can make us and keep us wells of living water. But that same Jesus who gave the living water to the Samaritan woman gives still to all to ask Him. He is speaking to us every moment—this moment; and with Him it is but a moment's work to change a heart as fully as He changed this poor woman's.

A Famous Work—American Appreciation—Birth and Early Life—Friendship of Dr. Wilberforce—Appearance as a Poet—Becomes Dean of Westminster—Appointed Archbishop of Dublin—The Crisis of Disestablishment—Trench's Wisdom and Liberality—His Resignation and Death—Extracts from his Poems.

It was not in his character as an archbishop nor, indeed, in his clerical character at all that we in America knew the distinguished prelate who died on March 28th. Asked who was Trench, nine out of ten Americans would have answered, the author of "The Study of Words." Though essentially a school-book, that volume is one of the very few school-books which delight a man who is supposed to have finished his education. It is widely circulated in this country, and its charm and usefulness acknowledged by Americans, who are proud of the fact that the English language is spoken here with more purity even than in the mother-country. In this work "the pedigree of our vocabulary is so traced as to make the reader appreciate the delight of following the history of an ancient and romantic family, and a subject which, in the case of most writers, is dry, is enlivened with poetic feeling, anecdote, and a charming style." So it has happened, especially in this country, that the archbishop is forgotten in the philologist, just as in another case—that of Colenso—the bishop is overlooked in the arithmetician. Nevertheless, Dr. Trench was an eminent divine, and those who have made his acquaintance through his famous book will welcome further knowledge of his character.

Richard Chevenix Trench was born on September 9th, 1807; he was therefore in his seventy-ninth year when he died. He was the second son of Richard Trench, brother of the Irish nobleman, the first Lord Ashtown. His mother was the granddaughter and heiress of Richard Chevenix, Bishop of Waterford. Hence his first and second names. He married in 1832 his cousin, the Hon. Frances Mary Trench, the daughter of Lord Ashtown.

He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1829. He was ordained in 1832, and became curate of Hadleigh, a small parish in the south-east of England. He was subsequently appointed incumbent of Curdridge, another rural parish. While there, a modest volume of poetry from his pen appeared and set the world of letters talking about young Trench. It was entitled "The Story of Justin Martyr, and Other Poems." A learned critic of the day spoke of it as a delightful little volume, and observed that while it breathed throughout an earnest spirit of religion, it also bore the indisputable impress of genius. It was succeeded in 1838 by "Sabbation, Honor Neale, and Other Poems," which gave the author rank "among the foremost of the young poets" of his day.

AN INTIMATE FRIENDSHIP.

Not long after the appearance of this book Mr. Trench formed an acquaintance which was destined to have an important influence on his future life. It was that of Samuel Wilberforce, afterward successively Bishop of Oxford and Winchester. The two men were naturally drawn to each other, and acquaintance soon ripened into a friendship so close that Mr. Trench resigned his living to become Dr. Wilberforce's curate. From this time forward the two men were intimately associated, and the archdeacon received from his curate much valuable literary and other aid. Writing to a friend about Mr. Trench, Dr. Wilberforce said: "He is delightful, and it always does me good to visit him. He is full of thought, patient and laborious in study, and of a highly refined mind; a zealous Churchman, and yet a man of deep and earnest personal piety. There are few with whom I value personal intercourse more highly."

Mr. Trench continued in the active discharge of his duties at Alverstoke until 1845, when Wilberforce was promoted to the Deanery of Westminster, and Trench was presented to the Rectory of Itchen Stoke. In 1845 and 1846 Dr.

Trench was Lecturer at Cambridge, and for a short time one of the select preachers. In 1841 he had published his "Notes on the Parables of our Lord," and shortly afterward appeared another volume of verse, entitled "Elegiac Poems." This was followed by "Poems from Eastern Sources," partly the result of personal travel in the East. Some of these poems are of much beauty, whose music lingers in the memory, and refuses to be forgotten. After this volume there came in rapid succession from Dr. Trench's pen "Genoveva, and Other Poems," "Five Sermons Preached before the University of Cambridge in 1843," "Exposition of the Sermon on the Mount," "The Fitness of Holy Scripture for Unfolding the Spiritual Life of Men," being the Hulsean Lectures for 1845; "Christ the Desire of all Nations; or, The Unconscious Prophecies of Heathendom," being the Hulsean Lectures for 1846; "Sacred Poems for Mourners," "Notes on the Miracles of our Lord," "Sacred Latin Poetry," and "The Star of the Wise Men," a commentary on the second chapter of St. Matthew.

When Dr. Wilberforce became Bishop of Oxford he appointed his friend Trench his examining chaplain; and a short time later Dr. Trench became Theological Professor and Examiner at King's College, London. This appointment he continued to hold until he was preferred to the Deanery of Westminster, on the death of Dr. Buckland, in 1856. He held this appointment until 1863, when he was made Archbishop of Dublin.

A CRISIS.

Five years later Mr. Gladstone commenced the series of measures for the pacification of Ireland, the latest of which is now engaging the attention of the whole civilized world. The first of the series touched Archbishop Trench closely. It was the proposal to disestablish and disendow the Irish Protestant-Episcopal Church. As in duty bound by his position, Dr. Trench defended the Church from his place in the British House of Lords, but the measure was enacted, and then the archbishop devoted all his attention to the reconstruction and new adaptation of the Church to its altered circumstances. His far-sighted sagacity and his broad and liberal mind enabled him to steer the course of the Church wisely in that trying crisis. Nor did he give advice only. Many of the revenues of the Church, being much reduced by the new law, the archbishop gave $5000 a year—nearly half his income—toward making up the deficiency. In that difficult time, as an eminent clergyman, who was present at the discussion, said afterward, his Grace was throughout animated by a noble sincerity of conviction, an honest directness of purpose, and by an uniform spirit of gentleness, graciousness, and courtesy.

In 1884 ill-health compelled Dr. Trench's retirement. He had ruled his diocese during twenty-one years, had guided it through the most severe crisis of its history, and seeing it in a peaceful and flourishing condition he resigned his high office, refusing even to accept the pension to which he was entitled. When his resignation was presented a member of the Synod said that during the period of his archbishopric Dr. Trench had so borne himself in his high office that he was about to leave them, carrying with him from one and all of them a sentiment of veneration, of honor, of esteem, and absolutely of love. After his resignation Dr. Trench resided in London, where he died on March 28th. He was interred in Westminster Abbey, near the grave of Dr. Livingstone, on April 2d.

Beside the works previously mentioned the late Dr. Trench was the author of several volumes of sermons, also of "Notes on the Parables and Miracles of our Lord," "Synonyms of the New Testament," "Commentary on the Epistles of the Seven Churches of Asia." His most famous work, "The Study of Words," was first published in 1851. Many of his shorter poems are very frequently quoted; they might be termed "household words in the household of faith." His is known already to two generations, who have been encouraged by its sweet words to pour out their hearts before God; and as long as the English language lasts it will continue to stimulate troubled souls to "pray and not to faint."

"Lord, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in Thy presence will prevail to make;
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take,
What parched grounds refresh, as with a shower!
We kneel, and all around us seems to lower;
We rise, and all, the distant and the near,
Stands forth in sunny outline, brave and clear:
We kneel, how weak; we rise, how full of power.
Why therefore should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others—that we are not always strong:
That we are ever overborne with care,
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled, when with us is prayer,
And joy and strength and courage are with Thee?"

Many other passages might be quoted as indications of the poetic genius, as well as the deep spirituality of the author. The following isolated couplets will perhaps show best the character of his work; they are taken almost at random from his

"CENTURY OF COUPLETS."

"Would'st thou go forth to bless, be sure of thine own ground:
Fix well thy centre first, then draw thy circles round."

"Before the eyes of men let duly shine thy light,
But ever let thy life's best part be out of sight."

"What thing thou lovest most, thou mak'st its nature thine:

Earthly, if that be earth—if that be God, Divine."

"All nature has a voice, and this the sunflower's word:
I look unto the light; look thou unto the Lord."

"Mark how there still has run, enwoven from above, Through thy life's darkest woof the golden thread of love."

"What is our work when God a blessing would impart?
To bring the empty vessel of a needy heart."

"The tasks, the joys of earth, the same in heaven will be;
Only the little brook has widened to a sea."

ARCHBISHOP PLUNKET.

ON the resignation of Archbishop Trench in 1884, the Synod elected as his successor in the Arch-Episcopate of Dublin Lord William Conyngham Plunket, then Bishop of Meath. His portrait accompanies that of his eminent predecessor on the first page.

Baron Plunket is fifty-eight years old, having been born in 1828. He succeeded to the title upon the death of his father in 1871. He was for some time Treasurer of St. Patrick's Cathedral, a picture of which appears on our frontispiece, and for many years acted as chaplain to his uncle, the Bishop of Tuam. He was elected Bishop of Meath in October, 1876, in succession to the late Dr. Butler. In 1863 he married Anne Lee, only daughter of Sir Benjamin Lee Guinness, of Ashford, M.P. He is deeply interested in all social and philanthropic work, and is much beloved by all for his geniality of disposition and untiring generosity.

is the subject of the picture on the lower portion of the frontispiece.

Carlisle Bridge is the first from the sea over the great river of the city. On either side of the bridge are wide and very handsome streets, filled with lofty houses, and lined with splendid stores. Of the two thoroughfares direct from the bridge, Sackville Street, on the north side of the Liffey, is the grandest. There is, indeed, no wider, or in point of vista, no more beautiful street in Europe. It has sometimes been compared with Broadway of New York, but the exceeding width of the street rids the traveller of the ideas of crowding or of that overwhelming ponderous business activity he gets in other great cities. It is the grace of the place that is its charm.

On the right hand side of the view is a representation of the frontage of

THE CUSTOM HOUSE.

It is a colossal and beautiful structure, having four fronts built of Irish granite and Portland stone, with handsome balustrades running along the summits. In the centre is a lofty dome, on the cone of which is a figure of Hope.

TRINITY COLLEGE

is also shown on our front page. It owes its origin to a former Archbishop of Dublin, Adam Loftus, who persuaded the citizens to utilize for a college the lands of the Priory of All Hallows, which Henry VIII. seized and turned over to them. They agreed, and in 1591 the king granted a charter for Trinity College. The college began its existence unostentatiously with Adam Loftus as Provost and three Fellows, James Fulerton, James Hamilton, and James Ussher, afterward one of the greatest ornaments of the Church in Ireland. In some years which followed it was so poor that examinations for scholarships could not be held; at other times all educational work had to be suspended on account of the tide of war flowing through the city. When James II. was assembling his forces in Dublin for his unfortunate campaign in the north, Trinity College became his arsenal, and was placed in a condition of defence. The chapel of that period became a magazine, and the library and chambers of the students were broken up and used as lodgings for the troops, or as cells for the confinement of prisoners. In 1798, and again in 1803, the building bristled with cannon, and soldiers occupied it. It is, indeed, the eventful character of her history, as well as the brilliant lustre of her more distinguished scholars which have made "Old Trinity" a title to be mentioned only with pride by Irishmen.

The three Fellows who sat round the old Provost to advise him in Elizabethan days have since developed into a Senate, which comprises seven Senior and twenty-six Junior Fellows, all of whom, unlike their colleagues at Oxford and Cambridge, are allowed to marry, and are permitted to hold their Fellowship till they die. They are thirty-one Professorships, including chairs for oratory, music, and the development of the Irish language, and all, save those for Divinity, are now open to candidates of every religious denomination.

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL.

This cathedral (Illustration No. 1 on first page) owes its origin to John Comyn, Archbishop of Dublin, who, in 1190, is said to have selected the site because there was here in ancient days a well, and some say a church, which had been used by St. Patrick. The cathedral has had as eventful history. It has been used for the courts of law, and over and over again for a military barrack and a prison. The principal monuments in the cathedral are those to the memory of Swift and Stella; the great Earl of Cork; Curran, the orator; Charles Wolfe, Archbishop Whately, Lord Mayo, Governor General of India, and other distinguished men. In 1865 the edifice was completely restored at a cost of $750,000, through the munificence of the late Sir Benjamin Lee Guinness, the famous brewer.

Royal Nepotism is Causing Disaffection in England. The Prince of Battenberg, who recently married the Queen's youngest daughter, has been made a commandant in the British army over the heads of veteran officers. An effort is now being made to have the Duke of Edinburgh, the Queen's second son, placed in command of the whole navy. This scheme is being denounced by the Radicals, and is disliked by the people, first because the Duke is personally unpopular, and secondly because it is regarded as preparatory to another scheme of a like kind. It is understood that the Duke of Cambridge, the Queen's cousin, will shortly resign his office as commander-in-chief of the army, to make way for the promotion of the Duke of Connaught, the Queen's third son, to that position. The disaffection is said to be now more pronounced than it has been before in two centuries.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Child's Cry for Whiskey.—At a Recent Gospel Temperance meeting Dr. Robertson said: "Some little time ago I was called to attend a child whom I was told was seriously ill. I hastened to the spot and found the child and its mother suffering from sea-sickness. The mother had taken whiskey, thinking this would relieve her, and she thought what was good for her could not be bad for the baby, and gave it to her little daughter only four years of age. Immediately the child recovered, the baby lips opened and lisped out 'Whiskey.' Could such a mother, I ask, reproach that child if in after years it became a drunkard? which in all likelihood it would, when she with her hand put the poisonous liquid to its lips?"

Grannie's Prayer for a Young Man.—Mr. Calder said: "A young man who was addicted to strong drink had a tract put into his hand lately, which caused him much thought. Not being much of a scholar, he went to a devoted old Christian woman who lived alone with her little grandchild, and asked her help in reading this tract; but she, too, had not sufficient education, and could not help him; then the little child came to his assistance, and slowly read the tract for him. When she had done, he exclaimed: 'Oh, grannie, will you pray for them?' And there and then old woman, the young man, and the little child knelt in prayer, while the old aged Christian besought the Lord to save the young man who was earnestly seeking the way of life. That young man is now sitting at Jesus' feet, for He who is the hearer and answerer of prayer has said: 'Him that cometh unto Me I will in nowise cast out.'"

A Soldier's Dying Song.—"He Sung that 'ere hymn till he died." Such was the testimony of the sentry of a barrack in Ireland with reference to a young soldier who was buried a short time ago. The hymn was Cowper's celebrated one, "There is a fountain filled with blood." The poor lad, for he was little more, was taken with a sudden illness, and was in deep gloom and anxiety until the visitor repeated the first verse of the hymn, which it appeared the soldier had been in the habit of singing after his conversion some years before. As he repeated:

"The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day,
And there have I, as vile as he,
Washed all my sins away,"

peace and rest in the Saviour he had wandered from came back to him; and resting upon the finished work of Christ, he was able to sing even at the entrance into the valley of the shadow of death, and fear no evil, for the Saviour was with him to cheer him.

A Mighty Infatuation.—The Rev. Mr. Paton observed: "A young married woman became a communicant in my church. After joining, she did not come forward to the communion, and I thought this was very remarkable, for, to all outward appearance, she seemed a sincere Christian. Thinking that there must have been something on her conscience and a feeling of unfitness to join so solemn a company, I called. The door was opened by herself, and I saw that she had all the appearance of one under the influence of drink. I was greatly grieved to find her in this condition, and told her so. With repenting tears streaming down her face, she said she was sorry she had failed to keep her promise, but that the temptation of the drink had been too strong for her. We knelt in prayer. I asked the Lord to be her Helper. After rising from our knees, she earnestly made this promise—that she would not taste drink or cross the threshold for two days, until I should return. Now, this will show you the power of this fearful vice. Ten minutes after I had left her house, to my utter amazement this woman dashed past me and entered a saloon right before me. In the impulse of the moment I rushed in after her, but I was too late; she had swallowed a glass of whiskey. Addressing the bartender, I said: 'You are not to give this woman any more drink; she is already mad with it.' 'If I do not give it her some one else will,' was the reply."

The Last Bible Reading.—In One of the Coal-mines of Durham a youth about fifteen years of age was working by the side of his father, who was a devoted Christian man, and governed and educated his family according to the Word of God. The father was in the habit of carrying with him a small pocket Bible, and the son, who had received one at the Sabbath school, imitated his father in this. Thus he always had the sacred volume with him, and whenever enjoying a season of rest from labor he read it by the light of his lamp. They worked together in a newly-opened section of the mine, and the father had just stepped aside to procure a tool, when the arch above suddenly fell between them, so that the father supposed his child to be crushed. He ran toward the place and called to his son, who at length responded from under a dense mass of earth and coal. "My son," cried the father, "are you living?" "Yes, father, but my legs are under a rock." "Where is your lamp, my son?" "It is still burning, father." "What are you doing, my dear son?" "I am reading my Bible, father, and the Lord strengthens me." These were the last words of that Sabbath-school scholar before he was suffocated by the deadly gases.

Buying a Bride.—In Gwambia, Africa, is a small village, where Josepha, a native evangelist, labors for Christ. He is helped by a native Christian, Eliab, whose family consists of himself, wife, and four daughters. A Pagan presented himself as a suitor for Fazana, the second daughter, desiring to purchase her for so many head of cattle, according to rule. The father consented, and the lover soon brought three beasts on account. Josepha felt this was not quite in accordance with Christianity, yet he did not know how to meet the case. In his embarrassment he determined to wait until his brother Yakobo, who also was a native evangelist, arrived. It should be stated that the missionaries forbid Christians to sell their daughters. When Yakobo arrived, Josepha brought Eliab and stated the facts. Yakobo explained the practice among Christians, but did not feel himself competent to pronounce upon the present case. "However," he added, "when Christ made us free, He made our children free also." This convinced Eliab, and he declared he would not sell his daughter, and would return the cattle. But just as he came to this resolution the three beasts died. He, however, replaced them from his own stock, and though this was a severe loss, he remained faithful and put Christ before every other consideration.

Only a Boy's Kite-String Broken.—One of the associates of the late William C. Bryant, the poet editor, tells the following story: "One morning many years ago, after reaching his office, and trying in vain to begin work, Bryant turned to me, and remarked: 'I cannot get along at all this morning.' 'Why not?' I asked? 'Oh,' he replied, 'I have done wrong. When on my way here, a little boy flying a kite passed me. The string of the kite having rubbed against my face, I seized it and broke it. The boy lost his kite, but I did not stop to pay him for it. I did wrong. I ought to have paid him.' This tenderness of conscience went far toward making the kindly, noble, honorable, and honored man that he was, whose death was felt as a loss throughout the land. How many there are who have wronged others, and know that it is within their power to correct their wrongs and make them right, and yet neglect to do it. By and by will come a time when the opportunity which they have neglected will have gone. Happy are they who, before that day comes, right every wrong in the fear of God, and thus prepare to stand guiltless and accepted in the presence of the great King, 'who shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.'"

EASTERTIDE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 25, 1886.

[THE Brooklyn Tabernacle was elaborately decorated, both in platform and galleries. Within the church a scene of rare beauty was presented, the platform being covered with flowers arranged in various devices and breathing forth a delicate aroma. The building was so crowded that the doors were held open by the pressure, and many persons were turned away, being unable to get farther than the iron gates on the street.]

"Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept."—I COR. 15: 20.

The Voices of the Flowers—The Risen Christ a Prophecy of our Own Resurrection—Death the Great Conqueror—The Doctrine of the Resurrection Surrounded with Mysteries—A Sound that Penetrates through the World—The Resurrection in Cemeteries—In Solitary Places—In the Sea—The Resurrection Body—I. A Glorious Body—All Physical Defects Removed—The Face Unveiled—II. An Immortal Body—Free from Disease and Pain—III. A Powerful Body—No more Weariness—A Shipwrecked Father and his Son.

ON this glorious Easter morning, amid the music and the flowers, I give you Christian salutation. This morning, Russian meeting Russian on the streets of St. Petersburg hails him with the salutation, "Christ is risen!" and is answered by his friend in salutation, "He is risen indeed!" In some parts of England and Ireland, to this very day, there is the superstition that on Easter morning the sun dances in the heavens; and well may we forgive such a superstition which illustrates the fact that the natural world seems to sympathize with the spiritual.

Hail! Easter morning.

FLOWERS! FLOWERS!

All of them a-voice, all of them a-tongue, all of them full of speech to-day. I bend over one of the lilies and I hear it say: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." I bend over a rose, and it seems to whisper: "I am the Rose of Sharon." And then I stand and listen. From all sides there comes the chorus of flowers, saying: "If God so clothed the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?"

Flowers! Flowers! Braid them into the bride's hair. Flowers! Flowers! Strew them over the graves of the dead, sweet prophecy of the resurrection. Flowers! Flowers! Twist them into a garland for my Lord Jesus on Easter morning, and "glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be."

Why, if a rainbow this morning had fallen and struck the galleries and struck the platform, the scene could not have been more radiant. Oh, how bright and how beautiful the flowers, and how much they make me think of Christ and His religion, that brightens everything it touches, brightens our life, brightens our character, brightens society, brightens the Church, brightens everything! You who go with gloomy countenance pretending you are better than I am because of your you cannot cheat me. You old hypocrite! I know you. Pretty case you are for a man that professes to be more than conqueror. It is not religion that makes you gloomy, it is the lack of it. There is just as much religion in a wedding as in a burial, just as much religion in a smile as in a tear. Those gloomy Christians we sometimes see are the people to whom I like to lend money, for I never see them again! The women came to the Saviour's tomb and they dropped spices all around the tomb, and those spices were the seed that began to grow, and from them came all the flowers of this Easter morn. The two angels robed in white took hold of the stone at the Saviour's tomb and they hurled it with such force down the hill that it crushed in the door of the world's sepulchre, and the stark and the dead must come forth.

I care not how labyrinthine the mausoleum or how costly the sarcophagus or however beautifully parterred the family grounds, we want them all broken up by the Lord of the resurrection. They must come out. Father and mother—they must come out. Husband and wife—they must come out. Brother and sister—they must come out. Our darling children—they must come out. The eyes that we close with such trembling fingers must open again in the radiance of that morn. The arms we folded in dust must join ours in an embrace of reunion. The voice that was hushed in our dwelling must be returned. Oh, how long some of you seem to be waiting—waiting for the resurrection, waiting! And for these broken hearts to-day I make a soft, cool bandage out of Easter flowers.

Six years ago the night before Easter, I received an Easter card on which there was a representation of that exquisite flower, the trumpet creeper, and under it the words: "The trumpet shall sound and the dead shall rise." There was especial reason why at that time I should have that card sent me, and I present the same consolation to-day to all in this house; and who has escaped?

My friends, this morning, I find in the risen Christ a prophecy of my text setting forth the idea that as Christ has risen so His people will rise. He the first sheaf of the resurrection harvest. He "the first-fruits of them that slept." Before I get through this morning I will walk through all the cemeteries of the dead, through all the country graveyards, where your loved ones are buried, and I will pluck off these flowers, and I will drop a sweet promise of the Gospel—a rose of hope, a lily of joy on every tomb—the child's tomb, the husband's tomb, the wife's tomb, the father's grave, the mother's grave; and, while we celebrate the resurrection of Christ, we will at the same time celebrate the resurrection of all the good. "Christ the first-fruits of them that slept."

If I should come to you this morning and ask you for the names of the great conquerors of the world, you would say Alexander, Caesar, Philip, Napoleon I. Ah! my friends, you have forgotten to mention the name of a greater conqueror than all these—a cruel, a ghastly conqueror. He rode on a black horse across Waterloo and Atlanta and Chalons, the bloody hoofs crushing the hearts of nations. It is

THE CONQUEROR DEATH.

He carries a black flag, and he takes no prisoners. He digs a trench across the hemispheres and fills it with the carcasses of nations. Fifty times would the world have been depopulated had not God kept making new generations. Fifty times the world would have swung lifeless through the air—no man on the mountain, no man on the sea, an abandoned ship ploughing through immensity. Again and again has he done this work with all generations. He is a monarch as well as a conqueror; his palace a sepulchre; his fountains the falling tears of a world. Blessed be God, in the light of this Easter morning I see the prophecy that his sceptre shall be broken, and his palace shall be demolished. The hour is coming when all who are in their graves shall come forth. Christ risen, we shall rise. Jesus "the first-fruits of them that slept." Now, around this doctrine of the resurrection there are a great many

MYSTERIES.

You come to me this morning, and say, If the bodies of the dead are to be raised, how is this, and how is that? and you ask me a thousand questions I am incompetent to answer; but there are a great many things you believe that you are not able to explain. You would be a very foolish man to say: "I won't believe anything I can't understand."

Why, putting down one kind of flower-seed, comes there up this flower of this color? Why, putting down another flower-seed, comes there up a flower of this color? One flower white, another flower yellow, another flower crimson. Why the difference when the seeds look to be very much alike—are very much alike? Explain these things. Explain that wart on the finger. Explain the difference—why the oak-leaf is different from the leaf of the hickory. Tell me how the Lord Almighty can turn the chariot of His omnipotence on a rose-leaf. You ask me questions about the resurrection I cannot answer. I will ask you a thousand questions about every-day life you cannot answer.

A SURE PROMISE.

I find my strength in this passage: "All who are in their graves shall come forth." I do not pretend to make the explanation. You go on and say: "Suppose a returned missionary dies in Brooklyn; when he was in China his foot was amputated; he lived years after in England, and there he had an arm amputated; he is buried to-day in Greenwood; in the resurrection will the foot come from China, will the arm come from England, and will the different parts of the body be reconstructed in the resurrection? How is that possible?"

You say that "the human body changes every seven years, and by seventy years of age a man has had ten bodies; in the resurrection which will come up?" You say, "A man will die and his body crumble into the dust, and that dust be taken up into the life of the vegetable; an animal may eat the vegetable, men eat the animal; in the resurrection, that body, distributed in so many directions, how shall it be gathered up?" Have you any more questions of this style to ask? Come on, and ask them. I do not pretend to answer them. I fall back upon the announcement of God's Word: "All who are in their graves shall come forth."

THE TRUMPET.

You have noticed, I suppose, in reading the story of the resurrection, that almost every account of the Bible gives the idea that the characteristic of that day will be a great sound. I do not know that it will be very loud, but I know it will be very penetrating. In the mausoleum where silence has reigned a thousand years that voice must penetrate. In the coral cave of the deep that voice must penetrate. Millions of spirits will come through the gates of eternity, and they will come to the tombs of the earth, and they will cry: "Give us back our bodies; we gave them to you in corruption, surrender them now in incorruption. Hundreds of spirits hovering about the crags of Gettysburg, for there the bodies are buried. A hundred thousand spirits coming to Greenwood, for there the bodies are buried, waiting for the reunion of body and soul.

THE SECRETS OF THE SEA.

All along the sea route from New York to Liverpool, at every few miles where a steamer went down, departed spirits coming back, hovering over the wave. There is where the City of Boston perished. Found at last. There is where the President perished. Steamer found at last. There is where the Central America went down. Spirits hovering—hundreds of spirits hovering, waiting for the reunion of body and soul. Out on the prairie a spirit alights. There is where a traveller died in the snow. Crash! goes Westminster Abbey, and the poets and orators come forth; wonderful mingling of good and bad. Crash! go the Pyramids of Egypt, and the monarchs come forth.

Who can sketch the scene? I suppose that one moment before that general rising there will be an entire silence, save as you hear the grinding of a wheel, or the clatter of the hoofs of a procession passing into the cemetery. Silence in all the caves of the earth. Silence on the side of the mountain. Silence down in the valleys and far out into the sea. Silence. But in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, as the archangel's trumpet comes pealing, rolling, crashing across the mountain and sea, the earth will give one terrific shudder, and the graves of the dead will heave like the waves of the sea, and Ostend and Sebastopol and Chalons will stalk forth in the lurid air, and the drowned will come up and lift up their wet locks above the billow; and all the land and all the sea become one moving mass of life—all faces, all ages, all conditions gazing in one direction and upon one throne—the throne of resurrection. "All who are in their graves shall come forth."

"But," you say, "if this doctrine of the resurrection is true, as prefigured by this Easter morning, Christ 'the first-fruits of them that slept,' Christ rising a promise and a prophecy of the rising of all His people, can you tell us something about THE RESURRECTED BODY?"

I can. There are mysteries about that, but I shall tell you three or four things in regard to the resurrected body that are beyond guessing and beyond mistake.

I. In the first place, I remark in regard to your resurrected body: it will be a glorious body. The body we have now is a mere skeleton of what it would have been if sin had not marred and defaced it. Take the most exquisite statue that was ever made by an artist, and chip it here and chip it there with a chisel, and batter and bruise it here and there, and then stand it out in the storms of a hundred years, and the beauty would be gone. Well, the human body has been chipped and battered and bruised and damaged with the storms of thousands of years—the physical defects of other generations coming down from generation to generation, we inheriting the infelicities of past generations; but in the morning of the resurrection the body will be adorned and beautified according to the original model. And there is no such difference between a gymnast and an emaciated wretch in a lazaretto, as there will be a difference between our bodies as they are now and our resurrected forms.

REJUVENATED.

There you will see the perfect eye, after the waters of death have washed out the stains of tears and study. There you will see the perfect hand, after the knots of toil have been untied from the knuckles. There you will see the form erect and elastic, after the burdens have gone off the shoulder—the very life of God in the body.

In this world, the most impressive thing, the most expressive thing, is the human face; but that face is veiled with the griefs of a thousand years; but in the resurrection morn that veil will be taken away from the face, and the noon-day sun is dull and dim and stupid compared with the outflaming glories of the countenances of the saved. When those faces of the righteous, those resurrected faces, turn toward the gate, or look up toward the throne, it will be like the dawning of a new morning on the bosom of everlasting day! O glorious, resurrected body!

II. But I remark also in regard to that body, which you are to get in the resurrection, it will be

AN IMMORTAL BODY.

These bodies are wasting away. Somebody has said as soon as we begin to live we begin to die. Unless we keep putting the fuel into the furnace the furnace dies out. The blood-vessels are canals taking the breadstuffs to all parts of the system. We must be reconstructed hour by hour, day by day. Sickness and death are all the time trying to get their prey under the teneament, or to push us off the embankment of the grave; but, blessed be God, in the resurrection we will get a body immortal. No malaria in the air, no cough, no neuralgic twinge, no rheumatic pang, no fluttering of the heart, no shortness of breath, no ambulence, no dispensary, no hospital, no invalid's chair, no spectacles to improve the dim vision; but health, immortal health! O ye who have aches and pains indescribable this morning—O ye who are never well—O ye who are lacerated with physical distresses, let me tell you of the resurrected body, free from all disease. Immortal! Immortal!

III. I go further, and say in regard to that body which you are to get in the resurrection, it will be

A POWERFUL BODY.

We walk now eight or ten miles, and we are fatigued; we lift a few hundred pounds, and we are exhausted; unarmed, we meet a wild beast, and we must run, or fly, or climb, or dodge because we are incompetent to meet it; we toil eight or ten hours vigorously, and then we are weary; but in the resurrection we are to have a body that never gets tired. Is it not a glorious thought?

Plenty of occupation in heaven. I suppose Broadway, New York, in the busiest season of the year, at noonday, is not so busy as heaven is all the time. Grand projects of mercy for other worlds. Victories to be celebrated. The downfall of despotisms on earth to be announced. Great songs to be learned and sung. Great expeditions on which God shall send forth His children. Plenty to do, but no fatigue. If you are seated under the trees of life, it will not be to rest, but to talk over with some old comrade old times—the battles where you fought shoulder to shoulder.

NO FATIGUE.

Sometimes in this world we feel we would like to have such a body as that. There is so much work to be done for Christ, there are so many tears to be wiped away, there are so many burdens to lift, there is so much to be achieved for Christ, we sometimes wish that from the first of January to the last of December we could toil on without stopping to sleep, or take any recreation, or to rest, or even to take food—that we could toil right on without stopping a moment in our work of commending Christ and heaven to all the people. But we all get tired.

It is a characteristic of the human body in this condition; we must get tired. Is it not a glorious thought that after a while, after the service of God, we are going to have a body that will never get weary? O glorious resurrection day! Gladly will I fling aside this poor body of sin and fling it into the tomb, if at Thy bidding I shall have a body that never wearies. That was a splendid resurrection hymn that was sung at my father's burial:

"So Jesus slept, God's dying Son
Passed through the grave and blessed the bed.
Rest here, blest saint, till from His throne
The morning breaks to pierce the shade."

O blessed resurrection! Speak out, sweet flowers, beautiful flowers. While you tell of a risen Christ, tell of the righteous who shall rise. May God fill you this morning with anticipation!

A SHIPWRECKED FATHER AND SON.

I heard of a father and son who, among others, were shipwrecked at sea. The father and the son climbed into the rigging. The father held on, but the son after a while lost his hold in the rigging and was dashed down. The father supposed he had gone hopelessly under the wave. The next day the father was brought ashore from the rigging in an exhausted state, and laid in a bed in a fisherman's hut, and after many hours had passed he came to consciousness, and saw lying beside him on the same bed his boy. Oh my friends! what a glorious thing it will be if we wake up at last to find our loved ones beside us? coming up from the same plot in the graveyard, coming up in the same morning light—the father and son alive forever, all the loved ones alive forever, nevermore to weep, nevermore to part, nevermore to die.

May the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant make you perfect in every good work, to do His will; and let this brilliant scene of the morning transport our thoughts to the grander assemblage before the throne. This august assemblage is nothing compared with it. The one hundred and forty and four thousand, and the "great multitude that no man can number," some of our best friends among them, we,

after a while, to join the multitude. Blessed anticipation.

"Blest are the saints beloved of God,
Washed are their robes in Jesus' blood,
Brighter than angels, lo! they shine,
Their wonders splendid and sublime."

"My soul anticipates the day,
Would stretch her wings and soar away,
To aid the song, the palm to bear,
And bow, the chief of sinners, there."

A SUCCESSFUL effort to inculcate a Gospel lesson on a boy is related by a Christian father. The boy was thoughtless and careless, but there were traits of character recognizable in his conduct which convinced the father that he might be impressed.

"Walter," he said one day, "you were a very naughty boy yesterday. I was sorry to have to punish you. Why do you behave so badly?"

"I don't know, papa; I guess I was not feeling good. I'm sorry. You've forgiven me now, though, haven't you?"

"Yes, but I want you to do better. I am going to keep a record of these naughty times of yours, so you can see how often they occur."

A few days later Walter saw a blackboard suspended high on the wall of his father's room with the record upon it, "Walter disobedient," and the date. He said nothing about it for some days, though he was evidently much depressed by the conspicuous record. His conduct was irreproachable, and an act of real kindness to a little sister won some praise from his father. That night Walter went into the room where his father sat reading to say good-night.

"Father," he said, pointing to the blackboard, "won't you rub that out now?"

"Why, Walter? It is true, is it not?"

"Yes, it is true, but I thought when you were pleased about Annie's ball that perhaps you would rub it off now."

"You don't like to see it there, eh, Walter?"

"No; and when I don't see it I seem to know it is there. I wish you would rub it out; please do, papa."

"You mean that confession and a good action entitle you to have the board cleared. Ah! Walter, you are making a mistake that has undone many much older than you. That record is a fact—quite true, you know. The only way I see is to hang up another board with an entry of the good act upon it."

"I would rather have that rubbed out, papa."

"And call the account square, eh? Yes, that is the common idea, but it is not reasonable."

"What else can I do, papa?"

"Nothing, my boy, and that is where the difficulty lies. Our sins go on the record, and though we might never sin but once in our lives, and, if that were possible, live perfectly ever after, we could not undo the evil. We should still need the mercy of God, and He has solemnly warned us that the soul that sins shall die."

"But God does forgive, doesn't He, papa?"

"Yes, but it cost His Son a life of sorrow and a dreadful death to wipe out the world's sin. He suffered and died in our place, and God was pleased to accept Him instead of us. That is what the Bible means when it says, 'His blood cleanses from all sin.'"

"Then God doesn't keep a record now, does He?"

"Oh, yes; there are some people who do not care, and others who are trying to get the record cleansed, as you thought to do, by good actions. It is a hopeless task, and beside it insults God, because it is just as if people thought they knew better than He how to put themselves right. Don't forget this, my boy, and ask God to forgive you for Jesus' sake. It is the only way. Now, I am going to take that board down, and we will put it away out of sight."

Walter went to his father and kissed him. "Thank you, papa," he said, "I'll not forget."

A PRAYER OVERHEARD.

A DUTCH pastor was one evening holding a Bible-meeting in a town where he was a stranger. While he was preaching the Gospel, and earnestly endeavoring to press home on the hearts of his hearers the truth of Christ crucified, a police officer thrust himself into the assembly, stopped the preacher, and commanded him to leave the town. The preacher could not help himself, and so obeyed. It was a very dark night, and being thus thrust out of the town, he wandered about, lonely, but not comfortless, for he stayed himself on that word of his Master, "Lo, I am with you always."

The good man had been long in the school of Christ, and had learned to watch for the least token of his Master's will, and to trust Him to guide his every footstep. While he was wandering on then in the dark, he suddenly perceived a light at some little distance. "There," thought he, "perhaps the Lord has prepared some shelter for me;" so, in child-like confidence, he went up to the light. As he drew near to the house in which the light shone, he heard a voice within, and became aware that it was some one praying. In joyful hope that he had found the home of a brother in the Lord, he stood still a moment, to hear what was the subject of such an earnest petition. And this was what he heard: "Oh, Lord Jesus, they have driven Thy servant out of the city, and now perhaps he is wandering about not knowing whither he goes; oh, let him find my house, that he may get shelter and refreshments here!" When the pastor heard these words he slipped quietly in at the door, and as his petitioner uttered his Amen, and looked up, behold! already his prayer was answered. Both of them now gladly fell on their knees, and praised the Lord.

A SUCCESSFUL STRIKE.

It is not often that a strike wins so prompt and complete a success as that achieved by a strike, in a small way, described in the New York Times, which occurred recently. The capitalist mentioned must have deeply regretted his conduct. There are many others who are similarly tyrannical who forget the warning of the apostle, "Behold, the hire of the laborers who mowed your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth out: and the cries of them that reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth" (James 5:4):

A Boston man moved down to New York not long ago to extend his business and get richer. He has done well and piled up a good many dollars, but success has not wiped the avarice out of him. He employs a dozen errand boys at his place of business, and plate-glass is in his windows. One of his boys and one of his window-panes came into collision by an accident a few days ago, and the glass went to smash. This was on Saturday, just before the hour for "paying off." The Boston man summoned the offending lad before him, and told him that the pane of glass he had broken cost $3, and as that was the amount of his week's wages the damage would be collected forthwith by appropriating all of his salary.

The little fellow was in tears. He had no father, he explained, and his widowed mother was depending on the $3 to pay some bills which had to be met. She worked all the time at washing and ironing, but without the help of her son's small wages she would find it impossible to escape distress. The boy, though, did not ask to have the damage he had done overlooked; all he asked was to have the chance to pay the bill in instalments. The lad had been working for this man for some months; he had always been faithful; this was the first fault that he had ever been found guilty of. But the gentleman from Boston would not listen to the little fellow's request, and sent him in tears from the private office.

Just then a customer came in—a man whose name is well known in this town. The lad was in the centre of a group of his comrades, and the proprietor was looking out of his private office door to note the effects of his "discipline." "I'll tell you, boys, I'll give Johnny a quarter out of my wages," said one of the boys. "And so'll I," chorused two or three others. The customer dropped over to the group. Johnny wasn't willing to tell what the trouble was—evidently fearing discharge. But one manly little fellow in the crowd was freer in his confidences. He went right to the point, and the words that the customer heard—and the words that the listening proprietor heard—were very easy to understand.

"Keep your quarters for yourselves, boys," said the customer. "I'll pay Johnny his wages. And now I want you all to do just as I tell you." He led them to the private office, and they faced the proprietor. "We are going to strike," said the customer then; "we—these boys and myself—are going to strike unless you advance their wages a dollar a week."

There was a little bluster, but the customer was a merchant whose firm commands millions, and it did not take long for his plain words to make terms. The boys had to be given the dollar, or else a vast deal of patronage would have been lost—the patronage of this customer's big firm and of every firm that he could influence. Dictation was submitted to. The boys were triumphant.

A KISS THAT SAVED LIVES.

WHEN Dr. Cocker, subsequently of Michigan University, returned from the South Sea Islands, and described his narrow escape from the cannibals, his experience instead of deterring others from going there, actually stimulated Christians to undertake the work. Moved by love, and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, a clergyman and his wife decided to go out as missionaries to that very island. Embarking on a merchant-vessel, they succeeded in inducing the captain to put them ashore when none of the inhabitants were visible. What followed is thus described in the current number of the Spirit of Missions.

Seating themselves on a box that contained all their earthly possessions, the devoted Christian family watched the ship spread its white wings and disappear below the horizon. When the savages, accompanied by their chief and his daughter, came on the scene, they felt the limbs of the missionary, and evidently thought that in him was material for a good dinner. The daughter ran her fingers through the long, silky hair of the lady, who, impelled by Christian love, drew the girl to her and imprinted a kiss upon her lips. That natural act won the heart of the daughter. For three days the debate on eating the unexpected guests went on, and at last was decided in the negative by the pleading eloquence of the chief's favorite child.

The missionaries lived long enough to see the people of that island converted to Christ, and sending out missionaries to other islands still in heathen darkness. Thus that little act of love was the means, through God, of saving many precious souls.

A RAID ON A DAIRY.

THE history of a triumphant struggle with the rum habit was recently told to a reporter of the Sun by a citizen of Angelica, N. Y., who ten years ago was a confirmed soaker; who, though he never went "on a tear," had not been absolutely sober for years. One day, however, a halt was called, and this is the way he tells of it:

"I was on my way to the barn when I saw a small snake in my path. I kicked it with my boot and it turned to a bit of crooked twig which I snapped in my hand and threw away. I thought nothing more of the matter until I reached the barn, when, directly before me, a second snake twisted across the boards. With a quick spring I seized it and it proved to be a whiplash. A sudden horrible fear made me faint and weak. I sat down on the lower rung of the ladder leading to the loft and wiped the cold sweat from my forehead.

"Snakes!" I exclaimed, 'that means business.' Time is called, Jim,' I said; 'whiskey and you part company to-day;' and soberer than I had been for many months, though with no more strength than a baby, I managed to get back to the house.

"There was a fight, though! I didn't tell my wife, for I had made a good many promises that hadn't held water, and I thought I'd go it alone for awhile. I got up in the morning after a terrible night, with the thirst of a chased fox upon me. Water wouldn't quench it, and I tried milk. I crept into the milk-room, slipped a straw into the edge of a cream-covered pan, and sucked out the milk until only the cream was left, lowered smooth and unbroken to the bottom. Then I tackled another and another, until the fierce craving was somewhat dulled. It was a household mystery what became of the milk. No cat could lap it, my wife said, and leave the sides and cream untouched, and where did it go?"

"I let them talk, for the struggle was too sore and fearful to be spoken of, and I went on drinking the milk.

"The road from my house to my shop lay by the groggery. When I left my gate in the morning I took the road, and on a dead run, as if pursued, I made the distance. I ran hard all the way home to dinner, and back after that meal, never, in fact, trusting myself to walk, or even take to the sidewalk for months. The cure was slow. I keep all the brakes hard set yet. A single glass of hard cider would undo the work of all these years, but you can bet that glass doesn't touch my lips while the memory of those little crawling black reptiles stays with me."

"And did your wife finally learn what became of the milk?" he was asked.

"Yes," and his voice broke. "I told her on her deathbed.

"Jim, dear," she said, when I had finished, with her hand clasped in mine—'Jim, dear, I knew it all the time.'"

THE CLERGYMEN AVENGED.

AN amusing incident related in the Youth's Companion shows how practical jokers sometimes reap the fruit of their silly tricks. There are many people who annoy others for pure fun, and some who deliberately plot against their enemies in malice, who would do well to remember the words of the wise King: "Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein; and he that rolleth a stone it will return upon him" (Prov. 26:27):

As Colonel Stuart was about to be married, a party of bachelor friends gave him a dinner in Aberdeen as a send-off. The young soldier appeared in his wedding suit, and had a merry evening. There were a number of clergymen belonging to the Presbytery of Aberdeen assembled in session in the room below that in which the dinner was held, and the young men, being hilarious, thought it would be good fun to play "the Cayenne Pepper trick" upon them. It was done with effect. Colonel Stuart may tell the rest of the story:

"After the dinner I left Aberdeen and went to England to be married. My father-in-law was so well known in the town in which he lived that the roads to the church were crowded on the day of the ceremony, and the church itself was crammed.

"I took my place with my intended bride by the altar, and the ceremony proceeded. The clergyman had got about half through, when, having occasion to use my pocket-handkerchief, I put my hand into my pocket, pulled it out, and applied it to my nose. You can judge what my sensations were when I felt my eyes full of cayenne pepper, the irritation of which was almost intolerable!

"On the night of the dinner at Aberdeen I had placed the paper of cayenne, with which we had committed the atrocities on the reverend gentlemen, into the pocket of my dress-coat, and had thought no more about it. On the morning of my marriage I put a clean silk handkerchief in that pocket, not remembering what I had placed there before. The cayenne had got loose from the paper, and, consequently, when I applied the handkerchief to my nose the miserable stuff flew into my eyes, and for a few moments caused most excruciating torments.

"Water ran down my cheeks in streams, and I dared not apply the handkerchief again, for fear of getting another dose. Meantime, the whole audience was staring at me, and I heard whispers:

"Poor young man, how affected he is!" and other sympathetic remarks to the same effect.

"I thought the ceremony would never be over, and when it was finished the clergyman who married me came up, and, shaking my hand, said:

"My young friend, I am sorry to see you so affected on this joyous occasion."

"Forgetting everything except my agony, I replied: 'Affected? not a bit! it's the cayenne pepper that I had in my pocket!'

"I may as well add that I suffered for two or three days in a way I cannot describe, leaving some bitter recollections connected with the happiest day of my life, and as a punishment, I suppose, for our trick upon the unoffending clergymen."

RECOVERY FROM CANCER.

In Thy Healer of April 15th is the following simple direct testimony given by a lady at Bethshan, London:

Mrs. Jameson said: "I desire to praise God. About six months ago I underwent an operation for cancer in the breast. I was very ill in hospital for some months, and for some weeks I had my right arm bound to my side. I have known Christ from my childhood, but I have never had much time to study the Scriptures. I was much struck in reading that Christ healed every one who came to Him. I was going on very well until I had a very serious relapse, and no one thought I should get over it. A friend came to see me, and brought me a book containing an address of Mr. Boardman's, where he speaks of Christ touching us, and our touching Christ, and what virtue there is in Him. I read, and prayed God I might touch Him, and then I thought, 'If Christ would touch me, that would be better,' and I prayed that He would touch me. From His Word I learned that when I ask I must receive, and I received Christ's touch. He touched me, and from that day I began to get better. I remember, the next morning, the doctor saying: 'Well, this wound is very much better.' So it went on, from day to day, better and better, for a month, until I left the hospital. I thought, when I realized the touch of Jesus, 'I must go to Bethshan to bear testimony.' Satan said: 'You are a coward, you will not do that.' Christ has continued to heal, and is still making me stronger, day by day. I desire to praise His holy name."

A MISSIONARY'S REMINISCENCES.

THE report of an enthusiastic jubilee service, in Natal, is published in this month's Missionary Herald. It was to commemorate the landing in 1835 of the Rev. Aldin Grout, the Rev. George Champion, and Newton Adams, M.D., who then constituted the Maritime Mission to Southern Africa. The following reminiscences of his early experience, as a missionary to the Zulus, were related by the first-named missionary, Rev. Aldin Grout:

"We made the journey to see Dingaan, the chief of the Zulus, who lived some hundred and fifty miles from our place of landing. We found Dingaan, the chief, living in a hut made of sticks and grass, like the huts of his people, only it was larger and constructed in the most expensive way the Zulus knew of, being some twenty feet in diameter, with the top supported by some twenty posts, all of which were covered with strings of different colored beads, put on in stripes. We found the chief sitting outside of his hut, in an arm-chair carved out of a solid block of wood, with a spear in his hand. The chair was an imitation of those made by civilized people. Dingaan invited us into his hut, and at once asked if we had ever seen so large and nice a house. The hut was built on an inclined piece of ground, and on the lower side of it was an opening just large enough for one to crawl into on all fours. The floor was made of hard earth pounded down and rubbed with cobblestones till it had a polish like glass. In order to keep it in that state, the custom was for all to move on their knees; but the chief, in order to show us it was the biggest house we had ever seen, called on us to stand on our feet and see if we could touch the roof with our hands. We were at once questioned as to the greatness of our king, and how he would compare with him, and how many people our nation was composed of. He told us that if his warriors should all be collected, they would cover the country as far as we could see.

"Dingaan did not want missionaries; Umpande, his successor, did not want missionaries; Cetywayo, Umpande's successor, did not want missionaries; but we hear recently that Udinizulu, son and successor of Cetywayo, in the Zulu country, has sent to the Natal Colony, requesting that missionaries may be sent to him. It has taken four generations of chiefs to secure the toleration of Christianity in Zululand. During these years the stations of the American Board's Zulu Mission have all been within the Natal Colony, where natives are perfectly free, but have the protection of the English Government.

I settled twice, and in the first instance I was driven out by Dingaan, my goods were all stolen or destroyed, and my house burned down. Then, under Umpande, an army was sent to my station in the night, several of the natives who had been friendly to me were killed, and my wife and I barely got out of the country with our lives.

"That kind of trouble continued for ten years, and seemed so disheartening that our committee recalled us, and I came as far as Cape Town on my way home, when Sir Peregrine Maitland, the Governor of the Cape Colony, picked me up, made me 'missionary to her Majesty Queen Victoria,' and sent me back to Natal. This saved the mission."

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

EVENTS THREE, FOUR, AND FIVE.

Third Event: Proclamation of the Midnight Cry—Revived Interest in the Prophetic Scriptures—The Final Travail of the Sun-Clothed Woman—Fourth Event: The Seven Year Covenant—The Setting up of the Image—Fifth Event: Revival of Levitical Sacrifices—The Time Marked by the Cleansing of the Sanctuary.

THIRD EVENT.

A GREAT stir, excitement, and inquiry into these prophecies will agitate Christian people's minds when they behold the startling phenomenon of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy and the wars just preceding it, and still more when the Napoleonic star rises in the East, and he becomes King of Syria, and makes a covenant with the Jews. The midnight cry: "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye forth to meet Him," will be so loudly proclaimed by the extensive preaching of Second Advent truth, that all the Virgins or Christians are predicted to arise and awake from their present darkness, coldness, and slumber in relation to Christ's Second Coming; and a very great revival of religion will ensue (Matt. 25: 5-9). This will commence about three years before the covenant, and last until two years after it. This mighty religious movement is also prefigured by the final travail of the sun-clothed woman, the Christian Church, in Rev. 12: 2, just before the birth and translation of her manchild (the company of watchful Christians) to God and His throne at Christ's Second Advent.

FOURTH EVENT.

The making of a seven years' covenant between many of the Jews and the before-mentioned Napoleonic sovereign (probably to promote their restoration and guarantee them civil and religious liberty in Judea) is most distinctly foretold in the concluding verse of the ninth chapter of Daniel, to take place about seven years before the Consummation or End of this dispensation; and in the midst of these seven years, he is predicted to break the covenant by causing the daily sacrifice and oblation to cease which the Jews will have restored in their re-established temple—and then, during the three and a half years, the abomination of desolation, his idol image, will be set up in the temple, even until the consummation, when the determined retribution shall be poured upon the imperial desolator. The exact translation of this last verse of Dan. 9 is:

"And he (namely the prince that shall come of the Roman people, referred to in the previous verse) shall confirm a covenant with many (of the Jews) for one week (a week of years, that is seven years), and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate even unto the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator."

Thus it will be impossible for us to avoid knowing when we have arrived within about seven years of the end of this dispensation and the beginning of the millennium, because that point of time will be so clearly marked by the Napoleonic Judaic covenant.

The convention of a Jewish Sanhedrim was once effected (in March, 1807) by the first Napoleon, who granted them important rights and privileges, which evoked their utmost gratitude and praise, and caused some of them to regard him almost as their Messiah. Another similar convention may precede the anticipated Seven Years' Covenant.

FIFTH EVENT.

The recommencement of the Jewish daily sacrifices in Jerusalem, about 250 days or eight months and ten days after the date of the covenant, because at the distance of 2300 literal days (that is, six years, four months, and twenty days) before the cleansing of the sanctuary, is predicted in Dan. 8, verse 11 to 14 (which is seven years and thirty days after the covenant).*

"And by him (the Little Horn) the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of the sanctuary was cast down. . . . And another said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed" (Dan. 8: 11, 14).

Now, as the cleansing of the Jewish sanctuary from the abomination of desolation is at the end of the 1290 days—i.e., thirty days after the end of the seven years of the above-mentioned covenant week, it results that the Jewish sacrifices, commencing 2300 days before the cleansing of the sanctuary, will begin about eight months and ten days after those seven years begin, because eight months and ten days added to six years, four months, and twenty days, are equal to seven years and thirty days.

* Although in general terms the seven years' covenant will be made about seven years before the Consummation or End, yet, strictly speaking, it will be made just seven years and two and a half months before the end; because in the last chapter of Daniel an additional 75 days is mentioned—being the excess or prolongation of the 1335 days beyond the 1260 days or three and a half times—Dan. 12: 7, 11, 12. The three and a half times is the latter three and a half years of the seven years of the covenant week, and is the period of Antichrist's persecuting power and world-wide dominion and the additional 75 days are the interval for the destruction of Antichrist's power. All the three periods of the 1260, 1290, and 1335 days in Dan. 12: 7-12 begin on the same day, in the midst of the week of seven years; and the two latter are slight prolongations of the first. His image, the abomination of desolation, stands in the place of the daily sacrifice in the sanctuary during the 1290 days, and is then cast down and removed, and the sanctuary cleansed—thus leaving 45 days more to elapse until the end of the 1335 days, when full blessedness is brought in by Christ's descent and Antichrist's destruction. Both the 2300 days and the 1290 days end with the cleansing of the sanctuary (Dan. 12: 11). The 2300 days are mentioned in Dan. 8: 13, 14, as the whole period of the vision concerning the renewed sacrifices and the subsequent desolation and the ultimate cleansing of the sanctuary.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, Postal notes, or Express money-orders whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate is now Taking up the Silver question on which the House has practically decided not to legislate. It has two bills before it, of which one is by Senator Sherman. It directs the Government to purchase from two to four million ounces of silver per month, paying for it in silver certificates, which it must redeem in gold coin when required. The second is by Senator Allison. It proposes that "hereafter any holder of silver coins of full legal-tender value may, at his option, present them, in sums of $50, or any multiple thereof, at the Treasury, or at the Sub-Treasury in the city of New York, and receive therefor in exchange a like amount of gold coin or United States notes," and gold coin may be exchanged "in like manner." The two bills are similar in principle, though the latter is the more simple and direct method. Either of them would assist in bringing the question to a crisis as the stock of gold at the disposal of the Treasury would in a short time be exhausted. But it is quite right that if the value of silver is depreciated, the loss should fall on the Government and not on individual holders.

The President's Message to Congress on the subject of strikes, which was sent to that body on Thursday last, distinctly marks his attitude with reference to the proposed Board of Arbitration. After calling attention to the urgent need for some effort being made to remedy the existing troubles, and referring to the constitutional difficulties involved in legislating on the subject, he said: "I am satisfied, however, that something may be done under Federal authority to prevent the disturbances which so often arise from disputes between employers and the employed, and which at times seriously threaten the business interests of the country, and in my opinion the proper theory upon which to proceed is that of voluntary arbitration as the means of settling these difficulties. But I suggest that instead of arbitrators chosen in the heat of conflicting claims, and after each dispute shall arise, there be created a Commission of Labor, consisting of three members, who shall be regular officers of the Government, charged among other duties with the consideration and settlement, when possible, of all controversies between labor and capital. . . . If such a commission were fairly organized the risk of a loss of popular support and sympathy resulting from a refusal to submit to so peaceful an instrumentality would constrain both parties to such disputes to invoke its interference and abide by its decisions. There would also be good reason to hope that the very existence of such an agency would invite application to it for advice and counsel, frequently resulting in the avoidance of contention and misunderstanding. . . . Power should also be distinctly conferred upon this bureau to investigate the causes of all disputes as they occur, whether submitted for arbitration or not, so that information may always be at hand to aid legislation on the subject when necessary and desirable." If Congress can spare time from its exhausting labor of deciding whether this or that man shall have the Post-Office, to which he has been nominated, it will take this important suggestion into consideration.

A Proposal to Indemnify the Chinese Sufferers by the Rock Springs riots in September last, made its appearance in the Senate on Thursday. It was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It authorizes the President to designate three officers of the United States to investigate and take the testimony of witnesses. They are required to report the estimate of the damages sustained by each person and the testimony to the Secretary of State within six months, which time may be extended six months by the order of the President, and the same shall be examined by the Secretary of State, and thereupon the President shall award to each person injured the sum that he shall consider to be just. The aggregate amount so awarded by the President, not exceeding $150,000, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chinese Minister.

The Rumors of the President's Approaching marriage which have been current for some time, received confirmation last week from several quarters apparently reliable. The authorities quoted for the news are the Rev. William Cleveland, the President's brother, and Colonel J. B. Folsom, the lady's grandfather. Miss Frances Folsom, the lady in question, is twenty-two years old, having been born in 1864. She is the daughter of the late Oscar Folsom, who was killed in 1875, by being thrown from a buggy, in a runaway accident on Grand Island. Miss Folsom is reported to possess considerable personal attractions. She was educated at the Central High School in Buffalo, after which she took a four years' course at Wells College, at Aurora, and graduated last year.

Ex-President Arthur's Serious Illness was the subject of public comment last week. In deference to the wishes of his family it had not been reported before, though he has been in imminent danger of death for some time past. His vigorous constitution and his indomitable will helped him to pass several crises safely, but it is noticed now that his physical strength is rapidly declining, and his disease is making correspondingly rapid progress. General Arthur is suffering from Bright's disease. The alarming feature of his case is that the disease is now complicated by the heart and stomach troubles, which generally accompany Bright's disease when it is approaching a fatal termination.

A Strike of Car-Drivers and Conductors on the Third Avenue Surface Railroad of New York kept the city in agitation all last week. On Monday, owing to a suspicion that other railroads were assisting the Third Avenue Company, the car-drivers and conductors—to the number of nine thousand—were ordered off several lines, and no surface-cars were running except on the west side of the city. But the following day the companies having given a promise not to assist the Third Avenue, traffic was resumed on all the other lines. The Third Avenue Company attempted to run a few cars with new men and a few old ones who did not join in the strike. At the close of the week the company and their employés were still unable to agree upon terms, though several conferences had been held, and a Railroad Commission from Albany had endeavored to mediate. A very bitter feeling prevailed on both sides, and several riotous demonstrations were made. It became necessary to place a policeman armed with a formidable night club, on each platform of every car and to have the avenue patrolled by the police. On Saturday another attempt to mediate was made by the Rev. James J. Dougherty in whose parish many of the strikers live. The attempt was not successful, but the clergyman promises to renew it this week. He deserves our hearty good wishes, but his prospects at present are not hopeful. Neither the employers nor the employés act on the principle of the Golden Rule in our day. Men are not paid according to the money they earn for their employers, nor according to their necessities, but at the lowest rate at which competition compels them to work. The principle that men have a right to buy in the cheapest market, which, when applied to labor is an inhuman principle, has taken a firm hold of the minds of many employers, and strikes are simply an effort to "corner" the market. The men have learned it from the capitalists. Each party has taken advantage of the necessities of the other, and as the company is compelled by law to run its cars whether there is a strike or not, the men by striking are trying to force the company to yield to save its charter, just as the company forced the men to work sixteen hours a day rather than starve. Until Christian principles govern the world's business this antagonism will continue and grow worse.

The Attempt to Coerce Greece is Attended with difficulties. France positively refuses to take part in it, and Russia shows extreme reluctance. There is general astonishment that Mr. Gladstone's government should be taking the lead in the movement, as his sympathy with Greek aspirations has not been concealed. The explanation is that an attack by Greece on Turkey would probably precipitate a general European war. The fact is so well understood that even France gives to Greece the friendly advice to disarm. The collective note of the European Powers demanding her immediate disarmament was to be presented on Monday last. If that note is disregarded a naval demonstration is expected to be made in Greek waters.

The Oregon Inquiry has Terminated in a verdict in favor of the Cunard Company. The court, however, appeared to think that the officers of the steamer were not wholly blameless. In speaking of the conduct of the chief officer who was in command when the vessel was wrecked, the court said: "It seemed to the court that some blame must under the circumstances attach to the chief officer, and in our opinion, in the absence of the second officer, it was more necessary for the chief officer to be vigilant, but he had given his evidence in an admirable way, and we could not deprive a gentleman of his character of his certificate." It is thought that these remarks will be made a basis for a suit by the passengers to recover damages.

The Question of Home Rule for Ireland was last week vigorously discussed throughout Great Britain. Members of Parliament, during the recess, had an opportunity of meeting the men who elected them. It was observed that while in London, public opinion is decisively against Mr. Gladstone's scheme, the country towns approve it. There is a still larger class, especially in the large cities, who express no opinion on the bill, but believe in Mr. Gladstone, and wish their representatives to vote for any great measure he proposes. It was a significant hint that Birmingham gave to Mr. Chamberlain in passing a vote of confidence in Mr. Gladstone. A still more significant circumstance is that an expression dropped in Parliament by Mr. Healy is attracting the attention it deserves from the people, though it passed comparatively unnoticed in the House. He said: "You cannot have federation until you have got the Legislatures to federate with." A few enlightened men are now talking of Legislatures sitting in Birmingham, Edinburgh, Carnarvon, and Dublin, dealing respectively with English, Scottish, Welsh, and Irish affairs, with a grand national Council at Westminster, in which those countries, with Canada and Australia, would all be represented. There is not the least doubt that such a system would be the true solution of the constitutional problem, and would firmly bind the British Empire together in loyal union. It would, however, Americanize British institutions, a calamity which John Bull dreads.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Held Services recently at the University of Virginia. Six services were held in two days, and large crowds were attracted. A correspondent of the Observer states that the singing had a wonderful effect on the audience and was much blessed. Mr. Moody's first sermon dealt with that class of persons who would reject some parts of the Bible and accept others; and he held strenuously to the doctrine that all of the Bible is to be believed, whether it can be understood or not. His last sermon answered the excuses popularly made for not accepting and embracing religion.

A Town in Need of Prayer was Mentioned at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting last week. The secretary of a Young Men's Christian Association in an Illinois town writes: "We request an interest in your prayers for our city, because here for near a half century infidelity and intemperance have reigned in every part of our organic being: judges, lawyers, physicians, councilmen, school-directors, school-teachers, etc., from the highest to the lowest stratum. Our town is thoroughly saturated, and our four Protestant churches are poor, and are not gaining ground. Pray mightily that the dear Lord of the harvest may send us a great shower of blessing."

The Camp-Meeting at Mountain Lake Park, Md., will be held this year on July 10th, and close on July 19th. We give this early intimation because we believe large numbers of our readers hope to attend it, and will like to make arrangements beforehand. The blessing which was experienced last year will cause every one who was there to go this year if possible. There was such an outpouring of the Spirit's influence as will never be forgotten, and it had its after effect very noticeable on life and work. The meetings will be conducted by Revs. Dugan Clark, M.D., and David B. Updegraff, and other ministers are expected to take part. A neat little pamphlet of fifty pages, giving full particulars of the coming meetings and some account of the services last year, has been prepared by Rev. John Thompson, 2002 Brandywine Street, Philadelphia. It may be obtained from him free on application, by inclosing a two-cent stamp for postage.

Mr. and Mrs. George C. Needham are Following Messrs. Moody and Sankey in the work at Norfolk, Va. They assisted in the mammoth services conducted by the renowned evangelists which closed on April 18th, and have now, at the special invitation of the pastors of the city, consented to remain for a time and continue the work. Two services are held each day, and some remarkable conversions have taken place. At one of the meetings there was a pathetic scene when a gentleman came forward to confess Christ in public. It appeared that he had a Christian wife who had been for many years praying for his conversion. She did not know that her prayers were answered until he rose in the meeting and in an agitated voice declared himself a believer. The lady was overcome, and running up the aisle to where he stood flung her arms around his neck, exclaiming: "Oh, my dear, dear husband!" The whole audience was moved to tears by the scene.

The Florence Night Mission in New York, the valuable character of which has frequently been mentioned in these columns, celebrated its third anniversary on April 18th. The cost of the work for the year was $4167. The receipts were less than $800, but the mission is not to be burdened by a debt. Mr. Charles N. Crittenton, the philanthropic treasurer, wrote his cheque for the deficiency. The noble, self-sacrificing superintendent, Mr. H. B. Gibbud, who may be seen at all hours of the night laboring in the most degraded localities for the recovery of the lost, explained the methods of work. Its primary object, he said, was to reclaim fallen women, but it includes gamblers, libertines, keepers of disreputable houses, and the like. Women are sought on the street and in the dance-houses, their acquaintance is made, and they are then persuaded to leave their evil ways and lead respectable lives. Three hundred and thirty-three women were admitted to the home during the year, of whom 127 were sent to other homes, 107 were supplied with situations, 29 were sent to hospitals, and 37 were returned to friends. The number of conversions was 108.

A Will Signed by a Dead Man was Offered for probate in the Surrogate's Court, of Brooklyn, last week. It was presented by the executor, who was a brother of the deceased, and the surrogate asked him, in the course of his formal examination, if his brother had, after signing the will, declared it to be his last will and testament. The surrogate was astonished when the man said: "No, he was dead when he signed it." "That was impossible," said the surrogate. "But I know he was dead. You see, the pen was put between his fingers and a friend moved his hand and did not stop until the whole name was written, when it was found that my brother was dead." Under the circumstances the surrogate declined to admit the will to probate until inquiries had been made, and it is probable that the document will be set aside and the estate administered according to the law for the estate of persons dying intestate. It is sad to know that there are many who cling to the hope that a more important matter still may be arranged after death, and therefore defer attending to it until too late. It is to the living only that God's mercy is offered in His Word (Eccles. 11: 3).

A Distressing Suicide which Took Place in Milwaukee, Wis., last week, deserves mention as a warning to young men who are tempted to enter upon a dissolute career. It appears that some years ago a young man entered the service of a Chicago firm, and by his energy and diligence gained the confidence of his employers. They paid him a salary of nine thousand dollars a year. He married an amiable and refined lady, and the union was blessed with several children whom he loved dearly. In the course of business last year the young man met a fascinating lady of immoral character. He became deeply infatuated, and lavished large sums of money upon her. The week before last he spent a thousand dollars in presents for her. He still continued to reside with his family, but made frequent trips to Milwaukee, where his new acquaintance resided, but succeeded in keeping secret his double life. Remorse, however, was making him miserable, but the chains of his sin had grown too strong to be broken. On April 21st, while on one of his immoral visits to Milwaukee, he sat down and wrote to his wife, making a full confession, and then shot himself. The tenor of his letter showed that he had succumbed to temptation until, though he loathed himself for his depravity, he had not the moral strength to sever his shameful connection. His mental suffering and tragic death are a solemn warning to all who are playing with temptation (Prov. 5: 7-13).

School-Boys on Strike Disturbed a District of Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. On Saturday, April 10th, a meeting of the pupils of Public School No. 34 was held in a candy-store, to take into consideration certain grievances. At the meeting it was decided that there ought to be a half-hour's recess every day, and a half holiday on Friday, and a strike was ordered to commence on Monday, and to continue until the demand was granted. The principal and teachers have always advised the pupils to read the newspapers, and it would appear that the advice has been taken. The strike was conducted on the approved principles. The strikers assembled near the school-gates and closed them after the janitor had opened them. They jammed wooden wedges into the spring lock to prevent the gates being reopened. Non-strikers were met on their way to school and warned not to present themselves under threat of "having to have it"—"it" being personal and condign punishment. There were about a hundred of the strikers and intimidated boys absent. They were congregated in a vacant lot near at hand giving addresses, distributing candy, and generally keeping up each other's courage. The strike collapsed in an untimely manner owing to the action of the principal of the school, who appealed to the parents of the boys. Home coercion being applied individually, the collective courage of the strikers weakened, and all joined their classes next day. The incident is amusing, but it suggests a serious lesson. No man's actions end with himself; his example for good or ill is having its influence on others, and he is exercising a power on the future of the world (Rom. 14: 7, 19).

A Sufficient Reason for Declining a Ride was given recently by a boy in Connecticut. A gentleman was driving on the Waterbury road when he saw a boy lagging along slowly in the same direction. Being a kind-hearted man, he stopped and invited the boy to get up and ride with him. To his surprise the youngster declined, and as he thought the refusal might be due to modesty or shyness, he pressed the lad and insisted on knowing the reason. Then the boy confessed that he knew he should get a whipping when he arrived at home, and consequently he was "in no hurry." The same consciousness accounts for the contrast between the serenity of the Christian and the terror of the wicked man when both see, in the decline of their bodily powers, that they are nearing the end of their earthly journey (Ps. 37: 37, 38).

An Express Train on the New York and New England Railroad was saved from wreck recently by the energy of a farmer. On April 16th, while going around his farm, he saw that there was a rock-slide in a cut near Pomperaug Valley. He went and examined it. It was an immense slide, completely filling up the cut. Later, when men came to dig it out, they found it two hundred feet long and twenty-five feet deep. The farmer knew that an express train would be along in a short time; he therefore hurriedly hitched up his horse and drove to the nearest station, which is called Sandy Hook, arriving just in time to stop the train. So desperate had been the pace necessary to get to Sandy Hook before the train got there that the farmer's horse dropped dead after accomplishing the journey. The exertion, however, was well worth making, for a little less promptitude in starting and a little more time consumed on the journey would have cost many lives. The farmer was aware of this, so he used his utmost efforts to avert the disaster. Christian men fail to realize the terrific character of the disaster to which the lives of so many of their fellow-men are tending, or we should witness similar earnestness in Christian effort where now we see so much apathy (II Cor. 5: 11).

A Mystery has been Solved in Illinois by a sad discovery. During the past seven months two families have been plunged in distress by the disappearance of three boys. They were two brothers, aged respectively twelve and seven years, and a playmate, aged ten years. On September 4th, 1885, the three children suddenly disappeared from their homes, and their parents made search for them in vain, and then offered rewards for their discovery. It was the general opinion that the children had been stolen by river pirates, and advertisements were inserted in several papers south of Quincy, but no trace of them was found. On April 20th a man hauling sand for a foundry was loading his wagon near the river bank, and was horrified on finding the decomposed bodies of the three missing boys. It is thought that the boys were digging a chamber in the side of the sand bank, when it caved in and buried them alive. It seems that the river pirates were unjustly suspected in this case; the children accomplished their own destruction through their ignorance of the dangerous character of their amusement. There are multitudes of boys in our great cities who have been sent there from the country to learn a business who are similarly engaged in bringing down on their own heads a worse catastrophe. Their parents will say that Satan has stolen them, but if they could see them leaving the theatre or the saloons they would understand that they were working their own ruin (Prov. 7: 22, 23).

THE TWO APPEARINGS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."—TITUS 2: 11-14.

Paul's Belief in a Divine Saviour—In a Great Redemption—From Sin—Not from its Punishment Only—I. Our Position—Between Two Appearances—The Past Era—The Greater Anno Domini—The Present Age—The Second Coming Imminent—II. The Instruction Given—Grace has Discipline—Three Results—Denying, Living, Looking—III. Our Encouragements—Tokens of Christ's Near Advent—Ambulance Work in the Church.

UPON reading this text one sees at a glance that Paul believed in a Divine Saviour. He did not preach a Saviour who was a mere man. He believed the Lord Jesus Christ to be truly man, but he also believed Him to be God over all, and he therefore uses the striking words, "the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Paul believed in Jesus as "the great God and our Saviour." It was his high delight to extol the Lord who once was crucified in weakness. He calls Him here, "the great God," thus specially dwelling upon His power, dominion, and glory; and this is the more remarkable because he immediately goes on to say, "who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity." O brothers, if you take away the Deity of Christ what in the Gospel is left that is worth the preaching? None but the great God is equal to the work of being our Saviour.

SAVED FROM SIN.

We learn also at first sight that Paul believed in a great redemption. "Who gave Himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity." That word "redemption" sounds in my ears like a silver bell. We are ransomed, purchased back from slavery, and this at an immeasurable price; not merely by the obedience of Christ, nor the suffering of Christ, nor even the death of Christ, but by Christ's giving Himself for us. Paul looks upon recovery from sin as being a wonderful proof of divine grace. He does not talk about a kind of grace that would leave men in sin, and yet save them from its punishment. No; his salvation is salvation from sin. He does not talk about a free grace which winks at iniquity, and makes nothing of transgression; but of a greater grace by far, which denounces the iniquity and condemns the transgression, and then delivers the victim of it from the habit which has brought him into bondage. To each one of us, whether rich or poor, prominent or obscure, the Gospel has come, and its design is that we may be delivered by it from all ungodliness and worldly lusts.

I. First of all, the apostle in this text describes OUR POSITION.

The people of God stand between two appearances. In the eleventh verse he tells us that "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men;" and then he says, in the thirteenth verse, "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." We live in an age which is an interval between two appearances of the Lord from heaven. Believers in Jesus are shut off from the old economy by the first coming of our Lord. We date from the birth of the Virgin's Son: we begin with Anno Domini. All the rest of time is before Christ, and is marked off from the Christian era. Bethlehem's manger is our beginning. The chief landmark in all time to us is the wondrous life of Him who is the light of the world. We look to the appearing of the grace of God in the form of the lowly One of Nazareth, for our trust is there.

Brethren, we look forward to a second appearing. Our outlook for the close of this present era is another appearing—an appearing of glory rather than of grace. After our Master rose from the brow of Olivet His disciples remained for awhile in mute astonishment; but soon an angelic messenger reminded them of prophecy and promise by saying: "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." We believe that our Lord in the fulness of time will descend from heaven with a shout, with the trump of the archangel, and the voice of God.

"The Lord shall come! the earth shall quake;
The mountains to their centre shake;
And, withering from the vault of night,
The stars shall pale their feeble light."

This is the terminus of the present age. We look from Anno Domini, in which He came the first time, to that greater Anno Domini, or year of our Lord, in which He shall come a second time, in all the splendor of His power, to reign in righteousness, and break the evil powers as with a rod of iron.

TRUST AND HOPE.

See, then, where we are: we are compassed about, behind and before, with the appearances of our Lord. Behind us is our trust; before us is our hope. Behind us is the Son of God in humiliation; before us is the great God our Saviour in His glory. To use an ecclesiastical term, we stand between two Epiphanies: the first is the manifestation of the Son of God in human flesh in dishonor and weakness; the second is the manifestation of the same Son of God in all His power and glory. In what a position, then, do the saints stand! They have an era all to themselves which begins and ends with the Lord's appearing.

Our position is further described in the text, if you look at it, as being in this present world, or age. We are living in the age which lies between the two blazing beacons of the divine appearances; and we are called to hasten from one to the other. We are to keep ourselves as loose as we can from this country through which we make our pilgrim-way; for we are strangers and foreigners, and here we have no continuing city. We hurry through this Vanity Fair: before us lies the Celestial City and the coming of the Lord who is the King thereof. As voyagers cross the Atlantic, and so pass from shore to shore, so do we speed over the waves of this ever-changing world to the glory-land of the bright appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

You stand between two mornings, between which there is no evening. The glory of the Lord has risen upon you once in the incarnation and atonement of your Lord: that light is shining more and more, and soon there will come the perfect day, which shall be ushered in by the second advent. The sun shall no more go down, but it shall unveil itself, and shed an indescribable splendor upon all hearts that look for it. "Put on therefore the armor of light." What a grand expression! Helmet of light, breastplate of light, shoes of light—everything of light. What a knight must he be who is clad, not in steel, but in light, light which shall flash confusion on his foes! There ought to be a holy light about you, O believer in Jesus, for there is the appearing of grace behind you, and the appearing of glory before you. That is the position of the righteous according to my text, and it furnishes a loud call to holiness.

II. Secondly, I have to call your attention to THE INSTRUCTION which is given to us by the grace of God which has appeared unto all men. Our translation runs thus: "The grace of God hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." A better translation would be: "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, disciplining us in order that we may deny ungodliness and worldly lusts." Those of you who know a little Greek will note that the word which in our version is rendered "teaching" is a scholastic term, and has to do with the education of children; not merely the teaching, but the training and bringing of them up. The grace of God has come to be a schoolmaster to us, to teach us, to train us, to prepare us for a more developed state.

So then, first of all,

GRACE HAS A DISCIPLINE.

We generally think of law when we talk about schoolmasters and discipline; but grace itself has a discipline and a wonderful training power too. The manifestation of grace is preparing us for the manifestation of glory. What the law could not do, grace is doing. As soon as we come under the conscious enjoyment of the free grace of God, we find it to be a holy rule, a fatherly government, a heavenly training. We find, not self-indulgence, much less licentiousness; but on the contrary, the grace of God both restrains and constrains us; it makes us free to holiness, and delivers us from the law of sin and death by "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus."

The discipline of grace, according to the apostle, has three results—denying, living, looking. You see the three words before you. The first is "denying." When a young man comes to college he usually has much to unlearn. If his education has been neglected, a sort of instinctive ignorance covers his mind with briars and brambles. If he has gone to some faulty school where the teaching is flimsy, his tutor has first of all to fetch out of him what he has been badly taught. The most difficult part of the training of young men is not to put the right thing into them, but to get the wrong thing out of them. A man proposes to teach a language in six months, and in the end a great thing is done if one of his pupils is able to forget all his nonsense in six years. When the Holy Spirit comes into the heart, He finds that we know so much already of what it were well to leave unknown; we are self-conceited, we are puffed up. We have learned lessons of worldly wisdom and carnal policy, and these we need to unlearn and deny. The Holy Spirit works this denying in us by the discipline of grace.

WHAT HAVE WE TO DENY?

First, we have to deny ungodliness. That is a lesson which many of you have great need to learn. Listen to working-men. "Oh," they say, "we have to work hard, we cannot think about God or religion!" This is ungodliness! The grace of God teaches us to deny this; we come to loathe such atheism. Others are prospering in the world, and they cry: "If you had as much business to look after as I have, you would have no time to think about your soul or another world. Trying to battle with the competition of the times leaves me no opportunity for prayer or Bible-reading; I have enough to do with my day-book and ledger." This also is ungodliness! The grace of God leads us to deny this; we abhor such forgetfulness of God.

We next deny "worldly lusts"—that is, the lusts of the present world or age, which I described to you just now as coming in between the two appearances. Wherever the grace of God comes effectually, it makes the loose liver deny the desires of the flesh; it causes the man who lusted after gold to conquer his greediness; it brings the proud man away from his ambitions; it trains the idler to diligence; and it sobers the wanton mind which cared only for the frivolities of life. Not only do we leave these lusts, but we deny them. We desire to be crucified to the world and the world to us. This was a great thing for grace to do among the degraded sensualists of Paul's day, and it is not a less glorious achievement in these times.

But then, brethren, you cannot be complete with a merely negative religion; you must have something positive; and so the next word is living—that "we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." Observe, brethren, that the Holy Ghost expects us to live in this present world, and therefore we are not to exclude ourselves from it. This age is the battle-field in which the soldier of Christ is to fight. Society is the place in which Christianity is to exhibit the graces of Christ. If it were possible for these good sisters to retire into a large house, and live secluded from the world, they would be shirking their duty rather than fulfilling it. If all the good men and true were to form a select colony, and do nothing else but pray and hear sermons, they would simply be refusing to serve God in His own appointed way. No; you have to live soberly, godly, righteously in this world, such as it is at present. It is of no use for you to scheme to escape from it. You are bound to breast this torrent, and buffet all its waves. You are to shine in the darkness like a light.

HOW TO LIVE.

This life is described in a three-fold way. You are, first, to live "soberly"—that is, for yourself. "Soberly" in all your eating and your drinking, and in the indulgence of all bodily appetites—that goes without saying. Drunkards and gluttons, fornicators and adulterers, cannot inherit the kingdom of God. You are to live soberly in all your thinking, all your speaking, all your acting. There is to be sobriety in all your worldly pursuits. You are to have yourself well in hand: you are to be self-restrained. The man who is disciplined by the grace of God becomes thoughtful, considerate, self-contained; and He is no longer tossed about by passion, or swayed by prejudice.

As to his fellow-men the believer lives "righteously." I cannot understand that Christian who can do a dirty thing in business. Craft, cunning, over-reaching, misrepresentation, and deceit are no instruments for the hand of godly men. I am told that my principles are too angelic for business life—that a man cannot be a match for his fellow-men in trade, if he is too Puritanic. Others are up to tricks, and he will be ruined if he cannot trick them in return. Oh, my dear hearers, do not talk in this way! If you mean to go the way of the devil, say so, and take the consequences; but if you profess to be servants of God, deny all partnership with unrighteousness.

Once more, there is looking, as well as living. One work of the grace of God is to cause us to be "looking for that blessed hope of the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." What is that "blessed hope?" Why, first, that when He comes we shall rise from the dead, if we have fallen asleep; and that, if we are alive and remain, we shall be changed at His appearing. Our hope is that we shall be approved of Him, and shall hear Him say: "Well done, good and faithful servant." The Lord cometh, and in the coming of the Lord lies the great hope of the believer, his great stimulus to overcome evil, his main incentive to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. Oh, to be found blameless in the day of the manifestation of our Lord! God grant us this! Do you not see, brethren, how the discipline of the doctrine of grace runs toward the separating of us from sin, and the making us to live unto God?

III. Lastly, and briefly, the text sets forth certain of

OUR ENCOURAGEMENTS.

I will only briefly hint at them. In this great battle for right, and truth, and holiness, what could we do, my brethren and my sisters, if we were left alone? But our first encouragement is that grace has come to our rescue; for in the day when the Lord Jesus Christ appeared among men, He brought for us the grace of God to help us to overcome all iniquity. He that struggleth now against inbred sin has the Holy Spirit within him to help him. He that goes forth to fight against evil in other men by preaching the Gospel has that same Holy Ghost going with the truth to make it like a fire and like a hammer. I would ground my weapons, and retreat from a fight so hopeless, were it not that the Lord of Hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge.

A second encouragement is that another appearing is coming. He who bowed His head in weakness, and died in the moment of victory, is coming in all the glory of His endless life. Do not question it; the world is not going to darken into an eternal night: the morning cometh as well as the night, and though sin and corruption abound, and the love of many waxeth cold, these are but the tokens of who said that it would be so before His appearing. The right with the might and the might with the right shall be; as surely as God lives, it shall be so. We are not fighting a losing battle. The Lord must triumph.

Another encouragement is that we are serving a glorious Master. The Christ whom we follow is not a dead prophet like Mahomet. Truly we preach Christ crucified; but we also believe in Christ risen from the dead, in Christ gone up on high, in Christ soon to come a second time.

Then come the tender thoughts with which I finish the memories of what the Lord has done for us to make us holy: "Who gave Himself for us." Special redemption, redemption with a wondrous price—"who gave Himself for us." Put away that trumpet and that drum; take down the harp and gently touch its sweetest strings. Tell how the Lord Jesus loved us, and gave Himself for us. Oh, sirs, if nothing else can touch our hearts this must: "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price."

And He gave Himself for us with these two objects: first, redemption, that He might redeem us from all iniquity; that He might break the bonds of sin asunder, and cast the cords of depravity far from us. He died—forget not that—died that your sins might die, died that every lust might be dragged into captivity at His chariot wheels. He gave Himself for you that you might give yourselves for Him.

PURITY.

Again, He died that He might purify us—purify us unto Himself. How clean we must be if we are to be clean unto Him! We are purified unto Himself, as the Hebrew would put it, to be His segullah, His peculiar possession. The translation "peculiar people" is unfortunate, because "peculiar" has come to mean odd, strange, singular. The passage really means that believers are Christ's own people, His choice and select portion. He desires that you, who are being disciplined by His grace, should know that you are altogether His. You are Christ's men. You are each one to feel, "I do not belong to the world; I do not belong to myself; I belong only to Christ. I am set aside by Him for Himself only, and His I will be." The silver and the gold are His, and the cattle upon a thousand hills are His; but He makes small account of them; "the Lord's portion is His people."

The apostle finishes up by saying that we are to be a people "zealous of good works." Would to God that all Christian men and women were disciplined by divine grace till they became zealous for good works! In holiness zeal is sobriety. We are not only to approve of good works, and speak for good works, but we are to be red-hot for them. We are to be on fire for everything that is right and true. We may not be content to be quiet and inoffensive, but we are to be zealous of good works. Oh, that my Lord's grace would set us on fire in this way! There is plenty of fuel in the Church; what is wanted is fire. A great many very respectable people are, in their sleepy way, doing as little as they can for any good cause. This will never do. We must wake up.

Oh, the quantity of ambulance work that Christ's soldiers have to do! One half of Christ's army has to carry the other half. Oh, that our brethren could get off the sick-list! Oh, that all of us were ardent, fervent, vigorous, zealous! Come, Holy Spirit, and quicken us! We may not go about to get this by our own efforts and energies, but God will work it by His grace. Grace given us in Christ is the fountain-head of all holy impulse. O heavenly grace, come like a flood at this time and bear us right away!

Oh, that those of you who have never felt the grace of God may be enabled to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ as to His first appearing! Then, trusting in His death upon the cross, you will learn to look for His second coming upon the throne, and you will rejoice therein. Unto His great name be glory forever and ever! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Two Hopeless Letters.*

SOME years ago a godly minister, who had taken a special interest in the spiritual welfare of the young men of his flock, happened to be in London. Passing along Cheapside one day, he took refuge from a shower of rain in the Mansion House, where the Lord Mayor was sitting in court. On the following morning, while calling at the office of a friend, a letter was handed to him, which had been thrust in under the door. The letter was as follows:

"DEAR SIR: As I was walking up Ludgate Hill this morning you passed me. It is ten years since I saw you, but I knew you instantly, and I forward this line to tell you I am glad to see you looking so well, and that the sight of your familiar face induced a number of pleasing reflections in connection with bygone scenes, but of agonizing remorse at the maddening recollection that, from the neglect of those principles you endeavored to inculcate, I find myself a young man stripped of fortune, friends, character, and hope of the world to come—a mere wreck, a waif on the restless waves of life, that sway to and fro in this desert city! What would I not give to recall the past! The text, 'Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap,' thunders in my conscience constantly. I find it true in temporal affairs as well as spiritual. The next you hear of me will be in the list of those who seek to bury their sorrows in the waters of the Thames. I thought these feelings I had smothered forever; but conscience will be heard despite all. I wilfully silenced her, and now I can trace the retributive hand of Providence in the results of every false step. I saw you again at the Mansion House in the afternoon. I hope you will refrain from making inquiries as to my name, as it would be labor thrown away. All I ask is an interest in your prayers."

You can well believe that the perusal of this letter awakened a painful interest in the mind of the minister. Intensely desirous to meet with the writer, yet having no clue, he seemed to have a hopeless task before him. However, he determined to try. The following advertisement was inserted next morning in the personal column of the Times:

"A young man who, on the 23d inst., addressed a note to R. E. M., which was left in an office in Gresham Street, is earnestly requested to send his name and address to the said R. E. M., 336 Post-Office B—, who will be rejoiced to relieve him."

Little was expected from this, but it was a bow drawn at a venture. It was not long before a letter, addressed as above, reached the minister by mail. I give it you word for word:

"DEAR SIR: I see that time that destroys all things has not altered your character—ever kind, generous, and anxious to succor the distressed. Accept my best and heartfelt thanks for your kind communication in the Times; but I regret that you should have been at the trouble and expense of insertion, as it is impossible for me to avail myself of it at the present. The past, the present, and the future equally forbid a disclosure of my private history; and yet you are the only person to whom I could, I think, unbosom myself, or from whom I could seek advice; but not now. Do not waste another thought upon one totally unworthy of everything but contempt and derision from all good men. Could I persuade myself that there was no hereafter, how gladly would I seek annihilation! But it is a hopeless task; the instincts of my better part are unfortunately too true to be deluded by a lie. What an awful reality is life, and what a dream mine has been! Commencing with novel-reading, and ending in vice, misery, and disease—such are a few of the least evils I am now reaping.

"I remain, dear sir, yours gratefully, —."

This is but one of hundreds—ay, of thousands of such cases which occur every year in this metropolis, many of which never come to light, but end in some dark lodging in the slums, or in the poor-house, or asylum, or banishment.

GOSPEL WORK ON SHIPBOARD.

THE characteristic most prominent in the Christian work of our day is the systematic organization of effort. No sooner is attention directed to a neglected class than some special provision is made for reaching that class. Too often the attempt languishes after the novelty is worn off, but in some cases an energetic, persevering Christian among the band of workers concentrates his efforts upon that particular sphere of labor and keeps it in operation. Our illustration represents an incident in one of these special organizations—the work among sailors.

No sooner had the steamer Esk been safely moored at her dock when the evangelist—a plain, honest man, himself once a sailor, with a jolly face and cheery manner that made friends with every sailor—went on board. The crew were too busy to listen to him then, so he slipped quietly below, and going from berth to berth left a tract in each. Turning from the last one he saw the mate at his elbow and two sailors curiously watching his movements. A cordial greeting to the mate was well received, and the evangelist proceeded to explain what he was doing, and his fervent hope that the silent messengers might awaken the readers to a realization of the guilt and consequences of sin.

"Ah, sir," said the mate, "that's what has been troubling me for a long time." The evangelist told him he was glad to hear that, and told him of the remedy. "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth from all sin." "He exclaimed, 'Ah, that's it, that's it, now I see it!'"

JOHN S. CREED.

A Remarkable Business Career—Early Struggles—A New Start—Prayer on Every Transaction—Led to a Customer—A Money Crisis—The Strange History of $410—A Beneficent Life.

How many Christian business men are there in the whole world who actually and literally obey the injunction of the wise king: "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths" (Prov. 3:5, 6). Doubtless the majority of Christian men do ask in a general way for the guidance of God, but in business trials and perplexities they depend largely on their own understanding. Few would consider it prudent to conduct their business wholly as God might lead them. But that course has been adopted, and that, too by a man known to many of our readers. John S. Creed, whose portrait appears on this page, and who died a year ago, was a man who believed in the promise with all his heart and acted upon his faith. His business career was one of the most remarkable on record, and will well repay study.

Mr. Creed was a well-known lumber merchant. A few words suffice to describe his early life. He was born in 1853. When his education was completed he secured employment in the lumber business. He was faithful in his service, and when the firm he served relinquished business he succeeded them. He was at that time a sceptic. His pious mother grieved over his unbelief, but she would not argue with him. "No, John," she said, "I will not argue; but I want you to know that there is not a day that I do not pray God to show you that His Word is true."

He conducted his business on the approved methods, and when business men came to New York there was no one more ready than Creed to cement the connection by taking them around the city to show them its dissolute side. But he did not prosper, and eventually failed. In his poverty and distress he was drawn to his mother's God and became an earnest Christian.

He afterward commenced in a small way on his own account. He made the third chapter of Proverbs his chart, and every transaction was made the subject of prayer. Henceforth God was to be the ruling Partner in the business, and one tenth, at least, of the proceeds, was to be set scrupulously aside for His service.

His office showed the character of the man. Over the clock was the motto: "Thou God seest me," and many a profane man, impatient at some delay and looking up at the time, saw the motto and checked his profanity. Over his safe was another motto: "My help cometh from the Lord," and many a time it must have encouraged him when the safe held but little material for encouragement.

It was not an easy task that he had undertaken. The young dealer without capital had many crises. But each one was taken to God in prayer, and he survived them all. We have seen a journal in which his difficulties and deliverances were recorded. It is full of such triumphs. Out of hundreds we select a few: On one Monday morning, when three cargoes of lumber were consigned to him, the market already glutted, and no prospect of disposing of them to be seen, he wrote, after stating the circumstances, "By the grace of God I will hold on and wait His time and way of delivering me, for I expect nothing short of complete deliverance." It came. A few pages further on is the record of a journey in which he was moved to leave the train before it arrived at his destination. He found near the spot a lumber-yard, the proprietors of which were in need, at that particular hour, of the very description of lumber he was trying to sell.

Another entry records a crisis in which it was very important to his credit that he should make an advance on some lumber before he sold it. He saw the importance, but he sought no human help, told no one, but simply laid the matter before God and went homeward in peace. On board the ferryboat a friend whom he had not seen in some weeks accosted him and voluntarily, without any hint from Creed, offered him the loan of $5000, which was the exact amount needed for the morrow. At another time a friend consulted him about a pressing need for $300. Creed said he, too, was in urgent want of money, about $1500. The consultation terminated, as all consultations with Creed were sure to terminate, not in application to a bank or a money-lender, but in prayer. Together they knelt in Creed's office in Water Street and laid their need before the Lord, and then went their way at rest, feeling sure that God would see to it. The very next day a lawyer called and informed Creed that one of his debtors was anxious, for reasons of his own, to settle a claim that Creed had long regarded as a bad debt. He paid down $2000, and the $1800, for which the two friends had asked the Lord, was thus provided on time. Shortly afterward Mr. Creed needed $800 for a business purpose. As usual, he went to God about it. The next day the friend to whom he had lent the $300 before mentioned, came in and said: "John, I have brought you that $300 you loaned me. Are you in any special need of money? if so I have $500 more that I shall not want for a month; you are welcome to it, if it will be of any service." Thus again the need was supplied.

THE HISTORY OF $410.

He had a large Bible-class in the Sunday-school, composed of grown men collected from the neighborhood. It increased in number until better accommodation was necessary. He applied to the governing body of the church for permission to erect a gallery. It would cost $400, but Mr. Creed, with his customary "audacity," assured them that God would provide the money. They thought, however, that it would be prudent to postpone the work until the money was in hand. To John Creed's mind the money was as good as in hand then, for there was no doubt with him that God would send it. He was a little hurt that his friends would not trust God for the sum. He and a friend thereupon agreed to become responsible for the $400, trusting that God would so help them in business that they would be able to meet this extra obligation. They met in New York and prayed about it.

An hour or two later one of Mr. Creed's business rivals came in with a request that Mr. Creed would help him in a difficulty. He was overstocked, and would be glad if Mr. Creed would take a cargo of lumber off his hands. He would sell it below market price if Mr. Creed would buy it. It was contrary to his usual practice to buy lumber, as he had, up to that time, limited his operations to the broker's business of disposing of cargoes consigned to him for sale by Eastern men. But perhaps this was the way God was going to supply the needed money. Creed bought it and sold it at a price which left him a profit equal to his share of the cost of the gallery. A little later his friend came to him with a similar story of an operation outside his ordinary business which had yielded to him, too, his share. The money was put together and amounted to $410. "It is all the Lord's money," said Creed; "what shall we do with the surplus $10? Let us give it to the Lord;" and it was sent to one of God's faithful servants, a well-known worker in Brooklyn, who has a large family of God's children whose wants God enables him to supply.

It is a remarkable fact that the Christian worker in question was, at the moment he received the $10, in urgent need of that exact amount, which had to be paid that day to relieve a family in sore distress. He had said no word to any man on the subject, but when the demand came unexpectedly upon him he had looked to his pocketbook, had found it empty, but feeling sure that God would provide it, had promised to pay it. Mr. Creed's cheque for the surplus $10, which the Lord had sent over and above what had been asked for, thus found its way to the place where the Lord's servant was quietly waiting to receive it.

"A curious coincidence if true!" It is quite true—an actual fact vouched for by the writer, who knows the persons and circumstances, and there is nothing curious about it. Is it surprising that God Almighty keeps His promise? "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me" (Ps. 50: 15).

Mr. Creed's life was full of such interpositions. He expected them, he counted upon them, planted his feet firmly on the promise, and quietly waited for the salvation. His business grew rapidly. In 1879 money to the amount of $124,000 passed through his hands; it increased year by year until in 1884 the amount for that year was $479,000. People wondered, but it was not a mystery to Mr. Creed. To all he told the same story: "The Lord hath helped me." Shippers down East who sent him lumber to sell for them were astounded to receive his letters. A business communication which attributed the sale of a cargo to the goodness of God was a

AT THE MISSION.

Failures.

JULIET had reason to speak of her life as "a dreary blank." The words recorded in her journal were not an exaggeration. How could a young lady accustomed to the gay life of the city find the quiet life of self-sacrifice and labor for Christ which was lived by the devoted missionaries other than monotonous? She did not know "the love of Christ that constraineth," and therefore could not appreciate the motive which compelled the lives of those about her. She saw enough, however, of the loveliness of the Christian character to admire, if not to covet it. The next entry in her journal showed it, though in a distorted way. She wrote:

"Yet I am beginning to see that there is something nobler and better. Oh, that I could speak as Maria spoke on that last day of her beautiful life—of freedom and hope, pardon and peace, light and love, all freely bestowed upon me! I think that I will turn over a new leaf to-morrow; I will begin a different life. I will read the Bible daily in private, do good works, and try to gather up some of the heavenly manna. Then I shall see again that bright encouraging smile on the face of Fritz."

"November 11.—All a failure—an utter failure! Yet I thought that I made so good a beginning. As poor Sister Anna cannot rise to-day (we fear she has injured her back), I, with the help of Fritz, prepared the breakfast merrily, washed up the tea-things and all. (We do not allow the Esquimaux to do more than is abso-

"Said the pastor, as he sipped his cocoa, 'My wife specially grieves over not being able to visit our sick Lena, for we fear that she is not long for this world, and is not yet prepared for another. I myself go daily to pray beside her,' continued the dear old pastor, 'but the poor thing is silent and shy, and cannot open her heart to a man. Anna always knows what to say and what to do, and every one in Eschol loves her.' The good man has unlimited confidence in and admiration for his wife.

"'Shall I visit the sick woman?' I said, being in an unusually courageous mood, and buoyed up by good resolutions. I did not glance at Fritz, but I fancied that I heard a little expression of satisfaction from his lips. I have noticed how eager he is to draw me into any good work. Why should I care for pleasing him? I suppose that I have had lately so little of the sugar of praise, that a very little goes a long way.

"I will take you with me an hour hence," said the pastor. 'I should not like you to go alone,' he added, kindly; 'the dogs might be troublesome to you.'

"In high good humor with myself, I went to Sister Anna, whom I found placid as usual, though in evident pain. I offered to read the Bible to her, as another good work.

"I should be so thankful, dear," she said. 'The days are growing so dark, or perhaps it is that my eyes are growing so dim, that I can hardly manage to read even the largest print.'

"I made up the fire with logs, then took the Bible and read, Sister Anna listening with folded hands, and a look of placid peace.

"When I had closed the book and returned it to its proper place (everything here has its proper place), I sat down again by Anna, and said: 'I am going with Pastor Wilhelm to visit sick Lena.'

"That is well, my child," said Anna; 'but can you already read to her in her own tongue?'

"Would you like to hear what advance I have made?" I asked. I was in truth proud of my rapid progress, and with much self-satisfaction read a few verses aloud. Anna corrected me two or three times, but added the qualified praise, 'I think that the people may understand you.'

"I feel," she continued, 'that what with my increasing blindness, my rheumatism, and my weakness, I am not equal to the charge of the girl's school, and the readings with the women. Please God, I will do what I can, while the Lord keeps me on earth, but I shall be thankful when Fritz's bride comes next year to take the principal charge.'

"Fritz's bride!" I exclaimed, in surprise; 'I never knew that he was engaged!' the announcement was so sudden, it seemed to take away my breath. 'How long has the attachment lasted?' I inquired.

"I hope that it will last forever," said Anna; 'but the couple have not yet seen one another.'

"I dropped the log which I was about to place on the fire, I felt so surprised and so angry, I scarcely knew why. 'Do you mean that Fritz lets others choose for him, dictate to him, and that in a matter which concerns all his happiness in life? I did not think him so mean-spirited a man!'

"Anna looked a little surprised at my indignation. 'Dear Fritz lets the Lord choose for him,' she said, 'as He chose a partner for Isaac. Our happiness is safest when we leave it in the hands of the Lord. You see, my child,' she added, 'Brother Fritz could not go home without leaving his station for nearly a year, and letting all the winter work rest on the shoulders of my dear husband, who is not as strong as he was last summer.'

"Anna's explanation was, I suppose, satisfactory to herself, but not at all satisfactory to me. An ice sheet, such as is forming on our coast, seemed to be freezing in my heart. 'Suppose that this—this bride—be ugly, disagreeable, low-minded—what then!' I exclaimed. I seemed to have made up my mind that she will be something of the sort.

"Our friends at home act with discretion, and always with prayer," said Anna. 'Fritz's father is probably well acquainted with the future bride of his son.'

"Sister Juliet, are you ready?" cried the pastor's voice at the door. 'I have come to escort you to the igloes.' This means a hut in the Esquimaux tongue.

"I had lost all inclination to go, and felt inclined to defer my visit, but did not like to shrink from my engagement, as no excuse rose to my mind. 'I am perfectly ready,' I said.

"Why, child, you are forgetting your shawl, your hood, your fur gloves. You will be frost-bitten if you have nothing warm besides that seal-skin jacket!" cried Anna.

"I went to my room, and fortified myself against the biting cold without, but not against a chilly feeling within.

"I do not care to describe the igloe; of course it was full of smoke, which made one see everything as through a dense fog. I knocked my head on entering against what I suppose was the winter supply of fish, dry and perhaps frozen. I made out that there was a bundle of what seemed like old clothes in a corner; this, I was told, was the sick person whom I had come to visit. The women gathered around me to stare, vulgar savages that they are! One put out her dirty hand to stroke my fur, and a child wanted to finger my charms! I hate being touched by their unwashed paws! I did not attempt to speak, and could scarcely endure waiting in that stifling atmosphere till the pastor had finished his long prayer. Fritz's bride has no rose-strewn path before her!

"Now you will give her a word?" said Brother Wilhelm, turning toward me.

"A word! I could not have spoken in Esquimaux at that moment to save my life. 'I have nothing to say, I want to go home,' I cried, and hurriedly made my way to the door, followed by the astonished pastor.

"When we came out we found Fritz waiting at the low door.

"What did you think of your visit?" he asked, with his bright smile. It provoked me, I felt so thoroughly out of temper with myself and with all the world.

"A disgusting hovel!" I cried; 'I could not bear the smoke and the smells!'

"You will kindly make allowance for people who necessarily can rarely change their skin-made garments, and remember that ablutions become difficult in water from which you have to break a thick coating of ice. Did you notice my pretty little favorite Ruth?"

"I saw nothing pretty," I said.

"Oh, the place was dark; you must see the baby!" cried Fritz, and bending his tall form, he managed, I do not know how, to get through the door which even the Esquimaux could hardly enter erect. Fritz quickly emerged again, with a little fur-clad baby, laughing and crowing in his arm. He is wonderfully fond of babies.

"What say you to my little brown cherub?" cried he.

"A bear's cub, a little horror!" I said, and hurried away, but not so quickly that I did not see Fritz's look of pained disappointment.

"I hastened back to the house, entered my room, and flinging myself on the bed, gave way to a passionate burst of tears. I have not wept so bitterly since the dreadful night when I lost Maria.

"I hardly know the cause of my utter misery. Perhaps it is partly my disappointment at finding that, however I may resolve to improve, I am as bad, nay, much worse than ever. It seems to me that I have not a friend in the world. If my sisters ever felt my supposed death, they will by this time be quite reconciled to my loss. Here I only give trouble and annoyance, and lessen the comforts of others.

"Fritz thinks me a selfish, heartless girl. I am certain that he is disappointed in me. He is hoping that his bride will be utterly unlike the proud society lady. Oh, this weary, weary world! and yet I dare not wish to quit it. I shrink from passing through the ebony door; to me there is no brightness beyond. Very true is that proverb which I met with somewhere: 'I like it makes a bad finger-post.' I have always gone where it pointed, and whither has it brought me at last?"

While Juliet was sobbing in her little chamber, a cloud of very real trouble was overshadowing her Moravian friends. Pastor Wilhelm had found an Esquimaux messenger from another station awaiting his return, the bearer of tidings which fell on him with the force of an unexpected blow. He went at once to the partner of all his joys and sorrows, and before the pastor uttered a word she saw from his face that he had brought bad news.

"What has happened?" asked Anna.

Pastor Wilhelm sat down beside her, and a deep sigh broke from his lips before he replied: "A messenger has just come from Bethabara. He brings us tidings almost as heavy as those which came to Job. The small-pox is raging in the station; every day brings a death. Brother Johanan," again he sighed, "has been called to his rest."

Sister Anna's placid face grew very pale. She saw that her husband paused, that not the whole tale of woe had been told; more sorrow, she felt sure, was behind. "Let me know all," she said, faintly.

"Our poor Brother Hans has lost his dear wife."

Then the eyes of Anna overflowed, for she had lost one who was to her as a sister; but all the words that she uttered were: "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good. She was ready for the blessed, blessed change."

"Now you see, my dear wife," said Wilhelm, "that both Fritz and I are needed, sorely needed. Brother Hans is in great grief; there are three funerals to be seen to and sick folk to be nursed."

"I see, I see," said poor Sister Anna. "Fritz can do much, but he cannot do all; and as poor Hans loves you as a brother, none on earth can comfort him like you." Sister Anna was very much inclined to burst out crying, but she did not give way to the inclination.

"Will you part with me?" said the husband, tenderly laying his hand on that of his suffering wife.

"If the Lord calls you, I cannot say nay," replied Anna; "He will guide you through the danger, and guard you—". The poor wife could not finish this sentence, she was thinking of the terrible cold, frost-bites, wolves, bears, and infection.

"There is just one thing that troubles me, and makes me hesitate," said the pastor, looking anxiously at his partner. "You are ill, you cannot so much as rise; how can I leave you here all alone?"

"You forget Juliet," said Anna, trying to smile. Pastor Wilhelm looked graver than before.

"That young woman is a sorrow to me," he said; "I fear that she has neither the fear of God nor the love of His saints. She is quite of the world."

"We must not be hard on the child," said Anna.

"I would be hard on no one," said the pastor; "but I cannot but entertain fears regarding her state. Here is Juliet Erle, rescued from the sea like Jonah almost by a miracle as he was, and she thinks of nothing but her worldly goods. She despises our poor native brethren; she looks upon them as if they were vermin." It was evident that Juliet's conduct on that day had touched the Moravian pastor on a very sensitive point.

"We must make all allowance for one brought up to a gay city life," observed Anna. "I never despair of Juliet; I know that she has a kind heart." Pastor Wilhelm shook his head with an expression of doubt. "She has done many a little act of kindness for me," pursued Anna, "and perhaps the Lord will make use of my blindness and helplessness in your absence, dear Wilhelm, as a means of blessing to this poor dear child, whom I love from my heart."

There was no time to say more on the subject, for dinner must be prepared and then eaten at once, for the journey would be tedious, and the moon would set before midnight.

SOWING AND REAPING.

S. S. Lesson for May 9, John 4:27-42. Golden Text, ver. 37. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Common Mistake—The Example of Constant Guidance—The Disciples' Urgency—An Answer Misunderstood—Puzzled Christians—The First Trophy of a Class—The Call to Reap—The Harvest Field Extended—The Cost of Liquor and Gospel Work—The Power of Intercession—The Samaritan Woman Reaping.

OUR precious Lord saw more in His talk with the Samaritan woman than any one else could have seen. He knew that a soul had passed from death unto life. The disciples, who had gone into the city to buy food, marvelled on their return, that He was talking with the woman; He had been so weary that they, in His place, would have found a good excuse for remaining silent. There are many of God's children who look upon which comes from man, and every apparent opening which offers, as though it were a distinct call from God. But this is a grand mistake. One of Satan's most successful devices is to get really earnest Christian workers into this snare, to make them work beyond the strength which God has given them, and so to take them out of the work. On the other hand, he tempts some workers to think that every bit of weariness, every feeling of disinclination, is to be yielded to, and so, in fact, that the physical feelings of the body are to override all the work to which God calls us. Our blessed Lord says, "Follow Me." He accepted the moment-by-moment guidance of His Heavenly Father. "The Lord God hath opened Mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back" (Isa. 50:5). "As My Father hath taught Me, I speak these things" (John 8:28, 29). "I do always those things which please Him." He did not act upon His own judgment, but upon His Father's; and thus went forward to do, not His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him (John 6:38), leaving all the responsibility with His Father. It is neither safe to act under pressure from others, nor yet on our own judgment of our physical or spiritual capacity. If we will to know His will, He will make it known to us (John 7:17). If we yield ourselves to God as living sacrifices, we shall "prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" (Rom. 12:1, 2). Perhaps also the disciples may have marvelled because they had some idea of the character of the woman with whom He talked, and they did not yet understand how He was "come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke 19:10). But they did not question Him; it was impossible to doubt that the Saviour was in some way occupied with His work of salvation.

The disciples, remembering in what a state of fatigue and exhaustion they had left Him when they went into the city, "prayed Him, saying, Master, eat." Oh, how little they understood His answer, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of!" He was rejoicing in the birth of a soul to be a channel of the Holy Ghost, a light-bearer in a world of darkness, and His heart was up in heaven, glorying in the joy of God. The disciples were altogether on earth, and their thoughts rose no higher; they said one to another, "Hath any man brought Him aught to eat?" Our loving Lord was not impatient at the question; He expected nothing impossible from those who were not yet filled with the Holy Ghost. He said, to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work." It was a spiritual and physical strength to Him to do the will of His Father. And as we come to understand how good, and acceptable, and perfect the will of God is, we also experience a real strength and health in our whole being in doing that will. Oh, how many there are whose nerves are worn out in a perpetual worry to discover the will of God! Their minds are always on the work. "Is it this?" or "Is it that?" and the more they think and reflect the more puzzled they become. So would any child who, instead of coming frankly up to his father, and listening to his directions, should try to puzzle out in his own not very comprehensive mind what the will of his father would probably be. God is a Father, and He wants His children to know His will; but He can only make it known as we are still before Him, ceasing from our own works in trying to find it out because we are so sure that He will find some way to make us understand. Often we are too impatient to give God a chance to speak to us; we think we must know it in a moment; and if God does not make it clear, then we fall back upon our own judgment, rather than wait for His—so did not Jesus. He said once to His brethren, "My time is not yet come: but your time is always ready" (John 7:6). Jesus would neither be before nor after the exact time His Father had appointed for all the work which He had to do.

"MY MEAT IS

THE FIRST TROPHY.

He continued, "Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you. Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest." Could it be that the conversion of this one lost woman should mean so much, that Jesus saw the fields white to the harvest? Yes; for this woman was the first abandoned woman rescued by the Gospel; the law could do nothing for such; stoning was all the provision which the law had made, "but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ; He came not to condemn but to save." This was the first instalment of the many outcasts by man, whom Jesus has yet saved, and by whom He earned the scornful reproof of the Pharisees, "This man receiveth sinners." Jesus knew, too, that this woman's heart was won, and His heart went with her in her frank appeal to the men of the city, "Come, see a Man, which told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?"

"And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal" (Jesus was getting His wages in the exquisite joy of that woman's salvation), "that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together." The one great Sower is Jesus Himself, "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man" (Matt. 13:37). Yet He permits us, as laborers together with Him (1 Cor. 3:9), to be also sowers of the Word, knowing that God alone can give the increase; and His Word declares, "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters" (Isa. 32:20). Yet the distinctive call of Christ to those who believe on Him, is to be reapers rather than sowers. The Holy Ghost is He who convinces of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment (John 16:8), and the Holy Ghost alone can apply the Word of God to the heart of the unsaved. But there is a blessed work of reaping which God gives to the faith of His children who count on Him.

"I SENT YOU TO REAP

that whereon ye bestowed no labor;" there is a blessed gathering of fruit unto life eternal which He permits to His children—nay, lays upon them, when He says: "He that gathereth not with Me scattereth." Jesus calls us to a participation now in the very joy which He had when this woman "passed from death unto life." "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few," said our blessed Lord, when He saw the multitudes, "and was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted, and were scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd." And, again, when He sent forth the seventy to go "into every city and place whither He Himself would come," He said the same thing, and on both occasions added: "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth laborers into His harvest." The harvest is greater now than it was then; the population of the world is vastly increased, and by so much the souls to be saved or lost are increased. How much does the Christian Church labor in the harvest? While the expenditure of Great Britain in intoxicating liquors only is the yearly revenue of Home and Foreign Missions is only $5,000,000. So that if the drink bill of Britain were converted into the treasury of God, $675,000,000 more might be spent in preparing and maintaining Home and Foreign Missions, and in doing good to our fellow creatures! What kind of prayer that God will send laborers into His harvest can that be which has resulted in so little being really done for the salvation of souls? "Take heed, and beware of covetousness," said our blessed Lord. That Spirit which says, "I must keep up my house, I must have all that I have been accustomed to, my business will suffer if I attempt to retrench, so I cannot afford to give to God's work," is surely guilty of covetousness. Jesus has made us each our brother's keeper; we are each, in a measure, responsible for those around us. It is no accident that we are placed side by side in business, family, or church life with those who know not God. He has given to all of us who know Him a power and right to intercede for others, and to be, as He makes the opportunity, sowers and reapers in His harvest. "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." Jesus never contemplated such a thing as a soul saved simply for its own ease and gratification. He saves us that we may be the light of the world, "rivers of living water," "the salt of the earth," gatherers with Christ, instruments of righteousness, fellow-laborers with God. True, "one soweth and another reapeth," but only that "he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together."

When the newly-saved woman went with her testimony into the city, those to whom she spoke "went out of the city, and came to Him." "And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on Him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did." Thus this new reaper gathered many souls the first day of her conversion, perhaps as a first-fruits of the greater work done in the city of Samaria, through Philip, after the death of Stephen, when "the people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did. . . . And there was great joy in that city" (Acts 8:6, 8). The Samaritans who came out to Jesus "besought Him that He would tarry with them." A Jew would have no dealings with Samaritans lest he should lose caste. But this could never hinder Jesus; he did nothing from policy; He abode with them two days; and a blessed work was done. "Many more believed because of His own Word; and said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying; for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."

"I SHALL BE SATISFIED."

BY REV. I. M. DRAKE.

I shall be satisfied when I awake
In the full brightness of the coming day;
When all the shadows that life's sorrows make
Like morning mists shall rise and flee away.

I shall be satisfied when I am done
With sowing tear-steeped seed on barren soil,
And I shall see the nobler life begun,
Where weariness is not, nor work is toil.

I shall be satisfied when I awake
From fevered slumber and from mocking dreams,
And through the clouds the endless morn shall break

Across the fadeless fields and living streams.

Yet more than all, I shall be satisfied
When I shall waken in His likeness there,
In heart and life as wholly purified,
Freed from this heavy weight of sin and care.

Robert Galloway, New York:
My Dear Sir: The crayon of myself, ordered two weeks ago by my wife, was received in good order to-day. I must say that both the portrait and the large bronze frame give entire satisfaction.
They are all a marvel of cheapness. I have not a word of fault to find. I have also had some of my parishioners who are artists examine them, and they have spoken very highly of the work. I shall order crayon of my wife next week and fac-simile frame.

Yours truly, G. R. ROBINS,

RAMBAUD'S RUSSIA.

RAMBAUD'S Illustrated Hist. of Russia from the Earliest Times to 1877. Translated by L. B. LANG. Complete in two large 12mo volumes. Long Primer type, with numerous fine illustrations and maps. Fine cloth, gilt tops, Library style. $1.75.

The cheapest edition heretofore obtainable has cost $6.00 (less than two years ago it cost $18.00); this new edition, which is really the BEST that has been published for popular use at any price, therefore places this magnificent work for the first time within reach of the masses.

"Rambaud's is doubtless the best history of Russia in any language. M. Rambaud is admitted to stand at the head of European authorities on his chosen subject, is familiar with the whole mass of documentary and official materials, has a large acquaintance with Russian literature, and has skillfully assimilated vast stores of information into an orderly and vigorous narrative. Russian history begins almost in myth, proceeds into a wilderness of conflicting traditions, and emerges into a clear light only in comparatively recent times. It is studied with imposing personalities and darkened by hideous crimes; striking events make it dramatic; the sufferings of a great people lend it pathos; the unrest of the present hour and the uncertain outlook for to-morrow invest it with deep interest. M.
Rambaud puts the reader's mind fully in train to consider the situation of the hour. Altogether, this is a work that may be read uniformly with profit and often with interest; an authority that may be consulted with confidence; filling an important place on the historical shelf."—The Literary

The Rt. Hon. A. W. PEEL, Speaker of the British House of Commons—The Premier Proposing Home Rule.

MR. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL.

THE gentleman whose portrait as Speaker of the British House of Commons accompanies the picture of the memorable scene of April 8th in that assembly is the youngest son of the great Sir Robert Peel. He was born in August, 1829, and is therefore now in his fifty-seventh year. He was elected member of Parliament in 1865 by the little town of Warwick, and has been re-elected at every subsequent election, though on every occasion an effort has been made to wrest the honor from him. The constituency has recently been enlarged by adding to it an adjacent town; but the new constituency at the last election confirmed the choice of the old borough.

On his entering Parliament he was cordially received by Mr. Gladstone, who was warmly attached to his father and took a friendly interest in the son. Sir Robert Peel, the eldest son of the great statesman, is a man whom Mr. Gladstone for the same reason was disposed to befriend, but unhappily he proved unworthy of his name. Utterly frivolous and eccentric, he showed incapacity in every position in which he was placed by the Liberal party, and has now sunk out of public notice. Mr. Arthur Peel, on the contrary, has grown in public favor. Mr. Gladstone appointed him successively to several minor offices, the most important of which was the Under Secretaryship of the Home Office. In all of them he displayed marked ability, modesty, and painstaking industry.

ELECTED SPEAKER.

The dignified and responsible office of Speaker of the House of Commons fell vacant two years ago by the resignation of Mr. Brand, who was raised to the peerage. When the question of a successor was discussed Mr. Gladstone proposed the election of Mr. Arthur W. Peel, and as the followers of Mr. Gladstone were in a majority in the House his candidate was elected. The salary attached to the office is $25,000 a year and a magnificent residence in the Houses of Parliament. Mr. Peel was too modest a man to mistake the motive which had prompted his nomination and election. Speaking from the chair of the House for the first time, he said: "I know very well how much I am indebted above all things—it would be unnatural in me if I did not avow it in the face of this House of Commons—for the favor which the House has thus far shown me, to the fact that I am the son of a statesman whose history and whose labors are identified with the story and the debates of this House, whose public services are indelibly written in the records of his country, and whose name is warmly cherished in a multitude of British homes."

It is by no means an easy task to preside over an assembly in which party feeling runs high, and in which there are inevitably questions of order to be decided of an abstruse character. It is a high testimony to Mr. Peel's character that his conduct in the chair during two years gave satisfaction to the members of both political parties. When the new Parliament was elected, at the close of last year, the first duty of the House of Commons was to elect a Speaker, Mr. Peel's occupancy of the chair having terminated, according to the constitution, with the House that elected him. On January 13th, 1886, the first day of the session, a Conservative member proposed the re-election of Mr. Peel, who, by the way, is a thorough Liberal, and a Liberal member (Mr. John Bright) seconded the proposal, which was carried unanimously.

That both parties, after two years of experience of his rulings, should thus unite in re-electing him must have been a compliment very gratifying to Mr. Peel, and it was rendered still more effective by the observation of a Conservative member, who, addressing him on his installation in the chair, said, with a magnanimity rare in a political opponent: "When, nearly two years ago, you succeeded in that chair you were reminded by the right honorable gentleman opposite that much was expected from you. I will venture to say that this expectation has been more than fulfilled. If at that time the name of Sir Robert Peel had any influence in determining the choice of that House, though that name can never be forgotten, yet to-day we choose you on account of the proved merits of the son."

Many quaint customs, relics of the days of the Tudor kings, were observed at the time of Mr. Peel's election. Among them was the custom of asking the Queen's approval of the choice of the House. Though this was done with punctilious regard for the ancient forms, the Commons showed how little importance they attached to the question whether Her Majesty approved or disapproved of Mr. Peel as their Speaker by seating him in the chair and going on with their business without waiting for royal indorsement. But when the Royal Commission turned up in the House of Lords Mr. Peel duly went to receive the Queen's message. In accordance with the old custom, he said: "Her Majesty's most faithful Commons have, in the exercise of their undoubted rights and privileges, proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their choice has fallen upon myself, and I now present myself at your bar and humbly submit myself for Her Majesty's gracious approbation." That having been accorded, Mr. Peel added, also according to old formula: "It is my duty on behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, to lay claim by humble petition to Her Majesty to all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially to freedom of speech in debate, to freedom from arrest of their persons and servants, and particularly to free access to Her Majesty whenever occasion shall require, and that the most favorable construction shall be put upon all their proceedings." That also was promised, and the Speaker went back to the House of Commons to resume his duties.

A MEMORABLE SCENE IN PARLIAMENT.

THE illustration on the preceding page represents the scene on April 8th when Mr. Gladstone proposed in the House of Commons to grant to Ireland the boon which her representatives have been so long demanding—the right to legislate for herself. Never in the recollection of this generation of Englishmen has the excitement of that night been equalled. As the building does not contain seats for all the members of the House of Commons, there was a rush to secure them early in the day. Though the House would not commence proceedings before half past four in the evening, one member put in an appearance at five o'clock in the morning and secured a seat by putting his hat upon it, after which he spent the intervening hours in the library and restaurant. By seven o'clock there were thirty members who had similarly taken care that they should have a good place in the evening, and after that there was a continuous stream of arrivals.

The galleries reserved for spectators more or less distinguished were crowded as soon as they were opened, the United States Minister, Mr. Phelps, being conspicuous in the gallery reserved for eminent personages, seated beside the Queen's son-in-law, Prince Christian. Every square foot of space held a human being. The Prince of Wales, his son, Prince Albert Victor, and the Duke of Cambridge also occupied seats in the front row. The ladies' gallery is screened from a too open view from the main floor by a delicate fretwork in wood; but behind this lattice could be seen the Princess of Wales and the Princess Beatrice. There also were the Countesses Roseberry and Spencer, Lady Cavendish, widow of the Phoenix Park victim; Mrs. Gladstone and her bride daughter, Mrs. Drew.

The reception of Mr. Gladstone outside of the House of Commons was most impressive. Dense crowds stood for hours in a pouring rain waiting for him to come. It has been many years since the Queen has heard such cheers as thundered all the way from his residence to the House. As he rode beside his wife, bareheaded, bowing his thanks from an open carriage, and holding an umbrella, the crowd became so enthusiastic that it forced its way past the police and filled the palace yard after him, cheering fervently.

AN OVATION.

He found the House densely crowded when he arrived. The members were amusing themselves by cheering distinguished men as they entered and in conversing in animated tones with each other. During a momentary lull in the confusion of cheers the House was suddenly startled by a wild cry. It came from the throats of those who were first to catch sight of Mr. Gladstone gliding toward his seat from behind the Speaker's chair. The Irish members sprang to their feet as one man, and for several minutes the uproar of enthusiastic applause continued.

It was 4.35 o'clock when the Speaker called upon Mr. Gladstone to take the floor. Mr. Gladstone rose and met with the most prolonged outburst of cheering ever heard in the House of Commons. He was evidently deeply impressed by the reception. When he was finally permitted to speak his first words were inaudible to the reporters. His voice, it was feared, was not equal to the great task before him. But it was not that. Mr. Gladstone was in a state of amazement, caused, no doubt, by the unexpected character of his welcome. This, however, quickly disappeared, and when he had spoken a few sentences he "found his voice." Until then the serious and settled melancholy characteristic of the man's appearance, his age, and his undoubted physical weakness, tended to give a very much exaggerated idea of the hoarseness of his voice, and the hearers' sympathies being with the venerable orator, the voice grated on the ear. But as soon as Mr. Gladstone steadied himself to his task, his voice grew even, clear, strong, and eventually penetrating, ringing, sonorous, and captivating.

THE VETERAN.

Listening to him without seeing or knowing him in the middle of his speech, a stranger would easily suppose the voice was that of a sound, impassioned man in the full vigor of the prime of life. Even the natural stiffness of old age—Mr. Gladstone is seventy-six—gradually gave way to a flexibility in movement, an animation in manner, an energy and fire of utterance that were amazing in themselves but which did not strike the auditor as anything but matters of course, so gradually and imperceptibly did the fires of the "Grand Old Man's" eloquence light him up.

Every sentence had been evidently carefully considered. He spoke of law presenting itself to Ireland in a foreign garb, and repeated this sentiment more than once, each time amid vociferous Irish cheers. He argued that England makes her own laws and the Scotch theirs, but Ireland was not allowed to do so. Then he proceeded to develop his plan, stating that the problem was how to reconcile the imperial interests with the diversity of legislatures. He contended that Ireland had Parliaments for hundreds of years without separation. He showed that the colonies have independent legislatures without involving separation, and also drew analogies from Sweden and Norway and Austria-Hungary.

He then said outright, amid deep silence, that his proposal was to set up a Parliament in Dublin under the authority of the Imperial Parliament. As he made this momentous declaration the crowd might have heard a pin drop all over the House. He declared that the unity of empire must not be placed in jeopardy, and the political equality of the whole country must be maintained. His gestures were very animated, and once something occurred which any superstitious person present might regard as an omen of ill. By accident, instead of thumping the box before him, he struck the mace, which is the symbol of the authority of the House, and nearly upset it, poised as it was on a balance. His followers cast frightened looks upon him, when he patted it gently, as if to assure it that he meant no harm, and continued his speech.

He went on with wonderful elaboration and skill to describe the composition of the proposed legislature, which is to consist of two orders sitting in the same chamber, one possessing a property qualification, the other elected on a popular basis; the legislature not to touch anything affecting the crown or its inheritance, or to have any power over the forces of defence or any interference with foreign and colonial relations. All this was worked out with great minuteness of detail. At this point the orator showed symptoms of weakness, which was also felt by the audience, although the members kept fast in their places. The Prince of Wales and his eldest son never budged, and only two or three persons went out. After taking some of the yellow mixture which he always carries to the House with him when he intends to make a long speech, and which is supposed to be composed of the yolk of eggs, the orator gave his peroration, which he partly read, every division of his subject being packed in different wrappers. As he finished one he put it back into a little box and took out another.

His conclusion was delivered with much emphasis and solemnity, and he sat down amid tremendous cheers. He spoke for three hours and twenty-five minutes. As the speech was cabled verbatim to New York, and was printed the next morning in all our great cities, our readers are doubtless familiar with all its details, a summary of which appeared in this journal on April 15th.

THE FUTURE.

Whether the proposal will be enacted it is impossible to predict. It is certain that not only by Mr. Gladstone's opponents, but by a large and influential section of his own party, it is vigorously opposed. In its present form it is not wholly acceptable to the Irish members themselves, though they clearly recognize how large is the boon it proposes to confer on their country. They see, however, that it is better not to have Home Rule at all than to have it hampered by restrictions which would cause its failure. It is understood that they will vote for the bill and endeavor to remove the obnoxious restrictions when it is examined clause by clause in its later stage. There are indications, too, that if it passes the House of Commons it will be rejected by the Lords, whose consent is necessary to the enactment of every law. If, however, it passes the Commons by a decisive majority, it will be sent to the Upper House a second time should they reject it at first, and as they are too prudent to obstinately oppose the will of the Lower House, they may be expected to yield eventually, if they do make a wry face at the bitter dose.

As we know from prophecy, and as has been repeatedly pointed out in these columns, the ultimate separation of Ireland from England may be looked for in the near future. Cæsar's Roman Empire is to be re-established in its form of a federation of ten kingdoms, and as England belonged to that empire, and Ireland never did, we cannot but conclude that England will not drag Ireland with her into the federation. The time of the setting up of that ten-kingdomed confederation is evidently near at hand, and this proposal of separation between Great Britain and Ireland is only one of many signs of its approach.

The Reduction of Foreign Postage Rates is a project favored by Lord Wolverton, the British Postmaster-General. Some time ago Mr. Heaton, a member of Parliament, introduced a motion in the House of Commons urging the British Government to negotiate with foreign governments with a view of securing a universal rate of two cents for every letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight. The motion was defeated in the House of Commons, but he has been informed by Baron Wolverton that he has a similar scheme, although it does not go to the extent of Mr. Heaton's project. The present rate is five cents, the half ounce to all countries included in the Latin Union.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Crippled, but Still Singing.—Sergeant Mather who fought in the Soudan campaign, said: "After a bloody battle I saw a man sitting on the ground, with his arm blown away, and notwithstanding his excruciating suffering, was singing: 'My Jesus, I love Thee, I know Thou art mine.' A doctor approached him, and was about to bind up his wounds, when he said: 'Do not mind me, doctor, the Lord Jesus and I are friends, and there are many dying on this battle-field who cannot say that: go and attend to them for the sake of their perishing souls.' After some delay the poor, unselfish fellow got his wounds dressed, and was lifted into the ambulance wagon. When placed there, he said: 'I am dying, rejoicing in Jesus my Lord.'"

From a Military Hospital to Heaven.—"I recollect once going into a military hospital where two young soldier lads lay. I saw that fever was doing its awful work, and that the hand of death was upon them. 'My boy, you are suffering greatly,' I said to one of them, laying my hand on his burning forehead. 'Yes, sir; but I am happy, very happy,' he said. 'What makes you happy?' I asked. 'Jesus is mine, and I am His,' he said. Turning to the other, I asked, 'And are you also happy?' 'I am,' he said. 'And does your happiness spring from the same source?' 'From the same source,' he repeated. Must there not be something in this Gospel after all when these two young men, lying in a foreign hospital and dying of a painful malady, without friends or any one to cheer their last hours, both declaring that they were happy because they could say, 'Jesus is mine.'"

A Merchant's Estimate of Life.—A Remarkable instance of devotion to secular business was mentioned in our hearing lately. It was that of a merchant who was overtaken by a succession of grievous misfortunes, beneath which most men would have utterly given way. His business failed, and he became bankrupt. Just then his wife died, and he himself was stricken with paralysis. His state was such that his doctor said, "If you entirely leave business for a year you may live, but not otherwise." He replied, "Life is not worth living if I cannot attend to business," and he had himself carried in a chair to his office, from which he did not absent himself for a single day. Such indomitable perseverance naturally had its reward. He lived, got through his difficulties, and regained prosperity. The zealous Christian may adopt the saying of this man, with one alteration. He may say, "Life is not worth living if I cannot attend to my Father's business," and if he acts in the spirit of that saying he will be sure not to live in vain (1 Cor. 11:58).

Singular Pilgrimage of a Hindoo.—"In India at one time I was marching my company between Allahabad and Benares, when I could see by the gray morning light the company before me suddenly divide, and when coming to the same spot with my company I ascertained the cause—a man lying stretched upon the ground, face downward. We passed on, but in a few moments the bugle sounded a halt, and I, Scotch-like, turned back to ask the man why he lay there. 'I am going to Benares,' he replied. 'What are you going to do there?' I asked. 'I am going to see my god,' was the reply. 'Where have you come from?' I then asked. 'From Allahabad, and I am going to Benares to see my god.' 'And have you travelled all that way?' I asked, for it was about one hundred and thirty miles. He raised himself from his lying posture, marking as he did so, with a small stick, his length upon the ground, again laying himself down, putting his toes to the mark which he had made, and then went on to explain that he had not come on foot, but that he had travelled from Allahabad in the position in which we found him, by measuring his length on the dusty road, and that he was going to Benares in this manner, a distance of between four and five hundred miles. That man was working for salvation, and oh, I can now look back with deep regret that I could not point that poor Hindoo to Him who has said, 'I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life,' for I did not then know the power of God unto salvation. But, dear friends, if you still turn a deaf ear to all entreaties to accept Christ, that poor heathen will rise up in the judgment against you."

A Human Bog.—"The Other Day I Was reading about a lady of whom it was doubtful if she were really a Christian. Two friends were talking of her on one occasion, when one of them asked if she, the lady of whom they were speaking, were a Christian. 'Oh, yes,' said the other, 'but she is what we call a bog. Perhaps you will not understand me, but as a bog is a piece of marshy ground that takes in all it can get, but never gives out, so this wet swamp becomes very unwholesome, and a very ugly, boggy place, because it retains all it gets but gives out nothing. So our friend is like this marshy bog. She goes to church, to meetings, to lectures, and to any other place where she thinks she may derive any good, but she never has been known to give out any of what she has received.' And, dear friends, I fear she does not stand alone. There are many such Christians, always getting but never giving, who act out the words of Cain, 'Am I my brother's keeper?'"

A Mother's Character.—Coming Home from years of study abroad a young man, one evening, in conversation with his only surviving parent, shocked him with a sneer against the religion of Christ. Not a word of reproach came from the lips of the grieved father. He took his little lamp and went to his chamber. All night that young sceptic heard the tramp of the feet of his sleepless father, and the sound was a knell of sorrow, the cause of which he well knew. In the morning the father brought to his son the well-known Bible of a sainted mother, and desired him to read and compare its teachings with the memories of her life. He read, and found a tear-stained and deeply underscored verse, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Conviction seized him. The beauty of his mother's character, the patience, purity, and fidelity she had shown, were convincing evidences of the unspeakable superiority of Christian character over the hollow fruits of scepticism. He cast away the toils of the tempter, knelt in lowly prayer, and consecrated his life and his splendid talents to Christ, and has since been instrumental in leading many to the same all-sufficient and ever-gracious Saviour.

"There is Something in It!"—The Rev. Mr. Calder said: "At one time, on my way to Aberdeen, I sat in the same compartment with a man and his wife. On entering into conversation with him I learned that he did not believe in God and emphatically declared he had no faith in Christ. I drew from my travelling bag a few tracts, and handed one to him and one to his wife. The man glanced carelessly at it and then threw it out of the window. His wife read hers in silence, and then said: 'There is something here for me.' 'Something for you?' repeated her husband; 'what do you mean?' 'Yes,' continued his wife, 'it tells me that God so loved the world that He gave His only Son that I should not perish.' 'Give it up,' demanded her husband, stretching out his hand for the tract. 'No,' she said, 'I am going to read it again.' He became curious, thinking it must be something else. With the promise that he would return it, she gave him the tract. After reading it carefully over two or three times he handed it back, saying: 'Well, there is something in that.' I tried once more to open up the conversation, but he would not be drawn into it, so we finished our journey in silence. About a year after this I had occasion again to be in Aberdeen, and while there, in a meeting one night, this man came in, and coming up to me he said: 'Yes, there was something in it, 'For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' I now know the joy of having passed from death unto life.'"

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 2, 1886.*

"It came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord."—II CHRON. 5:13.

The Diamond Necklace of the Earth—The Grandest Musical Festival—Where Music was Born—A Lunatic's Song—God's Love of Music—I. The Importance of Music—Its Value in War—Tunes with Ancestral Associations—Singing to a Scotch Soldier—A Spanish King Exorcised—II. Obstacles to its Progress—Superstition—Fear of Criticism—A Fourth School of Music—A Burning Question—Praising by Proxy—Quarrelling Choirs—Music in the Family—National Songs.

THE temple was done. It was the very chorus of all magnificence and pomp. Splendor crowded against splendor. It was the diamond necklace of the earth. From the huge pillars crowned with leaves of flowers and rows of pomegranate wrought out in burnished metal, down even to the tongs and snuffers made out of pure gold, everything was as complete as the God-directed architect could make it. It seemed as if a vision from heaven had alighted on the mountains.

A GRAND FESTIVAL OF MUSIC.

The day for dedication came. Tradition says that there were in and around about the temple on that day two hundred thousands silver trumpets, forty thousand harps, forty thousand timbrels, and two hundred thousand singers; so that all modern demonstrations at Düsseldorf or Boston seem nothing compared with that. As this great sound surged up amid the precious stones of the temple, it must have seemed like the River of Life, dashing against the amethyst of the wall of heaven. The sound arose, and God, as if to show that He was well pleased with the music which His children make in all ages, dropped into the midst of the temple a cloud of glory so overpowering that the officiating priests were obliged to stop in the midst of the services.

There has been much discussion as to WHERE MUSIC WAS BORN.

I think that at the beginning, when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy, that the earth heard the echo. The cloud on which the angels stood to celebrate the creation was the birthplace of song. The stars that glitter at night are only so many keys of celestial pearl on which God's fingers play the music of the spheres. Inanimate nature is full of God's stringed and wind instruments. Silence itself—perfect silence—is only a musical rest in God's great anthem of worship. Wind among the leaves, insect humming in the summer air, the rush of billow upon beach, the ocean far out sounding its everlasting psalm, the bobolink on the edge of the forest, the quail whistling up from the grass, are music.

While visiting Blackwell's Island I heard coming from a window of the lunatic asylum a very sweet song. It was sung by one who had lost her reason, and I have come to believe that even the deranged and disordered elements of nature would make music to our ear, if we only had acuteness enough to listen. I suppose that even the sounds in nature that are discordant and repulsive make harmony in God's ear. You know that you may come so near to an orchestra that the sounds are painful instead of pleasurable, and I think that we stand so near devastating storm and frightful whirlwind we cannot hear that which makes to God's ear and the ear of the spirits above us a music as complete as it is tremendous. The Day of Judgment, which will be a day of uproar and tumult, I suppose will bring no dissonance to the ears of those who can calmly listen; although it will be as when some great performer is executing a boisterous piece of music, he sometimes breaks down the instrument on which he plays; so it may be on that last day that the grand march of God, played by the fingers of thunder, and earthquake, and conflagration may break down the world upon which the music is executed.

Not only is inanimate nature full of music but God has wonderfully organized the human voice, so that in the plainest throat and lungs there are fourteen direct muscles which can make over sixteen thousand different sounds! Now, there are thirty indirect muscles which can make, it has been estimated, more than one hundred and seventy-three millions of sounds. Now, I say, when God has so constructed the human voice, and when He has filled the whole earth with harmony, and when He recognized it in the ancient temple, I have a right to come to the conclusion that God loves music.

THE IMPORTANCE OF MUSIC.

I propose this morning to speak about sacred music, first showing you its importance, and then stating some of the obstacles to its advancement. I draw the first argument for the importance of sacred music from the fact that God commanded it. Through Paul He tells us to admonish one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs; through David He cries out: "Sing ye to God all ye kingdoms of the earth." And there are hundreds of other passages I might name, proving that it is as much a man's duty to sing as it is his duty to pray. Indeed, I think there are more commands in the Bible to sing than there are to pray. God not only asks for the human voice but for the instruments of music. He asks for the cymbal and the harp and the trumpet. And I suppose that, in the last days of the Church, the harp, the lute, the trumpet, and all the instruments of music that have given their chief aid to the theatre and bacchanal, will be brought by their masters and laid down at the feet of Christ, and then sounded in the Church's triumph on her way from suffering into glory. "Praise ye the Lord!" Praise Him with your voices. Praise Him with stringed instruments and with organs.

INSPIRING SOLDIERS.

I draw another argument for the importance of this exercise from the impressiveness of the exercise. You know something of what secular music has achieved. You know it has made its impression upon governments, upon laws, upon literature, upon whole generations. One inspiring national air is worth thirty thousand men in a standing army. There comes a time in the battle when one bugle is worth a thousand muskets. In the earlier part of our Civil War, the Government proposed to economize in bands of music, and many of them were sent home; but the generals in the army sent word to Washington: "You are making a very great mistake. We are falling back and falling back. We have not enough music." Then the Government changed its mind; more bands of music were sent to the field, and the day of shameful defeat terminated. I have to tell you that no nation or church can afford to severely economize in music.

ANCESTRAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Why should we rob the programme of worldly gayety when we have so many appropriate songs and tunes composed in our own day, as well as that magnificent inheritance of Church psalmody, which has come down fragrant with the devotions of other generations—tunes no more worn out than when our great-grandfathers climbed up on them from the church pew to glory? Dear old souls how they used to sing! When they were cheerful our grandfathers and grandmothers used to sing "Colchester." When they were very meditative then the meeting-house rang with "South Street" and "St. Edmonds." Were they struck through with great tenderness, they sang "Woodstock." Were they wrapped in visions of the glory of the Church, they sang "Zion." Were they overborne with the love and glory of Christ, they sang "Ariel." And in those days there were certain tunes married to certain hymns, and they have lived in peace a great while these two old people, and we have no right to divorce them. What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." Born as we have been amid this great wealth of church music, augmented by the compositions of artists in our day, we ought not to be tempted out of the sphere of Christian harmony, and try to seek unconsecrated sounds. It is absurd for a millionaire to steal.

Many of you are illustrations of what sacred song can do. Through it you were brought into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. You stood out against the warning and the argument of the pulpit, but when in the sweet words of Charles Wesley, or John Newton, or Toplady, the love of Jesus was sung to your soul, then you surrendered, as armed castle that could not be taken by a host, lifts its window to listen to a harp's trill.

SINGING TO A SCOTCH SOLDIER.

There was a Scotch soldier dying in New Orleans, and a Scotch minister came in to give him the consolations of the Gospel. The man turned over on his pillow, and said: "Don't talk to me about religion." Then the Scotch minister began to sing a familiar hymn of Scotland that was composed by David Dickenson, beginning with the words:

"O mother dear, Jerusalem,
When shall I come to thee?"

He sung it to the tune of "Dundee," and everybody in Scotland knows that; and as he began to sing the dying soldier turned over on his pillow, and said to the minister: "Where did you learn that?" "Why," replied the minister, "my mother taught me that." "So did mine," said the dying Scotch soldier; and the very foundation of his heart was upturned, and then and there he yielded himself to Christ. Oh, it has an irresistible power! Luther's sermons have been forgotten, but his "Judgment Hymn" sings on through the ages, and will keep on singing until the blast of the archangel's trumpet shall bring about that very day which the hymn celebrates. I would to God that those who hear me to-day would take these songs of salvation as messages from heaven; for, just as certainly as the birds brought food to Elijah by the brook Cherith, so these winged harmonies God sent are flying to your soul with the bread of life. Open your mouth and take it, O hungry Elijah!

ITS SOOTHING INFLUENCE.

I have also noticed the power of sacred song to soothe perturbation. You may have come in here with a great many worriments and anxieties, yet perhaps in the singing of the first hymn you lost all those worriments and anxieties. You have read in the Bible of Saul, and how he was sad and angry, and how the boy David came in and played the evil spirit out of him. A Spanish king was melancholy. The windows were all closed. He sat in the darkness. Nothing could bring him forth until Farinelli came and discoursed music for three or four days to him. On the fourth day he looked up, and wept and rejoiced, and the windows were thrown open, and that which all the splendors of the court could not do, the power of song accomplished. If you have anxieties and worriments try this heavenly charm upon them. Do not sit down on the bank of the hymn, but plunge in that the devil of care may be brought out of you.

It also arouses to action. Do you not know that a singing church is always a triumphant church? If a congregation is silent during the exercise, or partially silent, it is the silence of death. If when the hymn is given out you hear the faint hum of here and there a father and mother in Israel, while the vast majority are silent, that minister of Christ who is presiding needs to have a very strong constitution if he does not get the chills. He needs not only the grace of God, but nerves like whalebone. It is amazing how some people with voice enough to discharge all their duties in the world, when they come into the house of God have no voice to discharge this duty. I really believe that if the Church of Christ could rise up and sing as it ought to sing, that where we have a hundred souls brought into the kingdom of Christ there would be a thousand. "How was it in olden time? Cajetan said: "Luther conquered us by his songs."

OBSTACLES TO PROGRESS.

But I must now speak of some of the obstacles in the way of the advancement of this sacred music; and the first is, that it has been impressed into the service of superstition. I am far from believing that music ought always to be positively religious. Refined art has opened places where music has been secularized and lawfully so. The drawing-room, the musical club, the orchestra, the concert, by the gratification of pure taste, and the production of harmless amusement, and the improvement of talent have become very forces in the advancement of our civilization. Music has as much right to laugh in Surrey Gardens as it has to pray in St. Paul's. In the kingdom of nature we have the glad fiffing of the wind as well as the long metre psalm of the thunder. But, while all this is so, every observer has noticed that this art which God intended for the improvement of the ear and the voice and the head and the heart, has often been impressed into the service of error. Tartini, the musical composer, dreamed one night that Satan snatched from his hand an instrument, and played upon it something very sweet—a dream that has often been fulfilled in our day, the voice and the instruments that ought to have been devoted to Christ, captured from the Church and applied to purposes of sin.

Another obstacle has been an inordinate fear of criticism. The vast majority of people singing in church never want anybody else to hear them sing. Everybody is waiting for somebody else to do his duty. If we all sang, then the inaccuracies that are evident when only a few sing would be drowned out. God asks you to do as well as you can, and then, if you get the wrong pitch or keep wrong time, he will forgive any deficiency of the ear and imperfection of the voices. Angels will not laugh if you should lose your place in the musical scale, or come in at the close a bar behind.

A FOURTH SCHOOL.

There are three schools of singing I am told—the German school, the Italian school, and the French school of singing. Now, I would like to add a fourth school, and that is the school of Christ. The voice of a contrite, broken heart, although it may not be able to stand human criticism, makes better music to God's ear than the most artistic performance, when the heart is wanting. I know it is easier to preach on this than it is to practice; but I sing for two reasons—first, because I like it, and next because I want to encourage those who do not know how. I have but very little faculty in that direction, and no culture at all, yet I am resolved to sing though every note should go off like a Chinese gong. God has commanded it, and I dare not be silent. He calls on the beasts, on the cattle, on the dragons to praise Him, and we ought not to be behind the cattle and the dragons.

OPPOSING TASTES.

Another obstacle that has been in the way of the advancement of this holy art has been so much angry discussion on the subject of music. There are those who would have this exercise conducted by musical instruments. In the same church there are those who do not like musical instruments, and so it is organ and no organ, and there is a fight. In another church it is a question whether the music shall be conducted by a precentor or by a drilled choir. Some want a drilled choir, and some want a precentor, and there is a fight. Then there are those who would like in the church to have the organ played in a dull, lifeless, droning way, while there are others who would have it wreathed into fantasies, branching out in jets and spangles of sound, rolling and tossing in marvellous convolutions, as when in pyrotechnic display you think a piece is exhausted it breaks out in wheels, rockets, blue lights and serpentine demonstrations.

Some would have the organ played in almost inaudible sweetness, and others would have it full of staccato passages that make the audience jump with great eyes and hair on end as though by a vision of the witch of Endor; and he who tries to please all will succeed in nothing. Nevertheless, you are to admit the fact that this contest which is going on in hundreds of the churches of the United States to-day, is a mighty hindrance to the advancement of this art. In this way scores and scores of churches are entirely crippled as to all influence, and the music is a damage rather than a praise.

PRaise BY PROXY.

Another obstacle in the advancement of this art has been the erroneous notion that this part of the service could be conducted by a delegation. Churches have said: "Oh, what an easy time we shall have. The minister will do the preaching, and the choir will do the singing, and we will have nothing to do." And you know as well as I that there are a great multitude of churches all through this land, where the people are not expected to sing. The whole work is done by delegation of four, or six, or ten persons, and the audience is silent. In such a church in Syracuse, an old elder persisted in singing, and so the choir appointed a committee to go and ask the squire if he would not stop. You know that in a great multitude of churches the choir are expected, and do all the singing, and the great masses of the people are expected to be silent, and if you utter your voice you are interfering. There they stand, the four, with opera-glass dangling at their side, singing, "Rock of Ages, cleft for me," with the same spirit that the night before on the stage they took their part in the "Grand Duchess" or "Don Giovanni."

Now, in this church, we have resolved upon the plan of conducting the music by a precentor. We do it for two reasons, one is that by throwing the whole responsibility upon the mass of the people, making the great multitude the choir, we might rouse more heartiness. The congregation coming on the Sabbath day feel that they cannot delegate this part of the great service to any one else, and so they themselves assume it. We have glorious congregational singing here. People have come many miles to hear it. They are not sure about the preaching, but they can always depend on the singing. We have heard the sound coming up like "the voice of many waters," but it will be done at a better rate after a while, when we shall realize the height, and the depth, and the immensity of this privilege.

QUARRELLING CHOIRS.

Another reason why we adopted this plan. We do not want any choir quarrels. You know very well that in scores of the churches there has been perpetual contention in that direction. The only church fight that ever occurred under my ministry, was over a melodeon in my first settlement. Have you never been in church on the Sabbath day and heard the choir sing, and you said: "That is splendid music." The next Sabbath you were in the church, and there was no choir at all. Why? The leader was mad, or his assistants were mad, or they were all mad together. Some of the choirs are made up of our best Christian people! Some of the warmest friends I have ever had have stood up in them, Sabbath after Sabbath, conscientiously and successfully leading the praises of God. But the majority of the choirs throughout the land are not made up of Christian people, and three fourths of the church fights originate in the organ-loft. I take that back and say nine tenths. Many of our churches are dying of choirs. Let us, as a church, give still more attention to the music. If a man, with voice enough to sing, keep silent during this exercise, he commits a crime against God and insults the Almighty.

Music ought to rush from the audience like the water from a rock—clear, bright, sparkling. If all the other part of the church service is dull do not have the music dull. With so many thrilling things to sing about, away with all drawling and stupidity! There is nothing that makes me so nervous as to sit in a pulpit and look off on an audience with their eyes three fourths closed and their lips almost shut, mumbling the praises of God. During my recent absence I preached to a large audience, and all the music they made together did not equal one skylark! People do not sleep at a coronation. Do not let us sleep when we come to a Saviour's crowning. In order to a proper discharge of this duty, let us stand up, save as age, or weakness, or fatigue excuse us. Seated in an easy pew we cannot do this duty half so well as when, upright, we throw our whole body into it. Let our song be like an acclamation of victory. You have a right to sing. Do not surrender your prerogative.

MUSIC IN THE FAMILY.

We want to rouse all our families upon this subject. We want each family of our congregation to be a singing-school. Childish petulance, obduracy, and intractability would be soothed if we had more singing in the household, and then our little ones would be prepared for the great congregation on Sabbath-day, their voices uniting with our voices in the praises of the Lord. After a shower there are scores of streams that come down the mountain side with voices rippling and silvery, pouring into one river, and then rolling in united strength to the sea. So I would have all the families in my church send forth the voice of prayer and praise, pouring it into the great tide of public worship that rolls on and on to empty into the great, wide heart of God. Never can we have our church sing as it ought, until our families sing as they ought.

There will be a great revolution on this subject in all our churches. God will come down by His Spirit and rouse up the old hymns and tunes that have not been more than half awake since the time of our grandfathers. The silent pews in the church will break forth into music, and when the conductor takes his place on the Sabbath day, there will be a great host of voices rushing into the harmony. My Christian friends, if we have no taste for this service on earth, what will we do in heaven, where they all sing and sing forever? Let me prophecy in regard to any one here who has no delight in the worship of heaven, if you do not sing the praises of God on earth, I do not believe you will ever sing them in glory. I would that our singing to-day might be like the Saturday night rehearsal for the Sabbath morning in the skies, and might begin now by the strength and by the help of God to discharge a duty which none of us have fully performed.

"Let those refuse to sing
Who never knew our God;
But children of the Heavenly king
Should speak their joys abroad."

Come now, clear your throats, and get ready for this duty or you will never hear the end of this. I never shall forget hearing a Frenchman singing the "Marseillaise Hymn" on the Champs Elysées, Paris, just after the battle of Sedan. I never saw such enthusiasm before or since, as he sang that national air. Oh, how the Frenchmen shouted! Have you ever, in an English assemblage, heard a band play "God Save the Queen"? If you have you know something about the enthusiasm of a national air. Now, I tell you that these songs we sing Sabbath by Sabbath are the national airs of Jesus Christ and of the kingdom of heaven. When Cromwell's army went into battle, he stood at the head of them one day, and gave out the long metre doxology to the tune of "Old Hundred," and that great host, company by company, regiment by regiment, battalion by battalion joined in the doxology:

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise Him all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host,
Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost."

And while they sang they marched, and while they marched they fought, and while they fought they got the victory. Oh, men and women of Jesus Christ, let us go into all our conflicts singing the praises of God, and then, instead of falling back, as we often do, from defeat to defeat, we will be marching on from victory to victory!

CHINESE WOMEN AT HOME.

MISS LANCASTER, of the China Inland Mission, writes: "Chinese women are grave and patient. Of all in the world, there are none to whom a knowledge of the way of salvation would be a more blessed boon, and none more capable of appreciating and using the gift. The homes of the Chinese, the homes of a third of the human race, are windowless, floorless, and ceilingless. They are very hot in summer, very cold in winter, dank and dark all the year round. They are small because of poverty; low, for safety from typhoons; unventilated, because openings would give ingress to the long hooks of thieves; densely crowded together for mutual protection; opening only on tiny courts and narrow streets, where all filth fumes because every iota must be saved for fertilizing the rice-fields. Villages so made up and surrounded by walls to keep out marauders are but a few minutes' walk from each other, all over the land. From such a home, to such a home, a woman is brought and married to a man she has never seen before, to serve a mother-in-law who is kind to her in proportion to her diligence in rearing pigs, and her aptness in bearing sons. The greater portion of the women have seen only the village in which they were born, and that into which they are married. All the world outside is as unknown to them as is the planet Mars. Toward the life to come they look blankly, hoping only that their male descendants will feed their wandering spirits after death with earthly food. As hardly any Chinese women know how to read, as the old women rarely leave their villages, and the young women seldom leave their own houses, the only way to carry the Gospel to 'every creature' among them is to take it by a living voice into their homes. Native sentiment and custom, which is doubtless correct, forbid the doing of this work by men. Women, and women only, may do it effectively. Native social customs permit elderly women to go from house to house, and from village to village, and there is no limit to the number of women who may be reached by such. The selection, training, and superintending native Christian women who do this work, is probably the way in which the foreign missionary lady can effect most in the work of evangelizing Asia.

A SEARCH IN PARIS FOR A BIBLE.

AN interesting letter from the Rev. S. R. Brown is published in the American McAll Record, describing the work being done in the French capital by the McAll missions. In the course of the letter an incident is narrated which shows how dense is the spiritual darkness of even the upper classes in France.

In January, 1885, a wealthy country gentleman went to Paris to enjoy the season. Every night he attended the theatre, or the opera, or a concert. He had been educated at a Jesuit college, but what he had seen and heard had produced in his mind disgust for the priests and their religion. Walking out one evening during his stay in Paris, he passed the Baltimore Hall of the McAll Mission, and, being invited, in he entered. Mr. Brown says:

"At the close of the meeting he gave me his card, and I promised to call upon him. He said: 'You read from a large book. I never heard those words before. What was it?' 'A Bible,' I said. 'A Bible? and would you lend it to me?' I gave him a Gospel. The next week he brought it back. He had sought for the forty-fourth chapter of Isaiah in John's Gospel, and could not find it. He said: 'When I heard you read, I wondered what book it could be. I had never heard such words before, so I determined to buy one. I went to three booksellers in Batignolles, and they had none, nor could they tell me where to find one. So thinking my wife would succeed where I had failed, I got her to go and seek a Bible. She came back saying: 'I cannot get one. It is a bad book, or a forbidden one, or else it is a secret book only used by the ministers.' So he had failed; neither he nor his wife could procure for money in the month of April, 1885, a Bible in Paris. What was to be done? On Tuesday he was at the meeting, and asked me to buy him a Bible. At once I placed one in his hand as a gift. Twice a week he came to the meetings, and walked to the train with me, asking questions. 'Strange!' he said, 'I never heard these things before. I never saw this book before. None of my friends have a copy in their libraries. I am now reading it, weighing every word; and I have learned more from your meetings than from nine years of philosophy taught me by a Jesuit professor.'"

Subsequently at his invitation Mr. Brown visited him at his country mansion, and had the joy of seeing him converted to Christ. Mr. Brown also spoke to large numbers of neighbors whom the hospitable gentleman invited to his house to hear the word, and a work of grace was commenced which bore much fruit.

HAVING HIS OWN WAY.

READERS who have at some time been annoyed by the clamor of badly trained children will appreciate an incident which occurred recently on a Western railroad. It may also suggest a useful reflection to parents who are over-indulgent to their children. A child allowed to have everything he wants is badly prepared for life in a world where he is likely to want many things he cannot have, and has much need of patience. Experienced Christians, looking back over their lives, perceive that their Heavenly Father has not so dealt with them. They see His love and wisdom sometimes most clearly in His keeping from them things they earnestly desired and prayed for (II Cor. 12: 8, 9).

A Boston journal says: "Among the passengers on the St. Louis Express yesterday was a woman very much overdressed, accompanied by a bright-looking nurse-girl and a self-willed, tyrannical boy of about three years.

"The boy aroused the indignation of the passengers by his continued shrieks and kicks and screams, and his viciousness toward the patient nurse. He tore her bonnet, scratched her hands, and finally spat in her face without a word of remonstrance from the mother.

"Whenever the nurse manifested any firmness, the mother would chide her sharply.

"Finally the mother composed herself for a nap, and about the time the boy had slapped the nurse for the fiftieth time, a wasp came sailing in and flew on the window of the nurse's seat. The boy at once tried to catch it.

"The nurse caught his hand, and said, coaxingly:

"Harry mustn't touch! Bug will bite Harry!"

"Harry screamed savagely, and began to kick and pound the nurse.

"The mother, without opening her eyes or lifting her head, cried out, sharply:

"Why will you tease that child so, Mary? Let him have what he wants at once."

"But, ma'am, it's a—"

"Let him have it, I say."

"Thus encouraged, Harry clutched at the wasp, and caught it. The yell that followed brought tears of joy to the passengers.

"The mother awoke again.

"Mary!" she cried, "let him have it!"

Mary turned in her seat, and said, confusedly:

"He's got it, ma'am!"

HIS LAST GAME AT CARDS.

THE following incident is related in the current number of the Sword and the Trowel:

"Two Christian men, who were employed in a large shop in the south of London, sought to live for Christ among their fellow-workmen. They agreed together to stay at the shop every Thursday night after the men had gone to pray for one of them who had ridiculed them. They did so for some months.

"At last, one Thursday evening, just as they were going on their knees, they happened to look across the shop, and saw their opponent watching them attentively. They paused awkwardly, as he approached, and asked what they were doing. 'Why don't you go home,' said he, 'and look after your wives and families?' They were so taken aback that they could not immediately answer. 'Look here,' continued he, 'you can't deceive me. I know what you are about, you are going to pray for me; but do you think your prayers will ever do me any good? Then taking a pack of cards from his pocket, he said: 'Do you see these cards? I am going to such-and-such a place,' mentioning a gambling saloon, 'to spend the evening in smoking, swearing, drinking, and card-playing, and you are going to pray for me, like two great fools.' After he left, the two Christians looked at each other, feeling quite crushed. It was a time of great trial to them; nevertheless, they fell on their knees, and wrestled with God for the conversion of this man, who seemed worse than ever.

"The man, true to his word, went to the saloon and commenced the evening's amusement; but after playing a few games, feeling very uncomfortable, he packed away his cards, and walked up Newington Butts. As he was passing Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, he heard singing, and he went up the steps, and listened near the door. Some one said: 'Come inside, there's plenty of room; Mr. Spurgeon is going to preach.' He accepted the invitation, listened attentively to the word; and on leaving the building he was a new man in Christ Jesus."

CRAZY ABEL'S HEROISM.

AN incident related by Mr. Halston in the New York Times shows that love and gratitude may nerve even a nature almost destitute of intelligence to self-sacrifice of a heroic character. That a man should voluntarily give himself to die that one whom he loved might live excites wonder and admiration in all who hear of it, even in those who hear unmoved how the Redeemer died for His enemies (Rom. 5: 7, 8). The essence of the story, as given to Mr. Halston by an old army officer, is as follows:

In the days of the gold fever of '49, in a regiment which was holding the Mexicans in check, was a man known as "Crazy Abel." He had once been smart and bright, but a fever which had prostrated him a short time before left him an intellectual wreck. He was, however, quite harmless, and was useful in doing odd work about the camp. He went about with a chronic smile on his face, and though rather idiotic was kind and gentle. One day a coarse brute of a man, who came to the camp, in a drunken rage attacked Abel, and ill-used him severely. Abel bore it patiently and did not attempt to defend himself, but an officer who witnessed the assault pulled the brute off Crazy Abel and taught him a good deal about the virtues of a leather strap as an instrument of discipline.

Some time afterward the officer was sent to a distant station with a despatch, and Crazy Abel, who, ever since the officer had protected him, had followed him about with dog-like devotion, went with him. It was not considered a dangerous mission, so the officer took no precautions. Suddenly in a wild part of the road there was an ambush, and the officer and Crazy Abel were captured. The captors were the brute, whom the officer had punished for abusing Abel, and a companion as desperate as himself. The two prisoners were carried to the top of a high rock, and there the officer was bound while the two captors exulted with demoniac glee over the tortures they meant to inflict upon him. Crazy Abel seemed regardless of what went on. His chronic smile did not leave his countenance; he seemed quite as content as though at the camp mess table. He was held loosely by one of the men while the other sneered and taunted the officer. At last the brute raised his rifle and pointed it at the officer's breast. In an instant Crazy Abel shook himself free and hurled the man who was holding him over the rocky precipice. Then with a rush that seemed like the flash of a sunstreak through the air Crazy Abel threw himself upon the body of that man who but one moment ago had terrible vengeance within his very reach. It was a vain effort that he made to withstand the assault. He toppled and fell. Crazy Abel's arms were about him. Clapsed together the two went down the precipice together and were dashed to pieces. Crazy Abel had given his life for his friend. It was afterward found that the name of the devoted fellow was Abel Anderson, a New Yorker, who had spent his childhood and youth on the Catskills.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

In a letter written recently by the Rev. J. H. Brookes, D.D., of St. Louis, to a friend in England, he refers to the political agitation now disturbing that country, and says:

"The one comfort about it is that these are the predicted signs which precede and usher in the Coming of our Lord. Even now we find everywhere upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and waves roaring, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth. It is no better on our side of the sea than on yours. There are now nine thousand railroad men in this State on a 'strike,' and the wheels of commerce are completely blocked over an immense territory. A morning paper, which now lies on my table, says that there are fifty-one thousand laboring men at this moment on strike throughout the country, and their ranks are increasing every hour. The sky over here is as dark as it is in England, and when your countrymen, who imagine that a Democratic form of government is a panacea for all the ills to which flesh is heir, shall have tried the experiment, they will probably discover that they have jumped out of the frying-pan into the fire. There is but one possible solution of the difficult problem, and that is the Coming of our Lord."

The doctor might have added that the troubles in this country, like those in England, are the natural and direct result of misconduct. God works always by law, and neither here nor in England is there ground for complaint. God has fulfilled His promise: "The curse causeless shall not come" (Prov. 26:2). We have stood aside and allowed capitalists to oppress the working-men. Some of the railroad-men have for years had to work sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. If we had interposed to protect them from oppression, all would have been well. We failed in our duty, and now when they combine to defend themselves they do it clumsily, violently, and with infinite inconvenience to the public. In England the Parliament stood aside for generations, and allowed landowners to oppress their tenants; now the agitation threatens to dismember the empire.

A HEREDITARY DISEASE CURED.

The following facts, in connection with a Christian worker well known in New York, show how, without the use of means, God honors the faith of those who take their sicknesses to Him for healing:

Mrs. Clara S. Whitney was some years ago afflicted with an incurable disease inherited from her mother. She consulted physicians at Hartford, Conn., where she resided, and afterward she came to New York to consult other physicians here. They were in both places of the same opinion, that the disease was constitutional and could not be eradicated. She had some conversation with Mrs. Boardman, the wife of the late Rev. W. E. Boardman, who urged her to go to the Lord for healing. She prayed about it for some three weeks with her friend, but there was no improvement. Then she prayed for submission to the Lord's will, and became resigned to die or to live and suffer, as He thought best.

She was afterward led to decide on going to Boston to see Dr. Cullis and ask him to pray for her healing. She was so weak and ill on the morning when the journey to Boston was to be taken that her husband was opposed to her going, and urged her to abandon it. She persevered, however, but as the time drew near she became so much worse that it seemed as if she would die. She lost consciousness for a time, and she herself thought she was dying. On coming to herself she was conscious of a strange change in her condition. Her fingers, which had become numbed and discolored, resumed their natural appearance, and new life seemed to be running through her body from head to foot. "Oh, I am healed—I am well!" she exclaimed. "There is no need to go to Boston now. The Lord has healed me." It was so, and she immediately ate a hearty meal, which before she had been unable to do, and the disease left her never to reappear.

A life of faith and Christian service commenced from that day. Mrs. Whitney sold all she had and distributed to the poor. Subsequently she came to New York, and has been a means of blessing in many ways in the city. In visiting the sick and praying with them, in laboring for the rescue of fallen women, and in teaching and evangelizing she has spent her time, depending on the Lord for her support, which has always been supplied.

TEN COMING GREAT EVENTS.

SIXTH EVENT.

THE coming of Christ peacefully in its first stage to raise to life deceased Christians, and to take them up together with watchful living Christians to meet Him in the heavens—constituting the first-fruits ascension—is clearly fore-shown in the prophecies to occur shortly previous to the three and a half years of great tribulation and anti-Christian persecution, which is the latter three and a half years of the covenant seven years.

This is an undoubted article of faith with many expositors; and some conclude from a very minute inspection and careful comparison of the prophecies that this first stage of will occur about five years and two months before the end; or, more exactly, two years and from one to three weeks after the date of the seven years' covenant.† To this point of time, therefore, Christians may look with peculiar interest, at the same time maintaining unslumbering watchfulness in the interim.

There is much reason to believe that "a commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem" will be promulgated 69 weeks of days—i.e., 483 literal days before this second advent of the

* Reprinted from articles published in 1873.

† As the ascension of Christ (the personal man-child) occurred in 36 to 38 A.D., about 1862 years before the end (which will be between 1898 and 1900), and also the year-day fulfilment of the Seals (including the 1260 years of the Papal and Mohammedan Antichrists) began then; so the ascension of the watchful Christians or Wise Virgins (the mystical Man-child) will occur about 1862 days before the end, and the literal day fulfilment of the Seals (including the 1260 days of the personal infidel antichrist), and of the prophesying of the Two Witnesses, and the 5 months of the demon locust scorpion woe, and the 13 months of the demon horsemen woe, will also begin then (Rev. 12:5, 6, 9, 11).

Now 1862 days (or about 5 years and 9 weeks) before the end will of course be 733 days (or about 2 years and 2 weeks) after the date of the seven years' covenant, because the whole period from the date of the covenant to the end will be exactly 7 years and 73 days—i.e., 2595 days (Dan. 9:27; 12:11, 12), which is 1862 + 733 days—hence the ascension of watchful Christians will be about 2 years and 2 weeks after the Covenant, or allowing a margin of a week on each side of that point of time, in order to avoid too minute precision, we may safely affirm it to be 2 years and between 1 to 3 weeks after the Covenant.

The ensuing 5 years (in general terms) from this Ascension until the end is also typified by Joseph manifesting himself to his brethren 5 years before the end of the 7 years' famine (Gen. 45), and by Moses being mysteriously removed to heaven 5 years before the Israelites fully inherited the promised land (Deut. 34; Num. 14:30-33; Josh. 19:7-10). The number of 5 wise and 5 foolish virgins may also convey a further hidden intimation of 5 years of abundant blessing during the raising of the Midnight Cry by the wise virgins, followed by 5 years of spiritual famine during the shutting out of the foolish virgins from Christ's presence between His advent in the air and on the earth. The 7 good kine and ears and 7 lean kine and ears denoted 7 years of abundance followed by 7 years of famine (Gen. 41:26, 27).

Messiah in the air, according to the reduplicated literal day fulfilment of Dan. 9:25. "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks." The first stage of Christ's coming is specially described in the two following texts:

"The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then (epeita, afterward) we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord."

"Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trump shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

TWO STAGES.

These two passages might convey at first sight the impression that all living Christians will be changed to incorruption, and caught up to meet their coming Lord at exactly one and the same moment; but further explanatory details in Revelation show that they will be caught up in two distinct ingatherings or companies—an earlier first-fruits ingathering of 144,000 Watchful Christians,* and then, after an interval of considerably more than three and a half years, a later harvest ingathering of an innumerable great multitude of Laodicean Christians,† and this interval of more than three and a half years between the two ingatherings is the whole period of the Lord's Second Coming, which is thus one continuous, progressive event, including in its development a variety of subordinate events.

SEVENTH EVENT.

An earnest and world-wide preaching of the Gospel of the kingdom to all nations, accompanied by a Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit, fulfilling the First Angel Message and First Seal in Rev. 14:6; 5:2; Joel 2:28-32, will follow the First-Fruits Ascension of 144,000 Watchful Christians to heaven (who may then return to assist in the preaching) and will continue for several months or more, and be succeeded by two Angel Messages (Rev. 14:8, 9).

EIGHTH EVENT.

Universal and sanguinary war will then rage during the second Seal for several months further on, just before the three and a half years' Great Tribulation, and the ten kingdoms will become Papal Red-republics, as described in Revelation 17. The Seven Trumpets, as well as the Seven Seals,‡ commencing in their literal fulfilment about this time, will inflict dreadful woes and plagues and sore judgments on the nations until the end of the three and a half years' Tribulation (see Rev. 6 to 17). One cause of these dreadful wars on earth will be the war in heaven by Michael against Satan, and the casting down of Satan and his angels to this earth; whereupon, after several months' raging, he will energize Antichrist to persecute Christians for a time and times, and half a time—that is, the final three and a half years. The fearful warning is then given:

"Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, for the devil has come down unto you, having great wrath because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Rev. 12:7-14).

Most of the Christians left after the translation of the Wise Virgins on earth will be miraculously removed to and hidden and fed in a wilderness; but any subsequent converts, who will not thus escape, will be slain by Antichrist during the three and a half years. (Read Rev. 12.)

* Rev. 14:4; 12:5; 3:10; 4:5; Matt. 25:10; 24:38-41; Luke 17:28-30; 21:36; 1 Thess. 5:3-5. The fourteenth chapter 144,000 are a company of Christians translated to the celestial Mount Zion, and seen in heaven before the three and a half years' tribulation, which is then described in the rest of the chapter, Rev. 14:8-29. But the seventh chapter 144,000 are an entirely different and distinct company of Jews found on earth, and sealed and converted after the three and a half years' tribulation, which is previously described under the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th seals.

† Rev. 14:15; 7:9; 3:19; 11:18; Matt. 24:30.
‡ The exact relative positions of the 7 seals, 7 trumpets, and 7 vials are very fully explained in the book "Forty Coming Wonders," by Rev. M. Baxter.

DR. TALMAGE'S sermons, published week by week in this journal, are verbatim reports taken by Dr. Talmage's own reporter, and are authorized and revised by Dr. Talmage for publication in our columns. It is necessary to repeat this statement, because we are informed that some of our readers have been misled by an advertisement, which has appeared in a large number of journals, so worded, by accident or design, as to imply that no reports of the sermons are authorized by Dr. Talmage, but those which appear in the pages of a local monthly periodical.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Proposal to Establish a Department of Labor was made last week, in a bill introduced in the House by Mr. Springer. The business assigned to the department in the bill would be to collect and diffuse information on the subject of labor in relation to capital, the hours of labor, earnings of men and women, and the means of promoting the material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity of the working-classes. It proposes, also, that within the department shall be such a commission as the President recommended in his recent message. One Commissioner, with two assistants, to be appointed by the President, to be charged with the duty of considering and settling by arbitration, when possible, all disputes between capital and labor. It is to investigate such disputes, whether invited to do so or not by parties to the dispute.

The River and Harbor Bill Under Discussion this year, appropriates $15,120,700. Every year this bill is a worthy subject for minute examination. There is no question that more than fifteen millions might be wisely expended on the rivers and harbors, but this bill is a fair specimen of the wisdom which has been exercised upon it. Classified by States and Territories as nearly as practicable by assigning a proportionate share of certain items to each of several States covered by some items like those for the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Missouri rivers, the distribution of the items in the bill is as follows: Maine, $149,000; New Hampshire, $8000; Vermont, $15,000; Massachusetts, $164,000; Rhode Island, $94,000; Connecticut, $151,000; New York, $875,000; New Jersey, $240,000; Pennsylvania, $385,600; Delaware, $117,500; Maryland, $132,500; Virginia, $416,500; North Carolina, $206,500; South Carolina, $341,000; Georgia, $355,500; Florida, $375,500; Alabama, $668,500; West Virginia, $256,100; Ohio, $478,000; Indiana, $207,500; Illinois, $640,000; Michigan, $918,500; Wisconsin, $435,500; Minnesota, $550,000; California, $362,500; Oregon, $702,000; Mississippi, $500,500; Louisiana, $595,500; Texas, $950,000; Kentucky, $1,170,500; Arkansas, $578,500; Tennessee, $526,000; Missouri, $1,065,000; Montana, $25,000; Washington Territory, $14,500; Dakota, $2000; Kansas, $100,000; Iowa, $295,000, and Nebraska, $35,000. The committee which is responsible for the bill, consists of fifteen members. The fifteen States they represent get ten millions of the fifteen it is proposed to appropriate.

The Constitutional Change Allowing the President to veto portions of a bill without vetoing the whole has been unfavorably reported by the House Judiciary Committee. The object of the proposed change was to prevent the practice known as log-rolling, which has been fruitful in increasing public expenditure. It is managed by an agreement between legislators for mutual support, one promising to vote for an appropriation of which he does not approve, on condition that some one else votes for an appropriation which he does want to have passed. The Committee's report indicates that its members are cognizant of the evil, but think that it would not be remedied by the proposed Constitutional amendment.

An Effort to Help the Mormons by Having the Edmunds act declared unconstitutional, was made last week in the United States Supreme Court, by Mr. George Ticknor Curtis. He appeared for Lorenzo Snow, who has been convicted of polygamy under the Edmunds act, by the Territorial Courts, and has now appealed to the United States Court for redress. There appears to be no contention on the merits of the case. Under the Edmunds law, Snow has, it is admitted, been justly convicted; the only escape for him, therefore, is in the possibility of the Supreme Court declaring the law unconstitutional. Mr. Curtis gave a history of the Mormon Church from its foundation, and declared that it was because the Mormons were not known or understood that the American people wanted to stamp out what is termed this monstrous evil. Popular belief is the exact opposite of this contention. The case is being watched with intense interest.

An Ovation to Jefferson Davis of a Very enthusiastic character was tendered by Alabama citizens last week. Mr. Davis went to Montgomery to lay the corner-stone of the monument to the Confederate dead. It is twenty-five years since, in the same city, he took the oath of office as President of the Confederate States, and in the hearty welcome he received that fact was not forgotten. The city was gayly decorated, and the Stars and Stripes floated from every flagstaff. Cannons were fired in salute, and an immense concourse of citizens assembled to do honor to their old leader. The speeches made by Mr. Davis were naturally in defence of secession, and, of course, produced one or two demonstrations of indignation in the North when they were published by the press. It was, however, generally regarded as a significant fact, bearing evidence of the stability of the Government that the demonstration and the speeches could be made with perfect freedom. There was, too, abundant proof in spite of the affectionate admiration manifested toward Mr. Davis, of loyalty to the Union and pride in our common country. In no other land on earth could such an event have been celebrated without apprehension of trouble.

The General Strike for Eight Hours as a day's labor commenced in Chicago on May 1st. On that day it was estimated that at least forty thousand workmen were on strike in that city alone. So extensive a strike paralyzes many industries, and all business will be seriously crippled by the inability of the railroads to handle freight. Of the forty thousand strikers, twelve thousand are lumbermen, and it is an ominous feature of the movement that anarchists are directing their efforts to these men. They openly urged them to burn the lumber-yards, if their demands were not granted. The agitation extended to St. Louis and other cities, but it is in Chicago that excesses are to be looked for. The employers of the lumbermen have agreed together to resist the demands of the men, but in other trades a more conciliatory disposition has been manifested, and in some few cases the demand of eight hours has been granted. A monster mass-meeting was held in New York on Saturday night, to express sympathy with the Chicago strikers. Fully sixteen thousand persons were present.

The Strike on the Third Avenue Railroad of New York was not settled last week. Both the company and the men maintained their uncompromising attitude. The company succeeded in running a few of its cars, by employing green hands, and importing drivers and conductors from other cities. The strikers did not interfere with the former, but when a driver or conductor showed that he was accustomed to the work, an effort, which was generally successful, was made to induce him to leave his work and join the strikers. The company promised the public to run its cars during the evening and night according to custom, but the promise was not kept. It had not sufficient drivers, and the two policemen who are sent on each car involved too heavy a drain on the force for night work. The cars, therefore, ceased running at six o'clock each night. Five members of the Executive Board of the Drivers' and Conductors' Union have been indicted for conspiracy in organizing the strike. This proceeding has tended to embitter the struggle.

Wholesale Conflagrations, the Work of Incendiaries, are reported from the Austrian provinces. The town of Friedland, in Moravia, has been almost totally destroyed by fire, during the progress of which ten persons were killed. The towns of Dobrowlany, Bojaniec, and Chyrow have been completely destroyed, and the town of Sanok has been greatly damaged. At Chyrow a man was caught in the act of setting fire to a building. The discontent of the peasantry is general. One European correspondent says: "The West Galician peasants also have cause for disaffection. They have for centuries past been wretched and down-trodden, but, being little better than animals, their Polish rulers have managed to keep them under their heel. They earn barely enough to exist, and they are scarcely represented, even indirectly, in the local Diet. Seventy-five per cent of them can neither read nor write, and most of them are repulsively filthy." Nihilistic and Socialistic agents have for some time been busy among them, and they find in the ignorant, desperate men, the material best adapted for their purposes. In the mines and the petroleum wells the workmen are ripe for a rebellion. They have been oppressed and cheated out of their earnings.

The Opposition to Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule scheme for Ireland is apparently to be led by the Marquis of Hartington, the Premier's former colleague. He will, of course, be supported by Conservative votes in the House of Commons, but the Conservatives shrewdly prefer that the leader of the opposition to the scheme should be a conspicuous Liberal. Lord Hartington has promised to oppose the bill on its principle, instead of attacking its details. In the course of a speech delivered in Lancashire on April 26th, he said, "That no alterations would remove the objections to the Irish scheme. He did not wish to coalesce with the Tories, but hoped, with the assistance of Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Goschen, Sir Henry James, Mr. Bright, Earl Selbourne, Earl Derby and the Duke of Argyll, to create an independent party or to induce the withdrawal of the measure." He was addressing the men who elected him to Parliament, and he had an intimation of their opinion at the close of the meeting when, after listening to his speech, explaining why he opposed Mr. Gladstone, his constituents passed a vote of confidence in that statesman. On analysis of the House of Commons it appears that 248 members are definitely committed in favor of the bill, 307 are pledged to oppose it, and 114 have not stated their intentions. The political prophets predict that the bill will pass its second reading by a majority of not less than twenty and not more than thirty.

Mr. Gladstone's Manifesto. Published on Monday last in the English journals, is an eloquent, almost a pathetic appeal to the public for a fair and unbiassed consideration of his Home Rule scheme. Mr. Gladstone gratefully acknowledges the encouragement he has received from Washington, Boston, Quebec, and other cities on this side the Atlantic. He describes his effort as an attempt to solve, "once for all, the long-vexed and troubled relations between Great Britain and Ireland, which exhibits to us the one and only conspicuous failure of the political genius of our race to confront and master difficulty and to obtain in a reasonable degree the main ends of civilized life." He shows that he understands the character of the opposition to his scheme in a trenchant paragraph. It is, he believes, in the main the opposition of the rich landowners and their connections. That is "the point at which the dividing lines are drawn. On the side adverse to the Government are found, as I sorrowfully admit, in profuse abundance, station, title, wealth, social influence, and the professions, or the large majority of them—in a word, the spirit and power of class. These are the main body of the opposing host. Nor is this all. As the knights of old had squires, so in the great army of class each enrolled soldier has a rôle of dependents. The adverse host, then, consists of class, and the dependents of class." Realizing that fact, it is probable that if Mr. Gladstone is defeated in Parliament he will dismiss the present House and ask the people to send him a House in which station, title, wealth, and social influence are not so largely represented as they are now. The lords and even the throne itself have reason to dread what such a House might do. Mr. Gladstone's letter will win for him unstinted public admiration on this side the Atlantic. On the other side it will probably be denounced as an effort to set class against class.

An Interesting Struggle in Telegraph Monopoly is being fought. Until recently all the cable companies had combined to keep up the rates of cable messages, and absorb competitors. They fixed the rate at sixty cents a word. When the Mackay-Bennett cable was laid, that line charged forty cents a word. The combined companies, failing in their attempt to force the new line to amalgamate with them, are now trying to freeze it out by charging a rate of twelve cents a word. The reason of the reduction is so obvious that the Mackay-Bennett people have refused to compete at a loss, and, relying on the public understanding the situation, have reduced their rates to twenty-five cents a word only. The striking workmen may find amusement in watching a conflict of capitalists with capitalists.

The Death of the Rev. Charles F. Robertson, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Missouri, occurred on May 1st. He was stricken with apoplexy, two months ago, and was never afterward able to rise from his bed. He was fifty-one years old, having been born in New York City, March 2d, 1835. He was graduated from Yale in the Class of '51. He was ordained in 1862, and assumed charge of the parish at Malone, N. Y. In 1868 he was assigned to Batavia, and on September 5th of the same year was chosen Bishop of Missouri.

A New Church Home has Been Acquired by the congregation of which the Rev. A. B. Simpson is pastor. The building in Twenty-third Street, New York, known as The Gospel Tabernacle, where the recent Conference on Faith-Healing was held, and which the church has hitherto occupied, has grown too strait for it, and was in some respects unfitted for its use. The church to which the congregation removed last Sunday is on the corner of Madison Avenue and Forty-fifth Street. It is the building which became painfully notorious through the country last year by the long struggle waged there between Dr. J. P. Newman and the officers and members of the church. Dr. Newman's resignation was at length secured, but it became necessary to sell the building owing to the painful feelings which the long conflict had engendered among the members. Mr. Simpson's friends have purchased the edifice for $126,000, of which sum $26,000 has been subscribed, and $100,000 remains on mortgage.

A Dead Body was Attached in Jersey City, N. J., on April 27th. On the previous day a man who resided in Stapleton, S. I., went to visit a friend in Jersey City, and spent the day with him. He was returning home late in the evening, when, it is supposed, he was seized with sudden illness, which terminated fatally. His dead body was found on the outskirts of the city the next morning. A Stapleton undertaker received instructions to fetch the body and have it decently interred, but on going to the Morgue for it, he found that it had been attached for a debt of fifty-four dollars which the man had contracted some years ago. The undertaker consequently could not get it. As the man had no property of any kind, it may be presumed that the creditors will have to rest content with the body in satisfaction of their claim unless his friends redeem it. The expectation of their doing so was probably the motive in issuing the attachment. That is of little importance to the man himself. The only matter that concerns him now is whether during his life he had availed himself of the redemption of his soul which Christ achieved for him (Gal. 4 : 4, 5).

A Vow of Silence was Kept for Seven Years by a lady who died recently in St. Luke's Hospital in San Francisco. The Chronicle of that city, which records the death, states that the vow had its origin in the rupture of a marriage engagement. In 1879 the lady, who was young and beautiful, became engaged to a young sea-captain. The match was opposed by her family, who intercepted the correspondence between the young people and succeeded in estranging them. The young lady discovered the plot and became violently incensed against her relatives. She bitterly upbraided them for what they had done, and in a paroxysm of rage she vowed that she never would again open her lips in speech. For over seven years she kept her vow, and even on her death-bed the efforts of her friends to induce her to break her silence were futile. As her relatives gathered around her death-bed, her sister, with tears in her eyes, implored her to break her vow, if only to say good-by. The two brothers added their entreaties, but to all appeals she was obdurate. When her brother attempted to smooth her pillows she strongly dissented, but allowed a nurse to do it, and seemed grateful. A few moments after she breathed her last, having carried her resentment to the bitter end. How much pain she must have endured in keeping her sinful vow none can tell, but probably quite as much as she inflicted on her relatives. The indulgence of a vindictive spirit, like other forms of sin, works its own punishment (Prov. 8 : 36).

A Senator's Escape from an Alligator is Reported in the Baltimore Herald. It states that Senator Camden, of West Virginia, who is staying in Baltimore, has been enjoying a tour in Florida, where he came near losing his life. He had passed a day in hunting and had secured a considerable bag of game, when, being hungry, he halted by the side of a creek and seated himself on a friendly log to enjoy a lunch of cold chicken which he had taken with him. When he had finished his repast he took the long pocket-knife he had used to carve the chicken and drove it into the log, intending to let it rest there while he got his pocket-handkerchief to wipe his hands. The next instant the Senator was several yards away lying almost senseless on the ground, while on the bank of the creek was an alligator twenty-eight feet long, its eyes glaring and its teeth grinding savagely. In its back the Senator could see his knife still sticking, and he realized instantly what had happened. It was a sleeping alligator and not a log on which he had been sitting, and his present condition was due to a blow from the creature's tail when he awoke it by driving his knife into its back. Happily for the Senator, the alligator seized the bag of game and, content with that, backed into the creek, leaving him to make good his escape. His horror as he thought of how he had sat on the creature's back resting and eating all unconscious of his peril, made him sick as well as thankful for his escape. It is such a feeling of horror and thankfulness combined that the Christian has when he thinks of the time when he lived in sin unconcerned, yet liable at any moment to sink into the jaws of hell (Ps. 124 : 6, 7).

A Dog Saved a Child's Life in Cincinnati on April 22d. The Commercial Gazette of that city reports that as it was growing dusk a horse-car came rapidly along Sixth Street, and was crossing Plum Street when the driver and a number of bystanders were horrified at seeing a little child fall and roll over upon the track immediately in front of the wheels. The driver used every effort to stop the car, but it was impossible to stop in time to save the child then. But just as the wheel was about to touch the child a dog leaped forward, and, catching the child by its clothing, pulled it off the track. How the animal could have understood the child's danger and his own power of saving it cannot be explained, but the act showed a high degree of intelligence in the dog. If there were more of that spirit in human beings there would be large numbers of young people snatched from a fate worse than death, but they are left to perish while the world looks on indifferent about their danger (Ps. 142 : 4).

The United States as a Penal Colony are growing in favor in Europe. Last week information was received in New York from our consul at Barmen, in Germany, that an habitual criminal had been shipped to this port. The consul learned that the man's expenses on the voyage had been paid, and provision made to pay him two hundred marks on his landing. Two burgomasters had contributed to the fund. Their motive was not one of kindness to the man, but to their country, which would be well rid of him. He has been imprisoned, with few intervals of liberty, since 1863, and whenever he was released he immediately commenced a career of crime which lasted until he was behind the bars again. He has been convicted, at different times and imprisoned for burglary, arson, criminal assault, and highway robbery, and there is good reason for suspecting his guilt of other crimes not brought home to him. The information was timely, and the man was promptly sent back to Germany by the ship in which he came. There is no country on earth that would welcome a man with such a record. He has, however, the supreme consolation that by the infinite mercy of God not even his record would exclude him from the kingdom of heaven if he seek entrance through Christ (1 Cor. 6 : 9-11).

A Judge Proved a Valuable Witness Recently in a suit that was being tried before him in Georgia. The suit was brought to decide the ownership of certain lands in Echols County, to which there were two sets of deeds. They were traced back to a certain deed executed in 1840 by the man to whom the land was originally granted. There was a second deed for the plot of land purporting to be executed by the same man. One of the two deeds, therefore, must be a forgery, and there was a long argument on the question by counsel on both sides. Experts on handwriting were there also as witnesses, and the case seemed likely to be long and difficult. Finally Judge Hansell, who was trying the case, asked to look at the two deeds. As he examined them a peculiar smile spread over his face, and he said: "Gentlemen," holding up one set of deeds, "here are the genuine deeds to this land. I was a young lawyer in those days, and I drew this title myself for the grantor. This other title purporting to have been made by him is a forgery." Amid all the disputes which have agitated the world these many years as to the authenticity of the Scriptures the Christian is unmoved. He knows that at the last great day his confidence will be vindicated by their Author and the Judge of all the earth (Rom. 2 : 16).

LOVE IN THREE POSTURES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Texts : Isaiah 43 : 1-4 ; 43 : 22-24 ; 44 : 21-23.

Addresses on Heavenly Telegrams—Love in Three Texts—I. Love Abounding—Declared Amid Wrath—Shown in Consolation—In Recalling Past Mercies—In Claiming Possession—In Declaring what He Means to do—II. Love Lamenting—Little Worship—Little Fellowship—Not on Speaking Terms with God—III. Love Abiding—Retaining the Double Name—The Precept of Gladness.

WHEN two Christians met together who were sitting under a very lean and starving ministry, one of them comforted his fellow concerning the miserable discourse by saying : "Never mind, my friend, there is not much in the sermon, but the text is a feast by itself." So this morning, if my words should seem to be very poor and powerless, what fulness there is in these three texts ! Here you have a dainty meal of three courses. You ought to be well nourished this morning, for I have set before you in these passages of Scripture quite as much as the largest capacity will be able to mark, learn, and inwardly digest. Here is good pasture for the flock, wherein they may not only feed, but lie down.

Did you say, "too much text" ? Possibly you might, on other occasions, reproach me with having too little of God's Word, and too much of my own ; but there can be no fault the other way—the more of the Word of the Lord the better. What is man's word compared with God's word ? It is as chaff to the wheat at worst, and as mere gold-leaf to solid bullion at best. Indeed, my word is of no value at all, except as it is made up of the essence of the divine Word. Far better than our best exposition is the Word itself ; this is the pure light of the sun, ours is but a poor candle ; of the Scripture itself we cannot have too much. If you derive no other profit from this assembling of yourselves together but to have your earnest attention directed to this precious part of Holy Writ, if the Spirit of God be with you, your meditations will make this a profitable hour.

THE NAMES IN FULL.

Notice concerning these three texts, that they are very much alike in this respect—that they are each addressed to God's people under the names of Jacob and Israel. The first text begins : "The Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and He that formed thee, O Israel." And the second is like unto it : "Thou hast not called upon Me, O Jacob ; but thou hast been weary of Me, O Israel." And so is the third : "Remember these, O Jacob and Israel ; for thou art My servant." The Lord mentions both the natural and the spiritual names of His servants ; and this He does out of love to them. To make sure that the people should know to whom He spake, the Lord calls them both Jacob and Israel. We are so apt to set the promise aside for some one else, that it is well to have the full address placed at the head of these heavenly telegrams.

These texts are also like each other, again, from their being each one overflowing with love. Their manner and their matter differ, but their spirit is one. I do not know where the Lord's love is best seen, when He declares it and tells of what He has done and is doing for His people, or when He laments over their want of love in return, or when He promises to blot out their past sin, and invites them to return to Him and enjoy His restoring grace.

I have to set before you divine love in three postures. The first text represents love abounding ; the second text, love lamenting ; and the third text represents love abiding—remaining constant to its object notwithstanding all the provocations which have grieved it.

I. First, we have in our first text, from the first to the fourth verses,

LOVE ABOUNDING.

You will notice, first, the time when that love is declared. The first verse begins : "But now, thus saith the Lord." And when was that ? It was a time of special sin, and of amazing hardness of heart. "It burned him, yet he laid it not to heart." When a man begins to burn, he generally feels and cries out ; he must be far gone in deadly apathy when he is touched with fire and yet lays it not to heart. Yet so the text describes the nation. Notwithstanding this, however, though His people had so provoked Him, and though they were so unfeeling under His chastisement, yet the Lord interposes in tones of grace with a word of infinite compassion. Though He may smite us again and again to drive us from our iniquities, yet even then His gracious heart overflows with love, and He lets fall a word of

PITY FOR MOURNERS.

Notice, next, that the Lord shows His abounding love in these verses by the sweetness of His consolations. "But now thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and He that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not." "Fear not" is a little word measured by space and letters ; but it is an abyss of consolation if we remember who it is that saith it, and what a wide sweep the comfort takes. Fear hath torment, and the Lord would cast it out. Fear keeps us away from Him, and so He would chase it quite away. "Fear not," saith He. As much as to say—I smite thee, but fear not that I will destroy thee. I chasten thee for thy sin, but fear not that I will disown thee, for thou art Mine. You that are the people of God may at this hour be smarting, and crying, and sighing. But oh, the love of God to you ! He hears your cries, and His compassions are moved toward you. Nothing touches Him like the groans of His children. Perhaps you have brought this evil upon yourself by your own fault, and you know it ; but the Lord is ready to put away your sin, and make the bones which He has broken to rejoice.

Again, notice that the fulness of God's love is to be seen in the way in which He dwells with evident satisfaction upon His past dealings with His people. When we love some favored one, we like to think of all our love passages in years gone by ; and the Lord so loves His people, that even when they are under His chastening hand, He still delights to remember His former loving-kindnesses. We may forget the wonders of His grace, but He doth not forget. The Lord thinks upon you as His dear people, and remembers how He created you, and how He new-created you ; how by His infinite grace He made you new creatures in Christ Jesus, and how He has gone on by His Spirit to fashion you, and mould you to His will, so that you are becoming more and more like His dear Son. The Lord mentions this to show His exceeding love ; He hath respect unto the work of His own hands. He that has made you with so much care will not break you.

FOR THE REDEEMED.

Then the Lord passes on to speak of His redemption of His people, saying : "I have redeemed thee." Oh, the fulness of divine love which led the Lord to redeem His people, and then to speak of that deed with pleasure ! He brought them out of Egypt, redeemed by the blood of the Paschal Lamb ; and in our case He has brought us out of sin and death, by the blood of the Only Begotten. The Lord doth not repent that He paid such a price for such poor worthless things, but He glories in it. "I have redeemed thee." Our Lord Jesus remembers the pangs we cost Him. He cannot leave those to perish in their sins, whom He hath ransomed with His own life. O poor backslider ! the broad arrow of the King is on thee, He cannot let His enemy rob Him of His purchase.

Moreover, He adds : "I have called thee by thy name." He did so to that nation ; but we will dwell rather at this time upon His having personally called us to Himself. Oh, the love which shines in our effectual calling ; it must burn on forever ! There was a day, and we can never forget it, when the Gospel of God came to us with a pointed and personal power, such as we never felt before. Like as Mary Magdalene did not know the Saviour until He said unto her : "Mary," so we did not know the Lord until He called us by our name. As the Lord of old said to little Samuel : "Samuel, Samuel," and he answered : "Here am I," so hath God said to some of us, as clearly as if we had heard it with our ears : "Come to Me," and we have come to Him. He is pleased to remember that He hath called us by our name, and this shows that He does not repent of having called us.

OWNERSHIP.

Observe, also, how He dwells upon His possession of His people : "Thou art Mine," saith He. The Lord God was not ashamed to own His Israel ; and now Jesus is not ashamed to call us brethren ; the Father is not ashamed to call us children ; and the Spirit of God is not ashamed to call our bodies His temples. "I have called thee by thy name ; thou art Mine." Have you forgotten that you are the Lord's ? Yet does He not forget that you are His. You may be false to your covenant and steal yourself from God ; but He has set His mark upon you, and you never can obliterate it. Does not this bring the tears to your eyes ?

If you desire to see the overflows of God's love in another form, notice in the next verse how He declares what He means to do. He says : "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee ; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned ; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." His love casts its eye upon your future. The Lord does not promise you that you shall never go through the waters, nor pass through the fires. He loves you too well to make your way to heaven free from adversity and tribulation, for these things work your lasting good. You will have to go through fire and through water on your way to glory. But He does promise you this : that the deepest waters shall not overflow you, and the fiercest torrents shall not drown you, for this one all-sufficient reason, that He will be with you. He hath said : "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Come life, come death, come temptation, come poverty, come sickness, come assault of Satan, come whatever may, from heaven, or earth, or hell, the Lord has promised that He will bear you through, and preserve you to His kingdom and glory.

Thus, in a very sorry way, I have skimmed the surface of this great sea of love ; I beg you now to follow me while we listen to love as it speaks in quite another tone.

II. Our second text is in the minor key ; it is

LOVE LAMENTING :

"But thou hast not called upon me, O Israel" (verse 22). Observe the contrast ; for it runs all through, and may be seen in every sentence : I have called thee by thy name ; but thou hast not called upon Me, O Israel. I have called thee Mine ; but thou hast been weary of Me. I have redeemed thee with a matchless price ; but thou hast bought Me no sweet cane with money. You can work out the contrast yourself, and you will find it most remarkable ; I cannot tarry to go into detail.

Israel rendered little worship to God. She gave the Lord little prayer and little praise. Come, brothers and sisters, I will bring no accusations against you, but I will make confession of sin for myself. When we think of God's delight in us, and His love to us, is it not shameful that we should have been so seldom engaged in devotion toward Him ? Oh, how slack we have often been in private prayer ! How hurried, how superficial ! How little of praise have we brought ! It takes a world of trouble to drive some of God's children to their Father ; they live without Him, and are tolerably comfortable ; and even when darkness lowers they are slow to run to Him. Alas ! they hasten to some human friend, instead of returning at once to Him who has dealt so bountifully with them. I am not going to dwell upon this, because tender hearts will only need a hint.

Notice, next, that there has been little fellowship ; for the Lord goes on to say : "Thou hast been weary of Me, O Israel." If He had been weary of us we need not have wondered; but we ought to blush and be silent for shame, because we have wearied of Him. Brothers, are we tired of our God? If not, how is it that we do not walk with Him from day to day? Really spiritual worship is not much cared for in these days, even by professing Christians. Many will go to a place of worship if they can be entertained with fine music, or grand oratory; but if communion with God is the only attraction, they are not drawn thereby. They can spend many an evening where all sorts of levity and nonsense waste the hour; but when do they spend an evening with their God? Can any of you say: "I did once spend a night with God"? Is it not, then, true: "Thou hast been weary of Me"? Alas! some of my hearers have never spoken with God in all their lives; they are not on speaking terms with Him; they do not know Him. Small wonder is it that you do not believe in Him; he alone truly believes in God who has come to know Him.

SELF-DENIAL.

Again, the Lord mentions that His people have brought Him little sacrifice: "Thou hast not brought Me the small cattle of thy burnt offerings; thou hast bought Me no sweet cane with money; neither hast thou filled Me with the fat of thy sacrifices." Saints of those times denied themselves luxuries that they might have the high joy of contributing to the worship of the Lord whom they loved. Some saints do this now, and find great delight in it, even as Mary delighted to pour the ointment very precious from her alabaster box upon the head of the Well-beloved. Alas! how little have some done in this direction. I will not dwell upon it; for, as I have already said, a hint is all that is needed by a loving heart. Yet is it not sadly true that many offer to the Lord only that which costs them nothing? If it comes to making sacrifices for the truth's sake they will hear nothing of it.

Once more, it is said that we have been very slack in our consideration of our God. The Lord says: "I have not caused thee to serve with an offering, nor wearied thee with incense; but thou hast made Me to serve with thy sins; thou hast wearied Me with thine iniquities." The Lord is thoughtful of us, but we are not thoughtful toward Him. He considers our feelings, but we treat Him with

HEARTLESS BRUTISHNESS.

Many treat the Lord as if it was most fit that He should be forgotten; they profess to believe in Him, and yet live atheistical lives, unmindful of His presence, regardless of His law. Doubtless many come into His courts unwashed and defiled, having forgotten to seek cleansing through the atonement of His dear Son. They dare to stand before a holy God in their wilful unholiness. Beloved, is it not so?

I must not fail to remind you that I commenced by declaring that in each of the three voices of the Lord the tone was always that of love. If the Lord did not love us very much He would not care so much about our love toward Himself. True love alone knows how to burn with jealousy. How greatly God must love me since I see that He desires to have my whole heart! What condescending tenderness that the Lord of glory should complain: "Thou hast bought Me no sweet cane with money"! It is the plaint of love. Remember, the Lord does not need our sweet canes nor our money. "The silver and the gold are His, and the cattle upon a thousand hills." He says to His enemy: "If I were hungry I would not tell thee." He needs nothing at our hands. But when He chides us for withholding our love-tokens, it is because He values our love, and is grieved when it grows cold.

VALUED GIFTS.

Yonder father does not need anything of his child, and yet when his birthday comes round, and there are whisperings over the house and little contributions, that something may be given to dear father, he is greatly pleased; he is more charmed with the little ones' trifling gift than with the gold he wins on the Exchange. It is sweet to live in the thoughts of those we love. You that are blessed with happy domestic life, you know that in these matters you do not look for bare duty, but the free suggestions of love bear the palm. It is because the Lord loves us so much that He bemoans our lack of grateful affection, and sadly mourns: "Thou hast not called upon Me, O Jacob; thou hast been weary of Me, O Israel." What hath the Lord done that we should treat Him so? O brothers, let us mend our ways!

III. I have now to finish with my third text, which I felt bound to take, lest I should conclude with mourning and lamentation. Our third text exhibits

LOVE ABIDING.

Notice, in the twenty-first verse of the forty-fourth chapter, how the Lord still calls His people by the same name: "Remember these, O Jacob and Israel." Still are the names of His elect like music in the ears of God. One would have feared that He would have dropped the "Israel," that honorable name, which came of prevailing prayer, since they had not called upon Him. Why call him a prevailing prince who had grown weary of his God? We should not have marvelled if the Lord had only called them by their natural and carnal name of Jacob. But no, He harps upon the double title; He loves to think of His beloved as what they were, and what His grace made them. O heir of heaven, God loves you still!

Notice in the text how the Lord claims His servants: "Thou art My servant; I have formed thee; thou art My servant." He has not discharged us, though He has had cause enough for so doing. How often have I prayed: "Dismiss me not Thy service, Lord," when I have seen the faultiness of my obedience! I dwell with supreme pleasure upon that sweet assurance: "Thou art My servant; thou art My servant." He has not turned us out of doors, nor given us our wages and said: "Be packing, I shall never make My money's worth of you." I am sure He will never part with us now; for if He meant to do so, He would have done it long ago. When we grow old and gray-headed He will not send us off, as so many firms have lately done with old servants who had given them their youth and their manhood. No, the Lord will not cast off His people. Even to hoar hairs He is the same. This should bind us to Him. This should quicken our pace in His service. This should make us eager and earnest to show forth His praise.

LOVE TRIUMPHANT.

Notice with delight the triumph of love, how still He pardons: "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins." I have seen the clouds come hurrying up, driven by the wind. They were black as night in the distance, and for awhile they spread darkness around us. Anon, drops of rain have fallen, for an April shower has come; and the clouds, where were they? Not a vestige remained. The clouds were blotted out, the sky was blue, and all things glittered in the sunlight as if hung with pearls. Thus our God beholds our sins gathering like clouds. He cannot endure them; He sweeps them away; no trace is left. "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us." Child of God, thy Lord forgives thee. If thou art ashamed and confounded for all thy shortcomings, He has put them all away. Therefore return unto thy God; return to thy first love; return to all thy former joy, and rise to a still higher joy.

See how our text closes with the Lord's own precept to be glad: "Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it: shout, ye lower parts of the earth: break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein: for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified Himself in Israel." Out of all dejection arise! Out of all sorrow soar aloft! There is more cause for gladness than for sorrow. What you have done should cause distress of heart; but what the Lord has done is cause for rapture. Oh for a well-tuned harp! Oh to be taught some flaming sonnet of pure spirits who are before the throne! Wait awhile, and be not weary. Love the Lord here, and so prepare for beholding Him above. Live after the manner which the whole theme suggests. What manner of persons ought we to be who are so supremely loved! To the glorious name of Jehovah, the God of love, be glory forever and ever! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

"THAT GREAT CITY."

THE following is a vivid description* of the past magnificence and present desolation of Babylon, the city against which the wrath of God went forth:

"Babylon was like another Nineveh. Enormous masses of brickwork covered with pictures in enamel; vast halls ornamented with bassi-relievi, and covered to the ceiling with cuneiform inscriptions relative to contemporary events; houses of three and four stories; fifty streets parallel to or at right angles to the Euphrates, and fields sufficiently large to produce food for the inhabitants in time of siege—all this magnificence overtopped by the temple of Belus, the hanging gardens, and the ramparts—such was Babylon.

"The walls of this gigantic city were three hundred and ninety-eight feet high and ninety-eight feet thick, and were flanked by two rows of towers—one inside and the other outside the wall. Between the towers there was sufficient room for a four-horse chariot to turn easily. A ditch wide and deep, banked with bricks and filled with water, surrounded the whole city. Twenty-six gates of massive brass gave ingress and egress on each of the four walls. The tower of the great temple of Belus was among the most remarkable monuments of Babylon. Eight gradually diminishing stories gave it the look of a pyramid, with enormous gradients. Upon the summit stood the temple, surmounted by a platform where the priests assiduously devoted themselves to the study of the celestial bodies. A bridge which Quintus Curtius ranks among the wonders of the East united the two portions of the city on the respective banks of the Euphrates; and immense reservoirs received and turned aside the surplus waters during the time of floods. Finally all antiquity has celebrated the praises of the hanging gardens, piled terrace above terrace, and supported by twenty large-ramparts crossed by conduits of water, and crowned by trees that gave them the appearance of a wooded hill.

"At the present day the plain of Babylon is covered to the extent of eighteen leagues with débris, mounds, aqueducts, canals, and rubbish heaps. All these have been so intermingled, that it is difficult to recognize the sites or the dimensions of even the largest buildings. Desolation bears undisputed reign around. Not a house, not a field, nor a tree in leaf. The scene is completely deserted both by man and nature. Tigers, jackals, and serpents have taken up their abode in the ruins, and frequently the traveller is terrified by scenting the lion."

This description shows that the prophecy uttered when Babylon was at the summit of her greatness has been accurately fulfilled—"The Arabian shall not pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and ostriches shall dwell there; and satyrs shall dance there; and wolves shall cry in their castles; and jackals in the pleasant palaces" (Isa. 13: 20).

THE REV. SAM JONES.

REFERENCE has frequently been made in these columns to the revivals which have taken place in the South and West under the preaching of the evangelist whose portrait we now publish. Sam Jones has been marvellously blessed of God in many of the places he has visited, and in several of them the work of grace has been wide and deep beyond any ever experienced there. God is not limited in His use of instruments, and when a particular work needs to be done He raises up an instrument specially adapted for its performance. This fact is very noticeable in Sam Jones's career, as it is in the work of the Salvation Army and other instrumentalities. Cities which have been unmoved by preaching earnest, evangelical and cultured, have been stirred to their centre by Sam Jones's exhortations, while other cities which have usually been quick to respond to special effort have remained unimpressed under his appeals.

Sam Jones was born in Chambers County, Ala., on October 16th, 1847. He is, therefore, in his thirty-ninth year. His father was a lawyer, and his grandfather, who is still living, is a clergyman. While Sam was still a child the Jones family removed to Georgia. He received a good English education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He became dissipated, and was travelling fast along the road to ruin when the death of his father arrested his steps. In the chamber in which death was waiting to seize its victim, Sam threw himself on the floor, crying in an agony: "I'll quit; I'll quit. God be merciful to me a sinner." The prayer was heard, and Sam Jones became a new man. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and studied for the ministry. His first nine years of ministerial life were spent in the mountains of Northern Georgia, but latterly he has devoted himself entirely to evangelistic work. He has labored in all the Southern States with much success, and at St. Louis, Cincinnati, and recently at Chicago, the results of his work have been extraordinary. He also conducted services for a short time in Dr. Talmage's church.

The characteristics of Sam Jones's preaching are terse, vigorous, incisive criticism of prevailing inconsistencies of Christian life; withering denunciation of shams of all kinds, and trenchant admonition on the folly and wickedness of rejecting the Gospel message. Mr. Jones never aims at refinement of language; he calls things by their common names, and chooses his words for their vigor rather than for their elegance. He believes with a great preacher of the last generation that "whatever is to penetrate must be pointed," and he takes care that every utterance shall have a very sharp point. No one can mistake his meaning, and no one who is addicted to bad habits or sinful practices can sit comfortably under his sermons.

The following extracts give an idea of his style of preaching:

"There are thousands who do not go to church for one reason or another, and yet are seeking to lead better lives. I am going to try to reach these people and tell them just what they are seeking for. I don't fight the bar-keeper of the saloon, but I fight the barrels and the bottles; I don't fight the gambler, but I fight gambling; I don't fight the poor fallen woman who has lost her place in the world, but I fight the houses of prostitution which encourage such things. And when I fight I don't strike puny blows on the body, but I strike right straight out from the shoulder, and hit between the eyes."

"God pity the Christian man that consults public opinion on any question of conscience or conviction."

"There is but one soil in the universe of God that infidelity would grow in, the soil that's littered by the unfaithful lives of professing Christians."

Archie's Offering.

"We say we believe in old-fashioned heart religion. Brother, if I can't have religion in but one particular niche of my person, I want it right here in my right hand, that I can do something for God and humanity. You hear that?"

ARCHIE'S OFFERING.

It was only a bunch of common flowers—none of them very valuable—but they represented a good deal to Archie. His own particular plot of garden-ground on which so much labor had been expended, and which had been praised by his friends, as a triumph of juvenile gardening, looked very bare when that large nosegay was made up. The early morning hours when bed is so pleasant to a growing boy, had been given to the garden; every plant had been carefully watched and tended, every bud hailed with delight, but they were all cut ruthlessly for that big bouquet, and not a vestige of bright color could be seen where yesterday was a blaze of horticultural beauty. That was Archie's offering to the hospitals on the flower festival, and it was a glad and a willing offering.

When he and his sister Marion set out for the church, where many other bouquets would soon bear it company, Archie looked his nosegay over tenderly. "I am glad they were all out to-day, Marion," he said. "A week later I should not have had near so many."

"Are you sure you won't be sorry to-morrow when you see the garden so bare, Archie?"

"Oh, no, I would rather the flowers were doing some good; and the poor people in the hospitals will be so pleased with them. Perhaps some one will get them who used to live in the country, and has not seen many flowers in the city. They will help him to think of his home."

"Ah, Miss Marion, I am pleased to see you," said a gray-haired clergyman, who met them as they neared the church, "and Archie, too,

What a beautiful nose-gay! I am afraid you have robbed your garden for that, Miss Marion."

"Not at all, Doctor; they are Archie's own gift. He has become quite skilful as a gardener, and this is the result of his season's work."

"And a very creditable result, too. It is beautiful in more senses than one. The spirit that can make the sacrifice is more beautiful than the flowers themselves. Did you ever read of two little coins that grew more precious than gold, Archie?"

"I don't remember, sir."

"There was once an offertory-box placed at the door of a famous place of worship, and rich people who passed put large sums of money in it. A poor widow came along also, and she was so poor that she had only two little coins left. It seemed more fitting that she should have something out of the box rather than that she put something in, but when she came to it, she dropped in those two coins—all she had in the world. It was said of her that she gave more than all others, for she gave all she had. There never were coins seen worth so much before or since. How much are your flowers worth, Archie?"

"I do not know, sir; I never bought any."

"Well, they are worth the work you gave to produce them, are they not?"

"Yes, sir, I think they are worth that; I am well satisfied."

"Then we will say you give a season's work to the Lord. I hope you will give many more seasons to Him. I am an old man now, and when I look back over my life I see that the time I have given Him is the time that it is most pleasant to think of."

"The flowers are for the hospital, sir."

"Yes, I know; but the poor and the suffering are the Lord's representatives here. That makes anything we can do for them doubly pleasant to do. We can help them because we are humane and pity them, but none enjoy the luxury of giving like those who give because they love Jesus. I am glad to see you are learning how noble self-sacrifice is. Get a step higher and you will find there is no happiness in the world that compares with it. Now, come and make your offering, and we will pray that your life may be fruitful in many others. As an old man I envy you your opportunity. God grant you may have wisdom to make the best of it."

THE CAPTURE OF JEFFREYS.

THE infamy earned by George, Lord Jeffreys renders his name a by-word for judicial villainy in every land where the English language is spoken. He was a protégé of King James II., the most despicable king of a despicable family. The worst of all the Stuarts found in Jeffreys a fit instrument for his purposes, and in 1684 made him Lord Chief-Justice of England. He had little legal learning, but an abundance of impudence, and was coarse and brutal in mind and body. His violence was dreaded when he was sober, which was very seldom, but when he was drunk, as he generally was when he was on the bench, he was a terror to lawyers, prosecutors, and prisoners.

The eminent Richard Baxter was once placed on trial before him, and Jeffreys, who boasted that he "could deal with saints as well as sinners," exhausted his vocabulary of abuse on the great and good man who stood before him. Before the jury gave their verdict, Jeffreys called him "a dog, a factious knave, an old rogue, and a hypocritical villain, who ought to be whipped at the cart's tail." Three eminent lawyers appeared in Baxter's defence, but Jeffreys silenced them successively by a torrent of vituperation, and would not even allow the prisoner to speak for himself or a witness to speak for him.

Jeffreys was the hero of "the Bloody Assize," in which he went from town to town holding his court, and condemning men to death wholesale. In one circuit he sentenced three hundred and twenty men, at least (some historians say seven hundred), to the gallows, and nearly a thousand were sent to the West Indies to a fate worse than death. None of them had a fair trial. In after years King James, with his customary cowardice and duplicity, asserted his own innocence in the matter of this Bloody Assize, but in recent times documents have been found in his own handwriting, proving that Jeffreys simply executed the king's orders. When he returned to London he should have been promptly hanged, but the king, instead, rewarded him, "for his eminent and faithful services," by making him Lord High Chancellor.

place secure in the history of his time. He will never be forgotten while the world lasts.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

Another Effort.

THE calmness and patience of these simple Moravian Christians was an evidence of the completeness of that perfect peace in which God keeps those who put their trust in Him (Isa. 26:3). The two men were going into the midst of an epidemic in which two of their friends had already lost their lives, but they had no fear for themselves. They were leaving unprotected one whom they loved dearly, and who was lying in bed helpless and suffering. Themselves and their loved one they committed to God, and were at rest from distress. The only inmate of the mission who was restless and miserable was the one who had least external cause for distress. But Juliet as yet knew nothing of that peace, and therefore knew no rest.

Fritz was busy about the dogs; it was no easy matter to collect and harness the savage beasts to the sledge, and the sledge itself required some repairs, which Fritz had himself to execute. Anna could not help lamenting in her heart the impossibility of her getting about to see to her good man's travelling comforts. Deborah, the awkward Esquimaux, had to be called in to work, which she was willing enough to do; but she broke one of Anna's best dishes, and let half the soup be overturned on the fire, which it nearly extinguished.

Pastor Wilhelm called Juliet to come to dinner; but the young lady, who knew nothing of what had happened, did not choose to show herself with eyes red and swollen by weeping. Juliet merely opened the door about half an inch wide to say that she had a headache, and wanted no dinner. The poor pastor shook his head, and exchanged glances with Fritz. Neither of the missionaries was at all easy at having to leave Sister Anna to the care of one in whose sense, thoughtfulness, and kindness they had so little confidence.

The hasty meal has been taken, the husband's farewell embrace has been given, both Wilhelm and Anna have hearts too full for speech. But when Fritz comes and grasps the hand of his suffering friend, the poor wife finds voice to say: "I commend him to your care, dear Fritz, and to the mercy of the Lord."

Another minute and Fritz, in bear-skin coat and fur-flapped cap, springs into the sledge, takes the long reins in one gloved hand and the whip in another, and is ready for a start over the snow. Pastor Wilhelm more slowly follows, and wistfully looks at the little dwelling in which he has left his best earthly treasure, with a feeling that he may never behold it again. His lips form a silent prayer. Then Fritz cracks the whip, and his wild team starts.

Away, away, over the dreary waste, away over the trackless snow, the sun will soon set and the stars be their guide. The wind feels like the icy breath of the destroyers, freezing the very blood in the veins. There are heroic deeds which no historian describes, sacrifices unrecorded except in heaven. It needed no weak faith and no faltering courage to go forth as these two Moravians went forth, to perform an act of love and mercy at the peril of limb or life.

The sound of the departure brought Juliet out of her room, for the sledge never departed without considerable noise, the yelling of the dogs, the crack of the long whip, and the animating voice of the driver. Juliet emerged from her apartment just in time to see the sledge whirled along over the snow which covered the landscape. Deborah was sadly looking forth from the door. "They won't come back to Nannock Igloo!" she said in the Esquimaux tongue.

The words filled Juliet with undefined fear; she asked for an explanation which she did not understand. A practical care occupied the attention of Deborah. She exerted all her strength to close the heavy door, and so shut out the wind from without, which made the house feel like an ice-pit; the cold was freezing the water left in the cups, the soup which remained in the tureens.

"Fritz braves all weather, but what can take the pastor out in an open sledge on such a day as this?" thought Juliet. She hurried to Anna's room for an explanation, and found her engaged in earnest prayer, with her face buried in her hands, and the drops trickling from between her fingers.

Juliet waited in anxious suspense till the prayer was ended, and Sister Anna raised her head. Juliet then asked the reason of the hurried departure, of which no notice whatever had been given at breakfast.

"Sickness—small-pox—at Bethabara," said Anna, sadly; "two Moravians and an Esquimaux have died. My husband and Fritz have gone to bury the dead and to help the survivors."

"Small-pox! so many deaths! oh, how terrible!" exclaimed Juliet. "What if they, too, should take the infection!"

"They are going whither God calls them; they are trusting in Him," answered the Moravian wife.

"But they may be long away; how dreadful for you, with your poor eyes, your bruises, your pain, and at this horrible season!"

"Juliet, you will help me," said Anna.

"I should like to be eyes, hands, feet to you!" exclaimed Juliet, all her more generous feelings roused by the sight of such patient suffering, such forgetfulness of self.

"Then will you first read to me something from the blessed Book, just where my husband was reading; you will see his marker in the place."

This was the easiest of all the duties which Juliet was volunteering to take on herself. The marker was at the twenty-first chapter of the Book of Numbers. Juliet read of the murmurings of the Israelites in the desert, and the fearful visitation which came upon them in the form of fiery serpents.

"It seemed a terrible punishment, merely for murmuring," observed Juliet, looking very grave.

"My child, the sin of the people of Israel had sore aggravations," said Anna; "it showed such ingratitude for past mercies, such want of faith in His power and love. Think of all that the Lord had done for His people; how He had fed them, protected, and guided. Think how He had rescued them from death, and was leading them on to the land of promise."

"God has done more than all this for me," thought Juliet, "so I deserve His anger more than the Israelites did." "It is a terrible story," she said aloud, as she closed the sacred volume.

"To me it is a story so full of comfort," said Anna. "Think of the simple means of cure which God Himself provided; just a look on an object raised on high."

"I wish that our heart wounds could be as easily cured," sighed Juliet.

"They are, dear child, they are. The brazen serpent was but a type, the reality is before us. One look of faith at the crucified Saviour, and the wounds made by sin are healed at once; we stand even in God's sight perfectly whole."

"Yes, perhaps after we have conquered our temper, got rid of our selfishness, given up our follies," said Juliet.

"Do not mix up works with free grace," cried Anna. "The one direction was look and live. The bitten Israelite did not set to work to build an altar, to hew wood, or to pile up stones; he may have done this when his strength was restored, but at first he had nothing to do but look."

"How is one to look, what is one to look at? Oh, I know nothing, nothing of these things!" exclaimed Juliet.

"We must simply look to the Lord Jesus Christ, as a little child looks to its parent for all that it needs; we must look to Him for forgiveness and healing, joy and peace; He has bought them all for us with His blood."

"Still I do not quite understand this looking," said Juliet. "I want to know what I ought to do. I am such a silly, worldly girl, I can never be anything else."

"Just go into your room, shut the door, kneel down, and say: 'Lord, I am a silly, worldly girl, but I wish to give myself unto Thee. Take me just as I am, and make me what Thou wouldst have me to be.'"

"Must I not promise to give up all my sin?" asked Juliet, surprised at the extreme simplicity of this looking unto Jesus.

"Make no promises now; as you are you could not keep them. The Lord must take you into His own hands, to fashion you as He will. All your part now is to trust Him, and to give yourself humbly to Him."

Juliet was silent for a few moments, with her eyes bent on the floor. Then she arose, and put the Bible into its place. "I should like to go back to my room and be alone for a little while," she said.

"Go, and may the Lord meet you!" said Anna.

Maria Selden's awakening to new life had come on a sweet summer's eve, while the night-ingale warbled her lay, and the fragrance of blossoms loaded the soft warm breeze; Juliet Erle's came on a November night, when the piercing cold made even breathing painful, and the wolf's distant howl sounded across the earth's white shroud of spotless snow. The one maiden, nurtured in a pious home, familiar with Scripture, accustomed to prayer, early gave her heart's affections to God, as it were offering the spring violets and primroses on which earth's dust had never fallen; the other girl had but a broken and soiled flower, dropped from the world's wreath-crowned chariot, a flower over which the crushing wheel had passed; Juliet thought it quite unworthy to lay at the Master's feet. Yet who can say that the one offering was not as truly acceptable as the other?

Maria's deep experience of religion had come with a thrill of joy; she had felt, as it were, the pressure of a loving hand, and had looked up to bask in the light of a smile; Juliet had been weary, disappointed, and sad, and to her the hand was as one stretched out to chastise. Juliet hardly yet felt the smile, scarcely realized aught of the joy; but on that, to her, memorable November night old things had passed away, and she gave herself in conscious weakness and worthlessness to Him who breaketh not the bruised reed, nor despiseth a broken and contrite heart.

Juliet awoke on the following morning with a calm and sober spirit; the first thought in her mind, as consciousness returned, was, "I am not my own;" the next resolved itself into a prayer: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

Very commonplace work was before Juliet Erle. Deborah, in her noisy, clumsy way, had cleared some snow from the door, replenished with logs the fires which were never now suffered to die out, and filled the kettle with lumps of ice. Juliet then dismissed the Esquimaux woman; she knew that Anna would prefer her own gentle ministrations and noiseless step. Juliet had learned much from watching Anna; she knew how to make things neat, and prepare such food as Labrador afforded. Bread there was none, vegetables none; this was not the season for sea-birds' eggs; preserved fruit or butter were dainties not to be lavishly expended. The luxury of cocoa, imported from England in the Harmony's annual cargo, must not be enjoyed every day. Of coffee there was a larger supply. There was still an abundance of meal in the barrel, pemmican and dried fish in the stores, and Juliet tried her hand, with fair success, at making some small unleavened rolls.

She carried to Anna the hot breakfast which her own hands had prepared, and the two took their simple meal together. Much they thought and talked of the travellers; Anna had been awake half the night in prayer; now she thanked God that the wind had gone down.

Then came the soothing Bible-reading, from the New Testament in the morning, as in the evening from the Old. Juliet attended to the little comforts of Sister Anna, remembering with pleasure the fine line quoted by Fritz: "And raise I reign into I serve." She had just been reading of the Lord of glory washing the disciple's feet on His knees.

The sun had now risen; even in Labrador he shed his enlivening rays for a few hours in the day, but they seemed to have no power to warm. No glistening tear-drop hung at the end of the icicle, the white blocks at the side of the road were firm, as if made of marble. Juliet had returned to the parlor, and now looked out from the little window so crusted with crystals, that it was only by a dull red glow that she could tell of the presence of the sun. A little struggle was going on in Juliet's mind—should she venture forth or not. She remembered Lena, deprived of the pastor's daily care, probably dying, and yet not prepared to die. "Lord, what wouldst Thou have me to do?" was the question again silently asked. The answer was: "Take up the cross." Juliet went to the little chamber, and put on her hood and every wrap on which she could lay her hands. A thick veil covered her face, Anna's fur-lined gloves her hands, and resolutely opening the outer door, then carefully closing it behind her, the lady ventured forth into the cold. The air was perfectly still; the igloos scarce fifty yards distant. Juliet soon found herself at the low door of the sick woman's house.

Most unlike was the round rude hut to the pretty cottages of other lands, with the thatched roof, the honeysuckle-covered porch, the diamond-paned windows under the deep-browed eaves in which the swallows build and twitter. The place was almost painfully still, for the dogs had gone with the sledge, and not even Esquimaux children dared to play out of doors in the deadly cold of November. Juliet knocked, but her knock was apparently unheard. She opened the unfastened door, which faced to the south, and then passed through a low oblique passage before she entered the smoky room, almost oppressively warm, both from the fire in the middle and the breath of inmates, some of whom never left it day or night. Juliet had heard of snow-huts, but had never seen one; the igloos at White Bear's Den were constructed of earth, stones, and driftwood, interstices rendered more impervious to air by layers of moss.

On Juliet's former visit she had seen but a motionless form stretched on a low bed, even the face covered up from view. But this was not the case now. Lena was half sitting up, supported in the arms of another Esquimaux woman. The invalid was breathing with extreme difficulty, gasping and trembling, and fixed her eyes with a wistful, entreating look on the stranger who entered.

Juliet sat on a log beside Lena's bed. How we learn, in the presence of suffering and spiritual need, to forget differences in rank and in race! It was the first time that Juliet had ever opened a Bible to read to one more ignorant than herself, and now she had to read in a strange and unfamiliar tongue. Juliet felt the work to be a solemn one. Never had she in church or cathedral sat with such a sense of awe, as when by the dim fire-light, rather than that which struggled in through a few horn panes, she tried to make out the letters before her.

It was well that Fritz had made his pupil go over and over some passages in the Esquimaux language till she almost knew them by heart; this knowledge now stood her in good stead, for she had to trust to her memory as much as to her eyes. Could it be that seed sown in such utter weakness ever could grow?

THE NOBLEMAN'S SON.

S. S. Lesson for May 16, John 4:43-54. Golden Text, Ex. 15:26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The First Recorded Healing—Jesus Avoiding Honor—His Steps Directed—The Nobleman's Petition—His Own Plan Arranged—A Dear Mother's Mistake—The Natural and the Divine Ways—A Dear Child's Faith—The Confirmation of Faith.

WE have seen, in the course of our lessons from St. John, who gives us many details of the early ministry of our blessed Lord, something of His first disciples; His first miracle; His opening to Nicodemus the first principles of His doctrine; in His talk with the Samaritan woman, the first lost woman rescued; and now we are about to consider His first recorded healing.

After the two days of His ministry in Sychar, following on the steps of the newly converted Samaritan woman, Jesus "went forth from thence into Galilee. For Jesus Himself testified, that a prophet hath no honor in his own country" (R. V.). What then? Was Jesus bent upon AVOIDING HONOR?

Yes, absolutely. He declared: "I receive not honor from men" (John 5:41), and He acted on this principle all His life through. The people of Sychar said: "This is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world;" the people of Nazareth, where He was brought up, said: "Is not this Joseph's son" (Luke 4:22)? "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and of Joseph, and of Judas, and Simon? and are not His sisters here with us? And they were offended at Him" (Mark 6:3). Yet Jesus did not remain in Samaria, where He was recognized, but went into Galilee among His own, who received Him not. But this was not from any morose, misanthropical spirit, which made Him gloomy and moody; but He would not give Himself into the hands of men, or let His Messiahship be made known by these Samaritans, who had but a partial knowledge of Him. He left His Father to work out all His will, and according to that will went into Galilee.

A change had come over the Galileans; they had seen Him in a new character. The young carpenter of Nazareth had publicly rebuked those who bought and sold in the temple, and no man had forbidden Him. He had spoken with the elders of the Jews, and in Jerusalem "many believed in His name, when they saw the miracles which He did" (John 2:23). He had gained such an influence over the people during the few days of the feast, that His name was in every mouth. And so it was now to the interest of the Galileans to know and own Him whom they had not marked before. "The Galileans received Him, having seen all the things that He did at Jerusalem at the feast: for they also went unto the feast." His were

DIRECTED STEPS;

He went nowhere by His own will. "So Jesus came again into Cana of Galilee, where He made the water wine." Many who have considerable wisdom about political economy want to introduce the same principle into their work for God. Such would have said in Jesus' place: "I have manifested forth my glory in Cana, and I have to make myself known all over the land; it will be a waste of time and energy to go there again; I will go to some new place." But Jesus knew that His Father had a plan of His own, and thus He did not attempt to make one for Himself. If all of us believed in God's having a plan for every one of us, infinitely wise and infinitely loving, and if we were willing to trust our God fully with the government of every day, every hour, every circumstance, all the worry and care would go out of all our lives, and we should be blest beyond anything we can conceive.

The Father knew that there was "a nobleman, whose son was sick at Capernaum." This man must have heard of Jesus either from some who had been up to Jerusalem, or from some who had seen the water turned into wine; so he went in person to Jesus "and besought Him that He would come down, and heal his son: for he was at the point of death." It may be that he thought he was conferring a favor on the carpenter of Nazareth in calling Him in to exercise His power on such an august personage as the son of such an aristocratic family. He was very unlike the centurion, who said: "Lord, I am not worthy that Thou shouldest come under my roof" (Matt. 8:8); for he stipulated that the cure should be performed his way—"come down and heal my son." To his great surprise Jesus answered him: "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." The great Healer of soul and body saw in the nobleman a disease more deadly and more enduring than that which was fast sapping the life of his son. He saw that his faith needed healing.

A DEAR MOTHER

wrote, some time back, to some of God's children to entreat prayer for her only son, nearly insane, and for many years a complete wreck in mind and body. Answer was sent that if she would join in praying and accepting the healing they would unite with her in prayer. She had imagined that in answer to their prayer a miracle was to be performed. But God was dealing with her. Finally she agreed to ask and receive, and, thank God, that son is now in work as a solicitor in London; the wreck has been made a man again by the touch of Jesus. "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." It is very natural (but it is not at all divine) for us to make a picture in our own minds as to how a prayer is to be answered, and if the answer does not come in that way to judge God as unfaithful, and to complain that He has not answered at all. It stands to reason that the great, All-wise God cannot come into our thoughts and work second to us; yet, in point of fact, this is what we often expect. In His love to us He seeks to bring us out of our imperfect, short-sighted thoughts into His perfect and holy thoughts. "My thoughts are not your thoughts . . . saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are . . . My thoughts than your thoughts" (Isa. 55:8, 9). What, then, is the ground for our belief? The character of God. We believe in Him in measure as we appreciate His character and take Him to be what He really is.

The nobleman in his impatience, feeling that every moment was of importance to his dying son, said: "Sir, come down ere my child die." To him it seemed cruelty both to the young man and to himself that any time should be spent in words, when every breath might be the last. It would seem to him that any sermonizing might well be left to another opportunity; but Jesus saw that was the exact moment; at no other time could his faith be tested as now. He only answered: "Go thy way; thy son liveth." He saw no sign or wonder; he had no proof but the word of Jesus, whom probably he had never seen before. There were no telegraphs or telephones in those days, so that he could satisfy himself that it was as Jesus said. Yet the man believed, and so fully that, although it was only one o'clock in the day, he spent the night in Cana, and did not return home until the morrow. This is faith. Had he doubted the word of Jesus he would have hastened home that day (the journey being a short one), that he might assure himself that his son was healed. But if his son were well, what need to hurry? So he did not hurry. Some years ago of God in Switzerland gave her mother a deadly poison in mistake for a dose of medicine, and only discovered her mistake too late. She was kept calm, called a friend into another room, and told her what had occurred, saying: "My dear mother can only live a few hours unless God undertakes; but Jesus said: 'If they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them' (Mark 16:18); let us claim this promise for my mother." They did, and at that moment the church bell rang for service. She said: "If we believe God, we shall go to church; if not, we shall stay at home and watch." They went to church, leaving God to watch. He was true to His Word; the poison did not hurt her, and He honored the faith which really trusted Him.

The nobleman on his way home met some of his servants, who told him that his son lived. Faith in God had been his meat for some twenty-four hours; he asked them the hour when he began to amend. The answer was a glorious confirmation of his faith—"Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him." There was no gradual abatement of the fever and amendment of the patient. God sent His word and healed him, and he was delivered from his destruction (Ps. 107:20). Life and health had already entered his house, but the father bore a message which was to bring living faith to every member of it. Now he understood why there seemed on the part of Jesus such a needless delay; now he saw the heart of Jesus and the power of Jesus in the healing of his son, "and himself believed, and his whole house." Jesus was now a personal acquaintance, a known and tried friend of the family, and yet only one had ever seen Him; and each one had learned that He had as much power by His word as by His presence. The Lord teach us to trust that word of power which creates (John 1:3), upholds (Heb. 1:3), directs (II Chron. 20:6), converts (Ps. 19:7), without looking either to what we see or what we feel as a confirmation of it.

GOD CARES FOR ME.

From the German of BENJAMIN SCHMOLKE.
Translated by Rev. J. E. RANKIN, D.D.

God cares for me! should I be caring?
He's my Father, I'm his child;
He cares to-day, to-morrow, sharing
My pathway on to heav'n beguiled, Alone or wretched can I be?
He knows His own: God cares for me!

God cares for me! In Him confiding.
I do not fear my coming lot,
For, were it mine, each day's deciding,
He still should shape it to His thought.
I'm ready now, eternally;
He well provides: God cares for me!

Body and soul for me He's caring!
His word to soul the living bread.
Whate'er my earthly toil or faring,
Still from His hand I'm daily fed.
Well may I trust confidently,
For all is well: God cares for me!

God cares for me, and for my dearest!
The flesh and blood that here are mine:
Unchanging sun! by light Thou cheerest,
When hope, extinguished, gives no sign.
Thy footsteps on before they see,
My dearest ones: God cares for me!

God cares for me in my distresses!
The cross that He upon me lays
As His own child my soul addresses,
And future glory round it plays.
The strokes that fall are fatherly,
And for my good: God cares for me!

God cares for me when life is waning!
Who holds and leads me, loves me well:
He hears my sighings and complainings,
And all my weaknesses can tell.
Protector tender, always He!
He's still the same: God cares for me!

God cares for me when I am dying!
And death is but sweet sleep to me:
Beyond earth's curse and woe and crying,
Asleep in Jesus I shall be—
To rest and reign eternally.
I go to Him: God cares for me!

God cares for me where I am sleeping,
In some cool spot, my dust to dust!
His angels o'er me ward are keeping—
I know, I know in whom I trust,
And soul and body yet shall be Made one in Christ: God cares for me!

EMINENT THEOLOGICALS AND SCHOLARS.

Phillip Schaff, D.D., the Eminent Commentator and the President of the American Bible Revision Committee, says: "The most important and practical work of the age on the Psalter is 'The Treasury of David,' by Charles H. Spurgeon. It is full of the force and genius of this celebrated preacher, and rich in selections from the entire range of literature."

John Hall, D.D., New York, says: "There are two questions that must interest every expositor of the Divine Word. What does a particular passage mean, and to what use is it to be applied in public teaching? In the department of the latter Mr. Spurgeon's great work on the Psalms is without an equal. Eminently practical in his own teaching, he has collected in these volumes the best thoughts of the best minds on the Psalter, and especially of that great body loosely grouped together as the Puritan divines. I wish the highest success to the enterprise."

W. H. Van Doren, D.D., the author of the "Suggestive Commentary," says: "A life work of the Christ for 1900 years has drawn and held such a number of hearers so long. If the secret of his power is here revealed, it will be a TREASURY, priceless in value, for centuries to come."

William Orymiston, D.D., New York, says: "I consider 'THE TREASURY OF DAVID' a work of surpassing excellence, of inestimable value to every student of the Psalter. It will prove a standard work on the Psalms for all time. The instructive introductions, the racy original expositions, the numerous quaint illustrations gathered from wide and varied fields, and the suggestive sermonic hints, render the volumes invaluable to all preachers and indispensable to every minister's library. All who delight in reading the Psalms—and what Christian does not?—will prize this work. It is a rich cyclopedia of the literature of these ancient odes."

William M. Taylor, D.D., New York, says: "In the exposition of the heart 'THE TREASURY OF DAVID' is sui generis, rich in experience, and preeminently devotional. The exposition is always fresh. To the preacher it is especially suggestive."

Theo. L. Cuyler, D.D., Brooklyn, says: "I have used Mr. Spurgeon's 'TREASURY OF DAVID' for three years, and found it worthy of its name."

Jesse B. Thomas, D.D., Brooklyn, says: "I have the highest conception of the sterling worth of all Mr. Spurgeon's publications, and I incline to regard his 'TREASURY OF DAVID' as having received more of his loving labor than any other. I regard its publication at a lower price as a great service to American Bible Students."

"A genuine literary curiosity. Is an extremely rare poem, written in 1620, and supposed to have been the source of Milton's conception of 'Paradise Lost.' It is an odd book and certainly has the charm of novelty."—The Interior, Chicago, Ill.

"Apart from its value as a literary curiosity, is interesting as having in all probability suggested some ideas, and even certain special passages in Milton's 'Paradise Lost.'"—Christian Union, New York City.

"'The Glasse of Time' in the British Museum was purchased at a noted sale of old books in 1819, by Baron Bolland, who notes upon a blank leaf that it cost him 21l. 17s. 6d. (about $110.00). Some years ago a gentleman of Virginia, Mr. J. L. Peyton, sprung from the old English family of that name, made an accurate transcript of the copy in the British Museum, preserving even the quaint spelling, punctuation, capitalizing, and italicizing of the original. The present edition is printed without alteration."—Christian Cynosure, Chicago, Ill.

NOT a few people in our great cities during the past few weeks have felt inclined to add to their Litany the petition, "from all trades-unions, strikes and lockouts, good Lord deliver us." They cause inconvenience to the public, they lead to angry feeling, and have a tendency to cause breaches of the peace. We can go about our business with more facility, and have more comfort generally when there is no strike. Doubtless many people, a little more than a century ago, similarly deprecated, and would have been glad to prevent, if they could have done so, our forefathers going on their against the domination of the English king and his ministers. It caused much distress, a great deal of bloodshed, and much loss of property when they declared they would work for King George no longer, pitched the tea into Boston Harbor, and went on strike, carrying their lives in their hands. They were called rebels and other opprobrious names, but they went on with their strike in spite of the king's hired soldiers, and his friends in this country who sympathized with him, and we are now enjoying the freedom they won at the peril of their lives. The fact is that when men are oppressed and when "on the side of the oppressors there is power," there is no way to freedom but for the oppressed to combine together for resistance. They are too weak to resist as individuals, but when they combine with a man like George Washington to lead the strike, it goes hard with the tyrant.

Unhappily there is too little discrimination used by the public in this matter. Trades-unions are mighty engines, and the fact is recognized by a lot of thieves and murderers whom Europe has cast upon our shores. They come here, and try, sometimes successfully, to use the unions for their own nefarious purposes. Workingmen, smarting under their wrongs, are not sufficiently careful about the character of the men who offer to help them. They accept foreign help, and the foreigners, like the Poles, Germans and Irish, who threw the bombs last week in Chicago, bring discredit on the cause of labor. But intelligent people, and especially Christian people, who are bound by their faith to sympathize with the poor, should not make the mistake of confusing the evil with the good, and condemning indiscriminately the honest laborer with the cut-throats who have used him for their villainous purposes. It is in the hope of clearing away some of the rubbish which interested people have thrown around this subject to deceive the public that we give this week the portrait, and relate the history of the brave man who has recently led the most successful labor organization of modern times. Fifteen years ago in an English village was a sad sight. In the village might be seen children of seven and eight years old sent into the fields to do such work as a child could do. Young men were there following the plough, or acting as wagoners or shepherds. Men of thirty, with wives and families, laboring from sunrise to sunset, and, living among them, old people of seventy wholly or partially supported out of the poor-rate levied on the parish. Speak to them and you would find that their fathers and grandfathers had lived so in the same village their lives of dull labor. Men from twenty to forty received $2 a week. Below twenty the wage rose from twenty-five cents a week, year by year to two dollars; after forty it gradually declined. There was no hope of saving anything during the sunny period of twenty to forty, and they must, as they knew, be dependent on charity in their old age.

"How do you live?" the writer once asked a stalwart specimen of the class who was receiving $2 a week, and had a wife and six children. "Well," he said, "like the others. Here is the cottage I live in. It has two rooms. We spend the day in the one when we are not at work, and the night in the other." "What, all eight of you sleep in this one little room?" "Yes, we have nowhere else." We live chiefly on bread and water. Sometimes we get a little tea or coffee, and about Christmas when the pig is killed, we get a bit of meat for a week or two. We must have clothes, you know, and we must have the doctor in when any of us are sick." The rent of the cottage was $10 a year. The villages were full of sexual immorality of the most repulsive kind. There was no education, incest was common, and misery universal. This is not a fancy picture, nor an exceptional one. The writer saw it in hundreds of villages in England, when he was there fifteen years ago.

Could nothing be done to help these people? Their condition made the heart of any thinking man who saw it heavy with sorrow.

ARCH WAS THE CHAMPION

who took up their cause. He was one of them. He was born in the little village of Barford, near Warwick, in 1826. His life was like the others. When he was six years old he was sent into the fields at daybreak to scare the birds from the growing wheat (see Illustration No. 1 on first page). He ought to have been at school; but what could his father do? He was earning $2 a week. He had a wife and family to support, and he was often sick. His wife used to go out and do chores, but for a week's work she received only fifty cents. So young Joe must earn his quarter, too, to help the family.

Joe grew up, and proved a smart lad. His mother, an earnest, pious Methodist, taught him to read and write, and as soon as he began to earn a man's wages he lived on dry bread to buy books. He married early a pious, intelligent girl, who is now a bright-eyed, handsome old lady, was converted, and became a Sunday-school teacher and a local preacher among the Methodists (see Illustration No. 2). He pondered deeply over the condition of his brethren, and, like Moses, he heard God's voice calling him to their deliverance. He did not give all his time to thought, however. Wherever he worked Arch was the best man on the farm. Member of Parliament though he is now, there is no man in England able to reduce an overgrown hedge to order and tidiness so quickly or so well as Arch. Many a day has he spent at that work (see Illustration No. 3).

At night after his work was done he read in the books he starved himself to buy, how men had combined together to improve their condition, and he determined to try what could be done. In 1872 he consulted a few of his more intelligent fellow-workmen, and they bravely resolved to make a move toward forming a union. They had no money to pay for posters or to hire a hall, but they had children who were sent around to tell the men that on a certain night there would be a meeting held on the green of the village of Wellesbourne, which is about two miles from Arch's home. Arch finished his day's hedging, washed himself, put on his best white flannel jacket, and walked over to the meeting. He was the chief speaker. He told the men, who all knew him well, what other trades had done through their unions, and advised them to unite. They agreed with him, and the first branch of the union was formed there and then with Arch as leader.

There was no hope of his getting any work after that. He was stirring up rebellion, and every farmer boycotted him. The men subscribed each four cents a week out of their earnings, and from that fund Arch received $2 a week. As he had no work, and could not get any, he devoted himself wholly to his mission. He tramped through England, from village to village, holding meetings and forming branches of the union, until soon the union numbered its members by thousands. Of course, there was a struggle. The farmers refused to employ union men, and turned them all away from their work, but by this time the newspapers had taken notice of the affair, and philanthropic men had come to the aid of the union. Other workmen sympathized, and voluntarily taxed themselves to support the discharged laborers. The engineers, miners, bricklayers, carpenters all sent money, and the treasurer of the Agricultural Laborers' Union soon had one hundred thousand dollars in his hands to continue the struggle.

The farmers eventually surrendered, and took the men back at advanced wages. The union flourished, and had its branches in every county and district. It has now become so strong that at the last election it was able to get Arch elected Member of Parliament, and to give him an income sufficient to maintain his position there.

ARCH AT HOME.

A leading society journal gave the following sketch of this "Celebrity at Home," on January 20th. It said: "Mr. Arch lives at Barford, on a bend of the willow-fringed Avon. The front door of Mr. Arch's cottage opens directly on the living-room. As you enter, your head almost touches the ceiling, and you must stoop to pass the oak beam across its centre. A screen covered with paper shuts out the draught from a broad chimney-corner, which fills nearly one side of the apartment. The rough flags on the floor are covered with striped druggist matting, and a long Warwickshire press of black polished oak is placed beneath the windows, with the cheerful red merino curtains. Twenty years ago Joseph Arch made a little book-case, but has long since outgrown its capacity, and so Mrs. Arch has appropriated it for her best china tea-service, and her husband has lined the wall opposite the broad fireplace with substantial shelves. Here are to be found all his favorite works: Bright's and Cobden's speeches; Green's 'History of the English People'; 'Pulpit Aids'; Wesley's 'Commentaries,' and Spurgeon's 'Sermons,' are to be seen side by side; for theology, as well as politics, has a powerful claim on his attention. On most Sunday mornings Mr. Arch preaches in the modest cottage with leaded casements on the other side of the street, which is used as a Primitive Methodist chapel.

In the cosiest of chimney-corners, where a kettle suspended from an iron hook is hissing merrily over the brightest of fires, Mrs. Arch is to be seen most afternoons seated in a comfortable arm-chair, within reach of the kettle. She is comely still, and, as becomes

THE WIFE OF A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT, wears a serviceable stuff gown of the brightest mauve color, an apron in which the red and the yellow flowers struggle for supremacy, and a matronly cap with ribbons to match. Joseph Arch sits opposite her in the upright seat which once belonged to his grandmother, and which has passed a whole century in the same chimney-corner; the table is pulled slightly toward him, and he is occupied with his letters. He wears a woollen jacket and trousers of gray tweed.

"If a visitor appears he will probably find time to indulge in a little talk and exhibit his various treasures. He will not forget to show you the pocket filter which his son, Lance-Corporal Arch (now a drill-sergeant in Wales) carried with him when he fought with Lord Wolseley on the Gold Coast, nor will he omit to take you up a perilous perpendicular staircase to the little rooms overhead, where more portraits and pictures look down approvingly on many-colored patchwork quilts, spotless linen, and home-made furniture (see Illustration No. 5). You will hear that the only dower he could give his daughters consisted of certain tables and chairs of his own manufacture, and will be conducted through the little workshop behind the house to the garden, where Joseph Arch raises more fruit and vegetables than he can use, and rears the finest pinks, roses and pansies in the parish of Barford."

CRITICISING THE QUEEN.

In the House of Commons on January 26th,

1886, Mr. Arch made a speech (see Illustration No. 7) on the subject of allotments and small holdings. On rising he was received with cheers. He remarked: "When I read the gracious speech of Her Majesty the Queen, which expresses sympathy with the distress prevalent not only in trade but in agriculture, I took it to mean this, 'You agricultural laborers are in a terribly poverty-stricken position; your lot in life is hard; you are without employment and without money, and consequently must be without food; I know your lot is hard, but I have no remedy.' It appears to me that if I were suffering from intense bodily pain, and sent for a medical man, and if the doctor looked at me writhing in pain, and told me he had not a single ingredient in his surgery to assuage the pain, I would naturally seek advice of some more skilled physician. In like manner I think that the country will very soon look out for another physician than the present advisers of the Queen, who might have some practical remedy to suggest."

"I know of no human or divine law which should confine a skilled laborer, such as I am myself, from cultivating one acre or two acres of land, if he has the energy and skill to do so, and to buy his cow into the bargain; I can see no just reason why his energies should be crippled and his force held back by being confined to a rood of land. If you want to

EXTERMINATE PAUPERISM

—and I am prepared to say that among the classes for whom I speak there are hundreds of thousands of workmen who hate pauperism; they have a perfect horror of the workhouse, but if they were to be cut down to 12s. a week—then I want to know if these men by their energies could supplement their wages by another 10s. or 12s., why should they not do so to the reduction of pauperism in the country?

"We do not ask for the land to be given us, and we have no desire to steal it. I wish to ask the gentlemen on both sides of the House whether they do not think that the time has come when these thousands of industrious and willing workers should no longer be shut out from the soil, but should have the opportunity of gaining a fair foothold upon it, and of producing food for themselves and their country."

"I have travelled this country from one end to the other, and I have an idea that I know when land is cultivated and when it is not as well as any gentleman in this House, and I say, fearless of contradiction, that tens of thousands of acres of land are waiting for the hand of the workman, and what this House ought to aim at is this—to use every legitimate means to bring the land that cries for labor, and the laborer together as soon as possible. I heard last night a right honorable gentleman speak of the laborers of Scotland as hinds. I should like to inform that right honorable gentleman that though their lives have been lives of poverty, though they were born in humble cottages, yet at the same time they look upon themselves as men. I think that honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House would feel very much annoyed if I were to speak of them as aristocratic goats. (Laughter and cheers.) I hope that when this House goes to the country it will be able to show honestly and fairly to the men who have sent us here that, at least, we have done our best to redress their grievances, to dry their tears, wipe away their sorrows, and place them in the position of free men."

Some of the Chinese Residents in this Country appear to have correctly diagnosed the epidemic of persecution which has broken out against them. A California correspondent of the Evening Post, in a letter on the anti-Chinese agitation, quotes a little story which proves the fact. A Chinaman discharged on account of the boycott, turned to his late employer with an air of genial and impersonal regret. "Oh, yes; I wish you ask Melican man send away Chinaman. That all right. He go back to China pretty good. Bimeby I wish man send Melican man away. Where you go?"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Blinder Than Her Blind Mother.—At a recent meeting Mr. McLachlan reported: "I was conducting a series of meetings in a country district lately; and one day while passing through the village, a woman came running after me, and said: 'Here, preacher, will you come and speak to my old blind mother?' I turned back, and followed her up a flight of narrow stairs, but immediately she crossed the threshold, she exclaimed: 'It is not my mother with whom I want you to speak; although she cannot see with these mortal eyes, she is inwardly all right, but oh, sir, I cannot see the light; I am in a more fearful darkness than my blind mother, and what must I do to be saved?' I told her of the Lamb crucified for her. She was anxious, and willing to be saved, and therefore she was easily led to the feet of Jesus, and found both light and peace."

An Appalling Explosion.—Sir William Collins remarked: "Not very long ago in one of the manufacturing suburbs of the city of Glasgow, a great explosion took place, by the bursting of a boiler, and two hundred persons, either instantly, or in a short time, lost their lives. Great sympathy was felt through all the city, and means taken to prevent such an accident occurring in future. But, dear friends, not much is said of the many poor creatures that are falling into drunkards' graves, and there are not very efficient means taken to prevent it. The deaths from this cause every year are more numerous and terrible than those which follow all the worst disastrous explosions on sea or shore. Let us be up and doing something to rescue those poor perishing ones. I have just one good thing to say about whiskey, and that is, 'it is no respecter of persons.'"

The Whiskey on the Shelf.—Dr. Macgregor Robertson observed: "I lately heard a story of a man who indulged deeply in strong drink, but was enabled by the grace of God to abstain from it. After his conversion to Christ he never was without whiskey in the house. He filled a bottle with it, and putting in a drop of coloring matter, he placed it upon a shelf as the chief ornament of his house. As long as it was there, he was reminded of the awful curse it had been to him, and of how much he had been saved from. And, dear friends, is it not true that if we will leave whiskey alone it will not seek to harm us? When once you make up your mind to have nothing more to do with, and set your face resolutely against it, and ask divine aid, you will in the strength of the Lord overcome that terrible evil, for has He not said: 'Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God.'"

A Lady Dying in a Cellar.—An open-air preacher narrated: "At one of our meetings, a woman elbowed her way through the crowd, until she came right up to me, and said: 'Please, sir, will you come and see a poor woman who is dying?' 'Certainly,' I at once answered, and leaving the meeting in charge of a worker, I followed the woman up one narrow street and down another, until we arrived at a narrow court, into which we turned. We descended some steep, winding stairs, and, after groping our way through a dark passage, she pushed open a door and entered a cellar which was perfectly dark. Not a sound was to be heard but the labored breathing of some one who seemed to be nearing death. 'I'll get a light,' said the woman, as she felt her way through the dark place. A candle was lighted, and there a terrible sight presented itself. The poor emaciated form of a woman was stretched upon a wretched straw palliasse, supported by two herring-boxes. I spoke to her of Jesus, and of His love for such as she had been, when she interrupted me by saying: 'Do not speak to me of these things now; I am suffering too much pain.' I made another attempt, but it was equally useless. In a few days an imposing funeral cortege wound its way from that house to the railway-station, and this poor ruined woman was interred with great state in a burying-ground in a distant seaport town. I was informed that she was a sister of a great shipowner there. She had wandered into the way of the Magdalene, and this was the end of it. Her remains were duly attended to—what had become of her soul?"

A Handcuffed Deserter.—Dr. Cameron said: "The other day I was passing down the street in a car. I got into conversation with a missionary who was seated next me. From my seat in the car I saw a poor young fellow being led handcuffed down the street. 'There is a deserter,' I remarked to my missionary friend. 'Ah, there will be a great many deserters from the King of kings,' he replied. 'Yes,' I said, 'but there will be far more that have not enlisted.' Dear friends, I ask you, have you yet enlisted into the service of the King? If not, I warn you, like this poor deserter, you will be brought to account."

Just Before the Battle.—Mr. Mather Related that "Once on board ship, in the late Soudan campaign, when we were just about to disembark, I was going to pronounce the blessing when one of the soldiers said: 'Let us have a short meeting, for it will be the last time we shall all be together' (we were just about to begin battle); and one after another of the men told how they had been led to Christ. Some had been Christians for years, some for months, some for weeks, some for days, and others but a few hours. Many and various testimonies were given on that morning, but they were all summed up in Christ's saving and keeping power. It was one of the most blessed meetings which I have ever been at. Afterward, when I saw some of those very men lying dead on the battle-field, I could lift up my heart in thankfulness to God that the Gospel had not lost its power. I went over to a young man who had fallen in the battle, and bent over him to ascertain if he still breathed. He opened his eyes and murmured feebly: 'Jesus only.' 'You are dying,' I said, as I saw his life's blood ebbing away. 'Yes, oh, yes, but Jesus only,' he again said, with faltering breath; and it brought sweet joy to my soul as I witnessed that young man passing through the dark valley of the shadow of death so peacefully. Oh, friends, you too, from the battle-field of life, will have to meet God, and there is just one shield behind which you may take shelter, and like that dying soldier, we must find that 'Jesus only' can do a poor, helpless sinner any good!"

The Letter on the Desk.—Mr. Pratt Related: "Not long ago, upon entering my office one morning I found, lying on my desk, a short note written in a trembling hand: 'Come and see me; I am very ill; nigh unto death.' It was signed, and I remembered the writer well. He had been one of my earliest friends, but a wave of good fortune which had come to him had separated us in this life, and it was long since I had heard anything of him. I hastened to obey the summons, for I feared he had sought too much of this world's pleasures, and was not prepared to meet God. When I stood by the bedside, I said: 'John, have you accepted Jesus as your Saviour?' With an effort, for he was almost gone, he said: 'I know about Him with my head, but I have not yet received Him into my heart.' I felt I had a kind of responsibility for this departing soul still in darkness. I opened my Bible at Romans 10: 9, 'Confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him.' When I finished reading the verse, the Holy Spirit seemed to come like a flood of light into the man's darkened soul. His face lighted up, all fear vanished, and a sublime tranquillity overspread his features. 'Thanks,' he said, 'I see it all, Christ's blood has paved the way to heaven, and I am free. Oh, matchless love! Oh, boundless grace!' How grateful I felt. How thankful to God that He had saved this poor rebellious sinner in the last moments of his life on earth. He passed quietly away, trusting in Him who knew no sin, but who was made sin for us."

RETURN FROM THE CHASE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 9, 1886.*

"In the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil."—GEN. 49 : 27.

A Fascination in Killing Something—Prevalence of Destructive Propensities—Hunting the World—Its Pleasures—Hilarity Superseded by Joy—Hunting Riches—On the Track of a Dollar—Souls Fed on Bonds—The Awakening—The Hunter Hunted—A Queen's Writing on a Window—A Bride's Poisoned Gloves—A Bad Inference—The Scarcity of Old Men—Rapidity of Change—Religion a Triumph—The Final Division.

THERE is in this chapter such an affluence of simile and allegory, such a mingling of metaphors, that there are a thousand thoughts in it not on the surface. Old Jacob, dying, is telling the fortunes of his children. He prophesies the devouring propensities of Benjamin and his descendants. With his dim old eyes he looks off and sees the hunters going out to the fields, ranging them all day, and at nightfall coming home, the game slung over the shoulder; and reaching the door of the tent the hunters begin to distribute the game, and one takes a coney and another a rabbit and another a roe. "In the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." Or, it may be a reference to the habits of wild beasts that slay their prey, and then drag it back to the cave or lair and divide it among the young.

FASCINATION OF KILLING.

There is nothing more fascinating than the life of a hunter. On a certain day in all England you can hear the crack of the sportsman's gun because grouse-hunting has begun; and every man who takes pleasure in destroying life, and can afford the time and ammunition, and can draw a bead starts for the fields. On the 20th of October our woods and forests will resound with the shock of firearms, and will be tracked by pointers and setters, because the quail will then be a lawful prize for the sportsman. Xenophon grew eloquent in regard to the art of hunting. In the far East, people, elephant-mounted, chase the tiger. The American Indian darts his arrow at the buffalo until the frightened herd tumble over the rocks. European nobles are often found in the fox-chase and at the stag-hunt. Francis I. was called the father of hunting. Moses declares of Nimrod: "He was a mighty hunter before the Lord." Therefore in all ages of the world the imagery of my text ought to be suggestive whether it means a wolf after a fox or a man after a lion. "In the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil."

HUNTING THE WORLD.

I take my text, in the first place, as descriptive of those people who in the morning of their life give themselves up to hunting the world, but afterward by the grace of God, in the evening of their life divide among themselves the spoils of Christian character. There are aged Christian men and women in this house who, if they gave testimony, would tell you that in the morning of their life they were after the world as intensely as a hound after a hare, or as a falcon swoops upon a gazelle. They wanted the world's plaudits and the world's gains. They felt that if they could get this world they would have everything.

Some of them started out for the pleasures of the world. They thought that the man who laughed loudest was happiest. They tried repartee and conundrum and burlesque and madrigal. They thought they would like to be Tom Hoods or Charles Lambs or Edgar A. Poes. They mingled wine and music and the spectacular. They were worshippers of the harlequin and the Merry Andrew and the buffoon and the jester. Life was to them foam and bubble and cackling and roystering and grimace. They were so full of glee they could hardly repress their mirth even on solemn occasions, and they came near bursting out hilariously even at the burial, because there was something so dolorous in the tone or countenance of the undertaker.

After a while misfortune struck them hard on the back. They found there was something they could not laugh at. Under their late hours their health gave way, or there was a death in the house. Of every green thing their soul was exfoliated. They found out that life was more than a joke. From the heart of God there blazed into their soul an earnestness they had never felt before. They awoke to their sinfulness and their immortality, and here they sit today at sixty or seventy years of age, as appreciative of all innocent mirth as they ever were, but they are bent on a style of satisfaction which in early life they never hunted; the evening of their days brighter than the morning. In the morning they devoured the prey, but at night they are dividing the spoil.

HUNTING THE DOLLAR.

Then there are others who started out for financial success. They see how limber a man's back is when he bows down before some one transpicious. They felt they would like to see how the world looked from the window of a three-thousand-dollar turnout. They thought they would like to have the morning sunlight tangled in the headgear of a dashing span. They wanted the bridges in the park to resound under the rataplan of their swift hoofs. They wanted a gilded baldrick, and so they started on the dollar hunt. They chased it up one street and chased it down another. They followed it when it burrowed in the cellar. They treed it in the roof. Wherever a dollar was expected to be they were. They chased it across the ocean. They chased it across the land. They stopped not for the night. Hearing that dollar even in the darkness thrilled them as an Adirondack sportsman is thrilled by a loon's laugh. They chased that dollar to the money vault. They chased it to the Government treasury. They routed it from under the counter. All the hounds were out—all the pointers and setters. They leaped the hedges for that dollar and they cried: "Hark, away! a dollar! a dollar!" and when at last they came upon it and had actually captured it, their excitement was like that of a falconer who has successfully flung his first hawk. In the morning of their life, oh, how they devoured the prey!

AN AWAKENING.

But there came a better time to their soul. They found out that an immortal nature cannot live on Government bonds. They took up a Northern Pacific bond, and there was a hole in it through which they could look into the uncertainty of all earthly treasures. They saw some Ralston, living at the rate of twenty-five thousand dollars a month, leaping from San Francisco wharf because he could not continue to live at the same ratio. They saw the wizen and paralytic bankers who had changed their souls into molten gold stamped with the image of the earth, earthy. They saw some great souls by avarice turned into homunculi, and they said to themselves: "I will seek after higher treasure."

From that time they did not care whether they walked or rode if Christ walked with them; nor whether they lived in a mansion or a hut if they dwelt under the shadow of the Almighty; nor whether they were robed in French broadcloth or in homespun if they had the robe of the Saviour's righteousness; nor whether they were sandalled with morocco or calf-skin if they were shod with the preparation of the Gospel. Now, you see peace on their countenance. Now, that man says: "What a fool I was to be enchanted with this world! Why, I have more satisfaction in five minutes in the service of God than I had in all the first years of my life while I was gain-getting. I like this evening of my day a great deal better than I did the morning. In the morning I greedily devoured the prey; but now it is evening, and I am gloriously dividing the spoil."

My friends, this world is a poor thing to hunt. It is healthful to go out in the woods and hunt.

It rekindles the lustre of the eye. It strikes the brown of the autumnal leaf into the cheek. It gives to the rheumatic limbs a strength to leap like the roe. Christopher North's pet gun, the muckle-mounted Meg, going off in the summer in the forests, had its echo in the winter time in the eloquence that rang through the University halls of Edinburgh. It is healthy to go hunting in the fields; but I tell you that it is belittling and bedwarfing and belaming for a man to hunt this world. The hammer comes down on the gun-cap and the barrel explodes and kills you instead of that which you are pursuing.

When you turn out to hunt the world, the world turns out to hunt you; and as many a sportsman aiming his gun at a panther's heart has gone down under the striped claws, so while you have been attempting to devour this world, the world has been devouring you. So it was with Lord Byron. So it was with Coleridge. So it was with Catherine of Russia. Henry II. went out hunting for this world, and its lances stuck through his heart. Francis I. aimed at the world, but the assassin's dagger put an end to his ambition and his life with one stroke. Mary Queen of Scots, wrote on the window of her castle:

"From the top of all my trust Mishap hath laid me in the dust."

The Queen Dowager of Navarre was offered for her wedding-day a costly and beautiful pair of gloves, and she put them on, but they were poisoned gloves and they took her life. Better a bare hand of cold privation than a warm and poisoned glove of ruinous success.

A BAD INFERENCE.

"Oh," says some young man in the audience, "I believe what you are preaching. I am going to do that very thing. In the morning of my life I am going to devour the prey, and in the evening I shall divide the spoil of Christian character. I only want a little while to sow my wild oats and then I will be good." Young man, did you ever take the census of all the old people? How many old people are there in your house? One, two, or none? How many in a vast assemblage like this? Only here and there a gray head, like the patches of snow here and there in the fields on a late April day.

The fact is that the tides of the years are so strong that men go down under them before they get to be sixty, before they get to be fifty, before they get to be forty, before they get to be thirty; and if you, my young brother, resolve now that you will spend the morning of your days in devouring the prey, the probability is that you will never divide the spoil in the evening hour. He who postpones until old age the religion of Jesus Christ, postpones it forever.

THE LOCKED DOOR.

Where are the men who, thirty years ago, resolved to become Christians in old age, putting it off a certain number of years? They never got to be old. The railroad collision or the steamboat explosion or the slip on the ice or the falling ladder or the sudden cold put an end to their opportunities. They have never had an opportunity since, and never will have an opportunity again. They locked the door of heaven against their soul, and they threw away the key; and if they could now break jail and come up shrieking to this audience I do not think they would take two minutes to persuade us all to repentance. They chased the world, and they died in the chase. The wounded tiger turned on them. They failed to take the game that they pursued. Mounted on a swift courser they leaped the hedge, but the courser fell on them and crushed them. Proposing to barter their soul for the world they lost both and got neither.

While this is an encouragement to old people who are yet unpardoned, it is no encouragement to the young who are putting off the day of grace. This doctrine that the old may be repentant is to be taken cautiously. It is medicine that kills or cures. The same medicine given to different patients in one case saves life and in the other destroys it. This possibility of repentance at the close of life may cure the old man while it kills the young. Be cautious in taking it.

A QUICK CHANGE.

Again, my subject is descriptive of those who come to a sudden and radical change. You have noticed how short a time it is from morning to night in winter—eight or ten hours. You know that a winter day has a very brief life. The heart of the longest day beats twenty-four times and then it is dead. How quick the transition in the character of these Benjaminites! "In the morning they shall devour the prey, and at night they shall divide the spoil." Is it possible that there shall be such a transformation in any of our characters? Yes; a man may be at seven o'clock in the morning an all-devouring worldling, and at seven o'clock at night he may be a peaceful distributive Christian. Conversion is instantaneous.

A man passes into the kingdom of God quicker than down the sky runs the zig-zag lightning. A man may be anxious about his soul for a great many years; that does not make him a Christian. A man may pray a great while; that does not make him a Christian. A man may resolve on the reformation of his character and have that resolution going on a great while; that does not make him a Christian. But the very instant when he flings his soul on the mercy of Jesus Christ, that instant is lustration, emancipation, resurrection. Up to that point he is going in the wrong direction; after that point he is going in the right direction. Before that moment he is a child of sin; after that moment he is a child of God. Before that moment, hellward; after that moment, heavenward. Before that moment, devouring the prey; after that moment, dividing the spoil. Five minutes is as good as five years.

My hearer, you know very well that the best things you have done you have DONE IN A FLASH.

You made up your mind in an instant to buy or to sell or to invest or to stop or to start. If you had missed that one chance you would have missed it forever. Now, just as precipitate and quick and spontaneous will be the ransom of your soul. This morning you are making a calculation. You are on the track of some financial or social game. With your pen or pencil you are pursuing it. This very morning you are devouring the prey; but to-night you will be in a different mood. You find that all heaven is offered you. You wonder how you can get it for yourself and for your family. You wonder what resources it will give you now and hereafter. You are dividing peace and comfort and satisfaction and Christian reward in your soul. You are dividing the spoil.

On a Sabbath night at the close of the service I said to some persons: "When did you first become serious about your soul?" and they told me: "To-night." And I said to others: "When did you give your heart to God?" and they said: "To-night." And I said to still others: "When did you resolve to serve the Lord all the days of your life?" and they said: "To-night." I saw by their apparel that when the grace of God struck them they were devouring the prey; but I saw also in the flood of joyful tears and in the kindling raptures on their brow and in their exuberant and transporting utterances that they were dividing the spoil. At night with one touch of electricity all these lights blaze. Oh, I would to God that the darkness of your souls might be broken up and that by one quick, overwhelming, instantaneous flash of illumination you might be brought into the light and the liberty of the sons of God!

You see that religion is a different thing from what some of you people supposed. You thought it was decadence; you thought religion was emaciation; you thought it was highway robbery; that it struck one down and left him half dead; that it plucked out the eyes; that it plucked out the plumes of the soul; that it broke the wing and crushed the beak as it came clawing with its black talons through the air. No; that is not religion. What is religion? It is dividing the spoil. It is taking a defenceless soul and panoplying it for eternal conquest. It is the distribution of prizes by the king's hand, every medal stamped with a coronation. It is an exhilaration; an expansion. It is impardisation. It is enthronement. Religion makes a man master of earth and death and hell. It goes forth to gather the medals of victory won by Prince Emmanuel, and the diadems of heaven and the glories of realms terrestrial and celestial, and then, after ranging all worlds for everything that is resplendent, it divides the spoil.

THE DISTRIBUTION.

What was it that James Turner, the famous English evangelist, was doing when in his dying moment he said: "Christ is all! Christ is all!" Why, he was entering into light; he was rounding the Cape of Good Hope; he was dividing the spoil. What was the aged Christian Quakeress doing when, at eighty years of age, she arose in the meeting one day and said: "The time of my departure is come. My grave-clothes are falling off." She was dividing the spoil.

"She longed with wings to fly away,
And mix with that eternal day."

What is Daniel now doing, the lion-tamer? and Elijah, who was drawn by the flaming coursers? and Paul, the rattling of whose chains made kings quake? and all the other victims of flood and fire and wreck and guillotine? Where are they? Dividing the spoil.

"Ten thousand times ten thousand,
In sparkling raiment bright,
The armies of the ransomed saints
Throng up the steep of light.

"'Tis finished, all is finished,
Their fight with death and sin;
Lift high your golden gates
And let the victors in."

Oh, what a grand thing it is to be a Christian! We begin on earth to divide the spoil, but the distribution will not be completed to all eternity. There is a poverty-struck soul, there is a business-despoiled soul, there is a sin-struck soul, there is a bereaved soul—why do you not come and get the spoils of Christian character, the comfort, the joy, the peace, the salvation that I am sent to offer you in my Master's name? Though your knees knock together in weakness, though your hand tremble in fear, though your eyes rain tears of uncontrollable weeping—come and get the spoils. Rest for all the weary. Pardon for all the guilty. Labor for all the bestormed. Life for all the dead. I verily believe that there are some who have come in here out-cast because the world is against them, and because they feel God is against them, who will go away to-day saying:

"I came to Jesus as I was,
Weary and worn and sad;
I found in Him a resting-place,
And He has made me glad."

Though you came in children of the world, you may go away heirs of heaven. Though you were devouring the prey, now, all worlds witnessing, you may divide the spoil.

FAMINE FARE.

A MEMBER of the Society of Friends, Mr. James Tuke, has recently paid a visit to the west coast of Ireland with the philanthropic motive of relieving the distress existing there. An account of his journey, with a record of the depressing scenes he witnessed, has recently been published. It shows that the condition of the people is truly pitiable, and, though the British Government cannot be held responsible for the misery of the people, it may be hoped that if Ireland obtains the boon of Home Rule some good may come of it to these wretched creatures.

Mr. Tuke states that he saw men and women who looked like animated skeletons scattered among the rocks on the coast gathering a species of sea-weed called "slocaun" to boil for food! They were absolutely without provisions of any kind, and were driven to the hard necessity of using this stuff, which is usually applied as a fertilizer to the land. As they collected it a sharp eye was kept for a stray limpet on the rocks, which was a delicacy much appreciated by the poor starving creatures.

The present distress is largely due to the lack of proper boats for fishing. Such boats as they have are old and rotten, and they have no capacity to build new ones nor money to buy them. Like their fellow-countrymen in other parts of Ireland, the people in the west appear deficient in the quality of self-help which distinguishes the Anglo-Saxon race. They need to be set to work, having no idea of how to go to work themselves. With a little energy much might be done to alleviate their misery, but the poor famished creatures seem to have lost heart. Mr. Tuke has found them ready to brave the perils of the coast when he provided boats for fishing, and willing to work hard for trifling wages when he found work for them. His observations prove conclusively the opinion often expressed that the Irish need a different kind of treatment from other races; institutions under which an American or an Englishman would thrive are of no use to an Irishman, who in some circumstances is as helpless as a child.

IN ONE of his Chicago sermons the evangelist said: "You hear a church-member say, 'There is no harm in a quiet game of cards,' or, if he wants to dance he says, 'Why, what in the world harm is there in dancing?' The way to tell an ungodly man is that he is always talking about what harm is there in this, that, or the other thing, and the way to tell a godly man is, he is always hunting around for something with good in it, and not going about trying to find something that people can see no harm in at all. If there is no harm in cards at all, why I haven't got the time to play cards, and I am sorry for any man that professes to be a true man that has time to play cards; I am sorry for the woman who has time to play cards, and I am sorry for the man and woman that has time to dance. I tell you, brethren, when I look around me and see a sinking world and humanity drifting off from God, and so many sick beds to visit, and see so many that are needy and need sympathy and help, I am not going to spend my time in doing things that you can't say anything better of than that there's no harm in them."

THE THEATRE.

"There was a young lady, a bright young lady, teacher in one of the schools, came to her pastor during his revival. Her conscience was stirred, and she walked up to him and said: 'I want to be a Christian. I want to join your church, but you object to theatre-going, and I can't see any harm in that in the world.' The pastor said to her: 'Sister, give your heart to God, join the church, and go to the theatre as much as you please.' Brethren, I believe I'd go to the theatre every time I wanted to go, but thank God, since I joined the church I never wanted to go. Don't you see? I never got down that low in my religious experience from the day I gave my heart to God to this minute, and whenever I do 'I'm going back,' as an old brother said, 'to the old stump and git it over again, as my first stock is about played out.'"

RECOGNITION.

"Some preachers talk a great deal about recognizing each other in heaven. Well, I don't care so much about that, but what I want is earthly recognition—please recognize me. I am here, and help me all you can, but when I get to glory, and sit down under the shade of the tree of life, and take my harp and strike the chords, if you do not want to recognize me then, don't do it—God bless you, I'm all right then, and I don't care for your recognition."

TEN COMING GREAT EVENTS.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

The Desolating Abomination Set Up in the Rebuilt Jewish Temple—A Period of Unparalleled Tribulation—How it will Begin and Reach its Climax—Why Great Britain will Form Part of the Scene of the Great Tribulation—The Napoleonic Man of Sin—Second Stage of Christ's Coming.

NINTH EVENT.

THE great tribulation and Antichristian persecution for three and a half years will be the second half of the seven years of the Jewish covenant week, for it commences, according to Daniel's prophecy, in the midst of the week, when the Antichristian "prince that shall come,"† will "cause the sacrifices and oblations to cease; and for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate, until the consummation."

This desolating abomination, or idol, as the original Hebrew implies, is shown in Revelation ‡ to be the image of the Antichristian emperor, which is to be set up in the rebuilt Jewish temple when their restored daily sacrifice is forcibly stopped by him in the midst of the seven years; and is referred to in Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14.

"When ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the Prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand), then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains . . . for then shall the Great Tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be; and except those days be shortened, there should no flesh be saved, but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened. . . . Immediately after the tribulation of those days . . . they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (Matt. 24:15-30).

Evidently this

which is immediately followed by the personal Second Coming of the Son of Man, is the same as the unexampled time of trouble, foretold in Daniel 12, to accompany the resurrection at the time of the end, and to continue for three and a half times or years.§

This time of trouble and tribulation which is to occupy the final three and a half years is also predicted to be the period of the last

ANTICHRIST'S PERSECUTION.

"And he (Antichrist) shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws, and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and dividing of time" (Dan. 7:25). And the holy city (Jerusalem) shall they tread under foot forty and two months" (Rev. 11:2). And there was given unto him (Antichrist) a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given to him to make war forty and two months. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them; and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues and nations" (Rev. 13:5, 7).

The manner in which this tribulation will begin and gradually reach this climax of three and a half years, is thus described by Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia: ||

"Thoughtful people will wonder at the amazing upheavals of society around them; they will tremble at the mighty agitations which trouble and confuse everything in Church and State; they will grow pale at the gigantic moves of revolutionists and military despots, and their hearts shall fail them as they attempt to look forward to what the results of all shall be. Some will call it progress; some will call it the result of wrong education of the masses; some will look at it as the work of ambitious or mistaken legislation; some will think it is Liberty rising from her sleep of ages to take dominion of the world. And a thousand theologians, philosophers, and jurists will have as many different solutions of the great problem of upon the earth, without once striking upon the real truth that the Day of Judgment has begun. Signs and wonders shall exist on every hand; but unsuspecting mortals will point to natural causes and explanations, and bigoted sectarians will refuse even to believe their own senses. And the world in all its departments, with here and there a few who are faithful to what God hath written for our learning, shall drift to dissolution without knowing what is transpiring.

"The stupendous occurrences of the Day of Judgment will glide in upon the world as by stealth, and before a great number of even pious people shall be aware that these great scenes have commenced; and while the great mass of worldlings and politicians will not believe in it to the very last, when the Son of Man will blast them forever with His terrific indignation.

"As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away." Perhaps it had rained a month before those wicked scoffers began to feel any special alarm. Perhaps many of them beheld the ark taken up by the swelling waters, and yet stood upon the hill-tops laughing at the old preacher's folly. Though the valleys were all covered, and the waters rose higher and higher every hour, 'they knew not' until all were swept away by the shoreless waves.

"And so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man." The nations shall be undergoing their judgment, the sainted dead shall be raised, the sainted living shall be translated, and the whole earth shall heave with the throes of judgment already present, and yet multitudes will go on as they did before, and refuse to believe what is transpiring. Nations in their desperation will go on to declare war, and make treaties and form alliances, and join their armies, and gather together their warriors against the Lamb and His people, until at last, to their everlasting consternation, the Son of Man shall appear with His sainted hosts."

This approaching tribulation and persecution will prevail as much in Great Britain, as in France, Spain, Italy, etc., because it is one of the ten kingdoms of the Roman Empire indicated by the ten horns* of the wild beast and ten toes of Daniel's prophetic image. These ten in a confederacy (as enumerated under our first leading event), will be Papal Red Republics during several months before the final three and a half years, and then during those three and a half years ten kings elected over them by universal suffrage will be allied in a Latin Confederation under the Napoleonic Antichrist as their Emperor, and will decree the abolition of Christianity, the same as in France in 1793, and will establish the worship of that Imperial Antichrist as the only religion. Millions of true Christians will everywhere be beheaded for refusing to worship that Roman Emperor, or his image, which will be set up throughout those ten kingdoms, or to receive his mark on their foreheads or hands, as fully described in the thirteenth chapter of Revelation (see Rev. 13:17-18; 14:9; 15:2; 16:2; 20:4).

This latter-day democratic Cæsar will be the Man of Sin, who, in connection with that great infidel apostasy, or general falling away from Christian faith in the last days, is to sit in the rebuilt temple in Jerusalem, and to be worshipped as a god, and to be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's personal Coming (see 11 Thess. 2).*

(To be concluded.)

THE OPIUM CURSE IN CHINA.

In a letter published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Atwood gives a sad picture of the difficulties the missionaries in China have to encounter through the prevalence of the opium habit. He is laboring at Tai-ku, and last summer he opened an opium refuge at a village eight miles off, called Li Man Chuang. He describes how some of the habitués after being cured have returned to their habit. He says: "They seemed to have no stamina at all, but fell before temptation as easily as the thistle-down moves before the wind. The only motive they have to break off seems to be their straitened circumstances, and as soon as they can get a few dollars ahead they are anxious to indulge again in the enslaving habit. The fearful effects on their systems, the prospect of certain financial ruin in the end, and the great discomfort experienced in reforming, seem to make little impression upon them. I suppose we ought not to expect permanent reformation until the stronger motives presented in the Gospel are known and felt by them, and even then we are told by those older in experience that a church member who is a reformed opium-smoker is to be spoken of with fear and trembling.

"The prospect before us is not bright when we take into account the fact that in the cities nine-tenths of the men and all the women, probably, are slaves to the drug; while in the villages the number of those who use it is far above one half, and probably more than two thirds, of all the people. At the present rate of increase in the use of the drug a few decades more will suffice almost to depopulate the plain. The most discouraging feature about it is that they do not want to give up the habit. They cling to it as if it were the dearest boon. Nothing but the motive power of the Gospel and the very power of God Himself can bring these people out of this bondage."

BISHOP HANNINGTON'S MARTYRDOM.

VERY vague reports continue to arrive of the murder of Bishop Hannington in Central Africa. They all agree that the bishop was killed, but why was he killed and how, are questions about which there is still a mystery. The most detailed account yet received comes from the bishop's African companion, Rev. William Jones, who accompanied him as far as Sundu's village. The expedition had already been in danger of starvation when it reached that point, and the man Jones was directed by the bishop to remain at Sundu's village with part of the expedition, while he went forward with fifty men.

What followed appears to have been learned from four of the party who escaped when the bishop was killed. They state that ten days after leaving Sundu's village the bishop and his men found themselves in a country abounding with plantain trees. There the bishop had an interview with the chief of the country, who demanded a large present. The bishop made him a present, though not so large a one as he demanded. Soon afterward the chief sent men to conduct the bishop to a place from which he could see the lake. He accompanied them with one follower. The remainder of his party lost sight of the bishop, but one of them who had strayed from the rest caught sight of him and his follower, and was horrified to see that they were both bound with ropes. He told his companions what he had seen, and they were terror-stricken.

The bishop seems to have been kept in confinement for eight days, while an appeal was made to a great chief. At the end of that time there was a great deal of shouting and drumming among the natives, and the men of the bishop's party were caught and tied together two and two. That evening they were all led out into the bush, the bishop and Pinto, the man whom he took with him when he went to see the lake, being in front. Those two were shot, others were speared, and some were kept as slaves. The four men who escaped, and subsequently rejoined Jones at Sundu's village, gave no satisfactory account of their escape. They say that they wandered about singly for some time, but all finally made their way to Sundu's village, whence with the men there they returned to Zanzibar.

Jones has much to say about his own sufferings, and the goodness of the Lord to him. To his rambling narrative, the agents of the Church Missionary Society at Zanzibar add: "We believe about ten men were spared as being useful slaves in some capacity, and we trust they may yet return. One of the Zanzibar porters was among the first of those led to execution, and close to the bishop and Pinto when they were shot and speared. He was himself speared in the mouth and forearm, fell, and feigned death, and did not see his companions killed, but the other man who escaped, by slipping behind the bush, speaks of several men who were spared, some because they could read English, others masons, one gunsmith, and the bishop's boy Almass, because the Wasoga could not unlock the packages without him. You will observe that four porters escaped and returned to the coast. The missionaries who have examined them all are of opinion that we must consider the details very uncertain, owing to the conflicting testimony of the men."

A PROVIDENTIAL GUEST.

WE are enjoined (Heb. 13:2) to "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." The Denver News relates the following incident, which shows that even unintentional and unconscious hospitality may bring a blessing:

"The dark days of the riots came on, Celestials were hiding in every conceivable place, some of them breaking for the prairies and open country or seeking refuge at the ranches of farmers within a dozen miles of the city. Among the fugitives was Ching Lee, with his place of business sacked and destroyed, and a howling mob hunting him down. He sought a hiding-place in the wagon of a farmer living near Golden. Fearing almost to breathe, the terrified Celestial lay flat in the bottom of the wagon until the barn of the ranchman was reached. The latter, all unsuspecting of the living freight he had brought from town, unhitched, fed, and cared for his horses, and went into the house. Ching lay very quiet, listening to the retreating footsteps of the farmer. These had hardly died away before his quick ears caught other sounds, evidently coming from the corner of the barn. Ching had pretty well mastered the English language, and understood the meaning of a whispered conversation evidently between two men concealed in the hay-loft.

"'Sh!' said a voice, 'he is not in the house.'

"'Do you think he brought much money back with him?' asked another voice.

"'Yes, he took a great deal of stuff in town, and, besides, I heard him say that, on account of the riots, he would draw his money out of the bank, as it would be safer at home.'

"Cowering down in the wagon, the Chinaman never moved until he saw in the dim twilight the figures of two men stealthily making their way through the barn door, which they softly closed behind them. No sooner were they out of sight than Ching leaped quickly from the wagon and noiselessly crawling on his hands and knees arrived at a clump of bushes near the house. He saw one of the ruffians slowly raising one of the lattices, while the other stood behind him with a large revolver cocked, and with his finger on the trigger. Lying on the ground near him

Ching saw a piece of heavy wood, evidently used as the handle of a pump which was near by. Seizing this with both hands, he rose from his crouching position, and dealt the robber nearest him a terrible blow on the head, felling him to the ground. The pistol the robber carried went off at the same moment, and the other robber fell accidentally shot.

"The report aroused the farmer, who came to the door with a revolver in his hand, with which he covered the Chinaman.

"'Who are you, and what do you want?' he asked, addressing Ching. 'Me Chinaman. Bad Melican man killee you and take money,' said Ching, pointing to the men, who were beginning to show life.

"'How did you get there?' asked Goldsmith.

"'Me hide in your wagon; come from Denver.'

"Gradually the situation dawned upon the farmer, and, seeing the club, which was still grasped by Ching, and its terrible effect on one of the ruffians, he realized that the Chinaman had been the means of saving his property and probably his life. With Ching's assistance the two men were securely bound and taken to the city, where they were tried and sentenced to ten years in Cañon Penitentiary. Ching entered the farmer's service, and is now a permanent fixture on the ranch."

THREE CRIPPLES HEALED.

AT a recent meeting at Bethshan a mother rose to give the following testimony as published in Thy Healer of May 1st: "I rise with thankfulness to God, to tell you that, when first I heard of Bethshan, this little boy in front of me, was a helpless cripple. Three years ago, I wrote to Bethshan; but circumstances, and my own health, kept me from coming. I put it into the Lord's hands, and told Him He could heal us there and then, in our own room, without using any means. The little boy had been several times to different hospitals, and had just come home a mere skeleton, from a nine months' stay at a Home at Tunbridge Wells; he was only skin and bones. The doctor offered to take him and galvanize him, but I said: 'Lord, if Thou art willing for him to be healed, Thou canst heal him without galvanism;' and while I was praying, he started off walking all at once by himself, and from that time he has been getting well.

"For seven or eight years past, I have been almost a cripple myself, not able to do anything at all for the family. I put my case into the Lord's hands, and this winter, I have done what I have never done for eight years, I have walked miles and miles to my work, and have worked at a gentleman's house during the whole of the day, and on Sundays I can go out to service three times a day. Not a day passes without my walking miles.

"I have a little girl who had been suffering from eczema from the age of two years. She had been seven times an in-patient of different hospitals; nothing seemed to do her any good. I put her in the Lord's hands, and, at the present time, with the exception of a slight weakness in her eyes, she is well. There is not a sore on her head. This is the first spring she has had any hair on her head, and she will be nine years of age next May."

A SOLDIER'S LOST DIARY.

ONE prominent characteristic of the converted man, and a safe indication of the reality of the spiritual change that has taken place in him, is a quickening of his love for his fellow-men. Even to strangers, with whom he has had no dealings, he feels kind, and is ready to do them a service. "Why should you take the trouble?" he is often asked by those who are worldly. "You will get nothing by it." He does not expect anything, but he delights to do a kind act from a higher motive than any that the world recognizes (Eph. 4:32). Sometimes, however, an act of disinterested kindness does bear fruit in this life. It did so in a case which is thus related in the Louisville Courier-Journal:

"A marriage has just taken place at Forsyth, Ga., which resulted from an act of kindness performed by a young lady. During Sherman's famous march to the sea, the army while marching from Atlanta to Savannah, camped one night on the plantation of Mr. J. T. Goodman, a wealthy citizen. It was a night of terror for those in the big farm-house, who had heard exaggerated reports of the doings of the invaders. They watched through closed shutters all night long the camp-fires surrounding the place, not daring to speak above a whisper. Daylight found the column on the march again and as the last man disappeared, the children sallied forth to examine the deserted camp. Among the articles found was a knapsack, in which was a diary, which showed that its owner had served in a Kansas regiment from the first year of the war, and that his name was Davis T. Rogers, of Logan, Kan.

"Miss Donnie, the youngest of the children, took possession of the diary, and when she grew older read with deep interest the thrilling story it contained of the perils of a soldier's life. Five years ago she wrote to the address, expressing her readiness to return the memento if its owner should be alive. A grateful answer was received, both from Mr. Rogers and his wife. The two ladies thereafter kept up a pleasant correspondence. One year ago a letter, bordered in black, came from Mr. Rogers, in which he stated that his wife was dead; that, at the urgent solicitation of his children he wrote his Southern friend the fact. Still later, Miss Goodman received a second letter from Mr. Rogers, stating that he was about to make a business trip to North Carolina, and that he would take occasion to call upon her. The visit was paid, and the acquaintance commenced in correspondence, developed rapidly after the personal meeting, and it has just culminated in a marriage between the Northern veteran and the Southern belle."

AN AFRICAN PRIEST CONVERTED.

A NATIVE deacon of Monrovia, Mr. M. P. Keda, relates a remarkable incident in the current number of the Spirit of Missions. From his narrative it appears that Dano Dowe, the high-priest of the Gedeobos, a native tribe, and his wife have received Christian baptism on confession of faith. Bodiowe, the father of Dano Dowe, also was high-priest of the Gedobos before him, but being a man of wealth and influence with his own tribe and with surrounding tribes, he excited the jealousy of certain prominent men who laid a plot to destroy him. They accused him of sorcery, and, high-priest though he was, he was required to undergo the ordeal of "sassawood." The poisonous bark, of course, proved fatal, and Bodiowe paid the penalty of his eminence.

The office of high-priest was then offered to his eldest son, but the young man, indignant at his father's fate, fiercely refused to accept the office. Dano Dowe, his younger brother, who was of gentler disposition, was prevailed upon to accept, and was duly installed in office. Shortly after his accession, a woman was accused of witchcraft, and was hurried away to the woods, to undergo the "sassawood ordeal." Dowe, doubtless moved thereto by the memory of his father, hastened after the crowd when he heard of what was being done. He came upon them before the fatal draught had been administered, and exhibiting the black monkey-skin, the insignia of his office, overturned the bowl of sassawood, and carried the woman away with him. That same night an excited mob went to the high-priest's abode, seized the woman by force, and carried her to the woods, where they put her to death.

Dowe, in anger, thereupon renounced his office and his tribe, and removed to Cavalla. The injustice and cruelty he had witnessed disgusted him with religion. At Cavalla he heard the story of the Cross, and was converted. Mr. Keda states that both he and his wife have been baptized, and are preparing to preach the Gospel to their tribe.

If, after this, any of our friends hear or read that "the only authorized, revised, and verbatim reports of the sermons of the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage" are published in any magazine or journal, they have the best authority in the world for refusing to believe any such statement.

"The Christian Herald" has for many years had full permission to publish my sermons. I shall continue to revise them for this paper which is growing with miraculous rapidity in circulation influence and moral power.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Long Neglected Duty was Performed by the House, of Representatives last week. It may be hoped that the example will be followed by the Senate without delay. The duty in question was the passage, by an almost unanimous vote, of a bill commanding the Interior Department to "immediately" adjust or determine and settle the railroad land grants. While these land grants have been left undefined two evils have existed. The companies did not pay taxes on the lands they had not actually occupied, and as no one else paid taxes on them there was local and general loss. Also, the land could not be sold or granted to settlers because it was reserved for the use of the companies in case they needed it. It will be a good thing for the country if Mr. Lamar is empowered to proceed with this business immediately.

The River and Harbor Bill Passed the House on Thursday. The amount appropriated is about fifteen millions. A few small items were cut down, and the expenditure on others made contingent on State action; but the bill was passed substantially as reported. The vote was 142 to 102. It is predicted that the Senate will add two or three millions to it. It would appear that the Representatives who voted for it are either not well informed, or have not retentive memories. Some very active gentlemen have now the prefix "ex" attached to their title of "Member of Congress" which would not have been there had they, four years ago, voted against a similar bill. Their fate ought to have been a warning effective for more than four years.

The Proposal to Change the Date of Inauguration Day from March 4th to April 30th was advocated last week by a favorable report in the Senate of the joint resolution for a constitutional amendment. Mr. Ingalls is the author of the resolution. The motive for the change is that the second session of every Congress is now inconveniently curtailed. It is proposed to commence by lengthening the life of the Fiftieth Congress and the present Presidential term to April 30th, 1889. There is a general feeling in both Houses in favor of this change. The first President was not inaugurated until April 30th, 1789, and it is proposed to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of that day by the inauguration of his successor in 1889.

The Frightful Riot Which Occurred in Chicago on May 4th is an ominous intimation of the extent to which the anarchists have promulgated their demoniacal doctrines. A Socialist meeting was held in the evening in the old Haymarket, and August Spies and a few other Socialists were present to harangue the meeting. About nine o'clock, while a Socialist was delivering a violent speech inciting to riot, a squad of police arrived with the intention of dispersing the gathering. Their appearance was greeted with curses from the wagon which formed the platform for the speakers, and when they approached the wagon three dynamite bombs were thrown between the second and third ranks of the police. The explosion was horrible in its effects. Five policemen fell, and a large number dragged themselves away torn and lacerated. The unhurt policemen immediately drew their revolvers and fired round after round into the mob. The place was strewn with the dead and dying, and the adjacent police stations were turned into temporary hospitals. Four policemen were killed outright, and twenty-seven dangerously wounded. How many rioters were killed and wounded is unknown, as they were promptly picked up and carried away by their friends. On the following day the police raided the headquarters of the Socialists and made several arrests. They discovered quantities of arms and bombs similar to those thrown at the police. The prisoners captured are Poles, Germans, and Irish. There was not an American or an Englishman among them. All public meetings are now prohibited, and at the request of the mayor the services Mr. Moody was holding in the Rink were discontinued.

A Prohibition Vote was Taken in the New York Legislature on Thursday last and was defeated. The question was whether a Prohibition Amendment should be submitted to the people. The ayes were fifty-three and the noes sixty-three. One member before voting fearlessly expressed his opinion of the influences which were at work. He said: "I believe that when a respectable body of voters ask for the submission of such an amendment as this to the judgment of the State, that we ought to comply with their demand. I regard the act of certain Assemblymen, in voting against this amendment, as an act of cowardice. Why? Simply because they are afraid of the liquor vote. I vote yea."

The Labor Troubles in New York and Other cities continued to cause uneasiness throughout the week. An attempt to settle the Third Avenue car strike was made, but proved abortive, the terms arranged by the company and a committee of the Union being repudiated by the men. The strike on the Gould roads was declared off. At Milwaukee, Wis., there was a riot on May 5th, led, as in Chicago, by the Poles. They threatened to wreck the Bay View Rolling Mills. Governor Rusk being notified sent the State militia to protect the mills, but the anarchists stoned the militia and marched fifteen hundred strong to attack the mills. The major of the militia called upon the mob to halt, but they disobeyed, and then he gave the order to fire. Ten men fell, and the crowd retreated. Five were killed, and five fatally wounded. An attempt is being made to induce Congress to pass a law restricting immigration discriminating against Socialists. The workingmen's Unions are in favor of such a law, as the operations of the foreign Socialists bring disgrace on the cause of labor.

The Opening of the Colonial Exhibition in London, on May 4th, was made the occasion for a royal pageant. The Queen and her sons and nobles went in procession to the inaugural ceremony. The rarity of Her Majesty's appearance in public caused an enormous crowd to assemble, and more loyal enthusiasm was manifested than has been shown of late. Lord Tennyson, the poet-peer, wrote an ode for the occasion, which was set to music and sung by a carefully trained choir, and was the chief feature of the entertainment. The poet alludes in his ode to the United States as "That young eagle of the West." A few years ago he referred to our nation as the "gigantic daughter of the West." He predicts that England will not again be careless of her growing kin. Our Canadian friends will be encouraged by this assurance, to which, it is stated, the Queen nodded her approval when she heard it sung.

The Reply of Greece to the Ultimatum of the European Powers is regarded as equivocal. The first step of the process of coercion has consequently been taken. The ambassadors of Germany, England, Austria, and Italy, have left the Greek capital, and the united fleets of those nations have blockaded her ports. The action is generally regarded as precipitate, and a needless humiliation of the Greek Government. The king is between two fires, being threatened with revolution and deposition by his subjects if he yields to the Powers. His answer to the ultimatum was consequently a delicate task. In rejecting it the Powers have apparently shown scant consideration of Greek susceptibilities. The French Government continues to act as mediator, and will, it is hoped, succeed in averting war.

Renewed Nihilistic Activity is Reported from Russia. The Nihilists have been plotting to prevent the Czar returning to St. Petersburg from Livadia, where he has been staying. They have been found operating on every route by which he can make the journey. Many arrests have been made, but it is not known whether some fatal oversight may not have been made which would cost Alexander his life on his way back to the capital. They have also come to close quarters with him by setting fire to the forests which surround the Imperial palace at Livadia. It was only by extraordinary exertions that the fire was prevented spreading to the trees in the Imperial park. As it was, the smoke from the burning forests rendered residence in the palace uncomfortable.

The Public Discussion of Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule scheme was continued last week with unabated acrimony. The most significant incident of the debate was a letter by Lord Randolph Churchill pledging the Conservative party, as far as he was entitled to speak for it, never to propose Home Rule for Ireland, nor any measure in that direction. The declaration will tend to cement the alliance between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell, as proving that no concessions of value can be expected from the Conservatives. Prior to its publication there was a prevalent impression that the Conservatives were prepared to outbid the Liberals. The debate proves that Mr. Gladstone was right in regarding the question as one antagonizing classes. The wealthy have everywhere spoken against the scheme, while the poorer classes—the great mass of the people—are in its favor. At the meeting of the National Liberal Federation, which is practically a national convention of the Liberal party, held on May 6th, Mr. Gladstone was indorsed by an overwhelming majority, and when one of the speakers alluded to Mr. Chamberlain as "a traitor" the meeting applauded vigorously. Mr. Chamberlain, who was present, appeared to be irritated by the epithet.

Dr. Talmage informs us that Next Sunday he will commence a series of sermons on the all-absorbing Labor Question. Among the branches of the subject with which the sermons will deal are: "The Battle for Bread;" "The Rights of Capital and Labor;" "Hardships of the Working-Classes;" "How Employers and Employes Ought to Treat Each Other;" "The Greatest Foe of Labor." Verbatim reports will appear as usual in this journal.

An Invitation to a Convention in England, this summer, has been forwarded to this office, with a request that it be published for the benefit of any reader who may contemplate making a transatlantic trip. American friends interested in the study of prophecy will be cordially welcomed to the Third Annual Convention to be held in the Conference Hall, Clapham Road, London, on June 15th, and two following days. The subjects for consideration are: "The Personal Pre-Millennial Advent of Christ;" "The Manifestation of a Personal Antichrist;" "The Character of the Great Tribulation;" "The Connection Between Babylon and the Beast;" "Israel's Prospects and Place in the Millennium;" "What Nations will Satan Deceive after the Millennium, etc., etc."

A Convention of Christian Workers will be held in Chicago, commencing on June 16th, and continuing for eight days. The invitation issued for the meeting is signed Dr. George F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Dr. Henry Wilson and Dr. Dowkontt, of New York, Messrs. J. H. Cole and George R. Clarke, of Chicago, and many others. The object of the Convention, as defined in the invitation, is for Christian workers to seek and to give information concerning methods, difficulties, defeats, encouragements, or successes. Topics of vital practical importance might also be discussed, such as "The Relation of this Work to the Churches;" "How Best to Co-operate, to Help and Get Help;" "Methods in Winning Souls;" "The Best Way to Build up Converts;" "The Christian Worker's Relation to the Enforcement of Laws Against Evils which Entice Men into Sin;" "How to Secure Workers," and others of a like import. Names of persons desiring to attend, should be sent to John C. Collins, English Hall, New Haven, Conn. Send a stamped envelope for reply, giving further information.

Dr. Phillips Brooks, of Boston, was Elected assistant Bishop for the diocese of Pennsylvania, by the Protestant Episcopal Convention at Philadelphia, on May 6th. Eight ballots were taken, the Low Church clergymen voting for Dr. Brooks, and the High Church for Dr. T. F. Davies, of Philadelphia. On the eighth ballot Dr. Brooks received 82 votes, in a total of 161. It is reported that Dr. Brooks has assured his Boston church that he will not leave it to accept the bishopric.

A Remarkable Revival has Taken Place at Springfield, Ill., under the preaching of the Rev. Thomas Harrison, "the boy preacher." Nearly eighteen hundred persons have already made a profession of faith in Christ, and the interest in the meetings is still increasing. At a great jubilee meeting recently held, Bishop Bowman preached, and the clergy of other denominations in the city took part in the service of thanksgiving.

A Decision Against the Exhibition of Statues representing the nude figure, was given by the Recorder in Montreal on May 1st. The defendants were jewellers who had exposed two such statues in their windows. The Recorder declined to sentence them as there was evidence that they had acted in good faith, but he declared the practice illegal, and uttered some emphatic criticisms on the growing taste for such "works of art." In the course of his decision he expressed his opinion that the exposure of the statues exercised a pernicious effect on public morals, and said that it would familiarize the people with sensuality, make it admired, make it loved, and thereby be in direct opposition to the principles of Christianity, which forbids all that is inspired by the view of such statues. A man had only to consult his own instinct to study his own heart to know what the view of such nudity can produce on youth.

A Blurred Page in a Bible formed the Subject of an excited legal discussion in the Surrogate's Court of New York on May 5th. An effort is being made by a lady to prove that she is the daughter of the late Professor William Darling, and consequently has a claim on his estate. In the course of the case reference was made to the family Bible on the fly-leaf of which is the record of births, marriages, and deaths. The entry which the lady asserts has reference to her was found to be badly blurred. The name, especially, having the appearance of having been manipulated, as if for erasure or alteration. The case is not concluded, but it is evident that it is a matter of very serious concern to the lady to prove that she is the person indicated in that entry in the Bible. Happily for the Christian who calls God his Father and refers to the Bible for proof, his claim cannot be disputed on the ground of indefiniteness in the acknowledgment of the relationship (Rom. 8:14).

A Girl Seventy-seven Years Old Died in New York on May 3d. The death was sudden and unexpected. It, therefore, was necessary to notify the coroner, and the facts of her history found their way into the press. The peculiarity of the case was that, though born in 1809, the deceased was to the day of her death a child in form, stature, and organization. It was stated that up to the year 1820, when she was eleven years old, her development was normal. She was four feet three inches in height, and had no unusual appearance. But in that year she had a severe illness, and, when she recovered, all physical growth and development ceased. Intellectually, she was extremely bright, learned quickly, and became very accomplished. Her hair grew until, when released from its coils, it reached to her feet, but in no other respect did she change from her appearance as a child, until her hair became gray. The medical profession is deeply interested in the case, as it has never been known before for a person who stopped growing in that particular way to attain a greater age than twenty-five. If the physicians, however, were to compare their experience with the experience of any conscientious clergyman, they would find that he is only too familiar with cases of arrested development, and it would not have been considered unique even in apostolic days (Heb. 5:12).

A Remarkable Family Circle, Presenting a bewildering mixture of relationships, is gathered in a home in Pennsylvania. A Philadelphia journal, in reporting a birth of twins in a certain family, endeavors to make the matter of their relationship clear to its readers. It appears that three young ladies, the daughters of well-to-do farmers, were married at the same time on July 4th, 1879, at Bushville, Pa. The three brides were Emma and Jennie, who were sisters, and Laura, who was their intimate friend. A year afterward each of the ladies was the mother of an infant, but death visited each household—Jennie and Laura were both widows, and soon afterward Emma died. Emma's widowed husband wanted a wife who would be kind to his motherless daughter, and induced his late wife's sister, Jennie, to marry him. The widow Laura also married, her husband being the brother of Jennie's first husband. In 1881, Jennie and Laura were mothers a second time, and thus in Jennie's house there were three children, and in Laura's two. Before the end of another year Laura died, and Jennie lost her second husband. Laura's bereaved husband then offered himself to Jennie, who accepted him, and the five children thus strangely related came together under one roof. Jennie has now added twins to the family group. Thus, there are seven children under six years old now under Jennie's care, lovingly tended as one family, but united by a greater variety of relationships than were surely ever found under one roof before. To the children, however, it is not the variety of parentage that is important, but the bond of love and dependence which is common to them all. So will it be when men of all nationalities and all denominations come to the marriage supper of the Lamb and sit down with the patriarchs rejoicing in the love of one Saviour (John 10:16).

A Dividing Line Across the Pacific has been agreed upon by two governments as a preventive of future trouble. A cable dispatch received last week states that Germany and England have agreed upon a line of demarkation to separate their possessions in the South Pacific. The line starts at a point near White Rock, in the eighth parallel of south latitude, and crosses the Salomon Islands, leaving three large northerly islands—Bougainville, Choiseul, and San Isabel, in possession of Germany. Afterward it passes in a northeasterly direction toward the Marshall Islands. The Samoan and Tonga islands will remain neutral. The agreement stipulates mutual freedom of trade in the South Pacific, and reciprocal treatment of British and German ships. Land disputes shall be referred to a mixed commission. Any doubt that may arise about the exact position of the line will obviously be determined more decisively by reference to the maps at London or Berlin than in the Pacific itself. So it is with the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Satan in this world. Men are often wrongly classed, but the Lord knoweth them that are His (II Timothy 2:19).

A Singular Experience of a Union Soldier was related last week to a gentleman who expressed his surprise at the enthusiasm manifested in the South over Jefferson Davis's visit. He stated that he was captured during the war while on a journey to carry important information to a Union general. The prisoner looked forward to cruel treatment, but was determined to be mute. One day Jefferson Davis himself came to the town where he was, and he and about a dozen other Yankee prisoners were called before him. The prisoner concluded that the moment of his severest ordeal had come. He said: "The careworn face of the Confederate President lighted up with a smile as he saw the prisoners, and he made the following speech: 'This day is the birthday of my mother, and I promised her long ago that on this day I would always do some good deed in her remembrance. Now, for her sake and for the love I owe her I set you all free.' I ship Mr. Davis, every year," said the grateful man, "a box of the finest fish that can be caught in these waters." It did not matter to Mr. Davis on that day who and what the men were; his thoughts were of his mother. There is an illustration here of a truth that preachers often vainly try to get men to believe (I John 2:12).

A Humorous Practical Reproof was administered to a college student at Harvard a few days ago. The young man was noted during the early months of his college course for his close attention to study, and for his sociable habits during his leisure hours. Recently, however, he formed the acquaintance of a young lady to whom he became engaged. His classmates took a lively interest in the case, and as long as his visits to the lady were limited to once a week they only sympathized, but when the visits reached five, six, and even seven times in a single week the boys felt that something ought to be done. A few nights later, after a protracted meeting at the house of the young lady, upon stepping out upon the piazza to take leave of her, the student found that the entire contents of his room—even to trunks, curtains, and bedroom furniture—had been removed during the evening and disposed around the yard and piazza. The young men evidently intended their companion to understand that, as the new connection had encroached so much on the old one, he would be more consistent if he severed the latter in form as well as in fact. There would be some strange spectacles to be seen if a similar admonition were given to all church members who have deserted their places in the prayer-meeting for the theatre and dancing-party (I Kings 18:21).

THE THREE HOURS' DARKNESS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour."—MATTHEW 27:45.

The Miracle of Christ's Weakness—The Traditions of the Time—I. The Amazing Miracle—Not an Eclipse—Its Import—II. The Concealing Veil—An Awful Sight—Embittered by Mockery—A Concealment for the Wicked—For Jesus—For the Mysterious Passion—III. The Instructive Symbol—Of God's Wrath—Of Christ's Suffering—IV. Prophetic Sympathy—Darkness Till Christ Comes.

FROM nine till noon the usual degree of light was present; so that there was time enough for our Lord's adversaries to behold and insult His sufferings. There could be no mistake about the fact that He was really nailed to the cross; for He was crucified in broad daylight. We are fully assured that it was Jesus of Nazareth, for both friends and foes were eye-witnesses of His agonies; for three long hours the Jews sat down and watched Him on the cross, making jests of His miseries. I feel thankful for those three hours of light; for else the enemies of our faith would have questioned whether in very deed the blessed body of our Master was nailed to the tree, and would have started fancies as many as the bats and owls which haunt the darkness.

What a call must that mid-day midnight have been to the careless sons of men! They knew not that the Son of God was among them; nor that He was working out human redemption. The grandest hour in all history seemed likely to pass by unheeded, when, suddenly, night hastened from her chambers and usurped the day. Every one asked his fellow,

"WHAT MEANS THIS DARKNESS?"

I do not wonder that there should be traditions of strange things that were said during the hush of that darkness. Those whispers of the past may or may not be true; they have been the subject of learned controversy, but the labor of the dispute was energy ill spent. Yet we could not have wondered if one did say as he is reported to have done, "God is suffering, or the world is perishing." Nor should I drive from my beliefs the poetic legend that an Egyptian pilot passing down the river heard among the reedy banks a voice out of the rustling rushes, whispering, "The great Pan is dead." Truly, the God of nature was expiring, and things less tender than the reeds by the river might well tremble at the sound thereof.

There must be great teaching in this darkness; for when we come so near the cross, which is the centre of history, every event is full of meaning. Light will come out of this darkness. I love to feel the solemnity of the three hours of death-shade, and to sit down therein and meditate, with no companion but the august Sufferer around whom that darkness lowered.

THE AMAZING MIRACLE.

I. First, let us view this darkness as a miracle which amazes us.

It may seem a trite observation that this darkness was altogether out of the natural course of things. Although the Lord makes it His order that there shall be day and night, He in this case with abundant reason interposes three hours of night in the centre of a day. Behold the reason. The unusual in lower nature is made to consort with the unusual in the dealings of nature's Lord. Certainly this miracle was most congruous with that greater miracle which was happening in the death of Christ. Was not the Lord himself departing from all common ways? Was he not doing that which had never been done from the beginning, and would never be done again? That man should die is so common a thing as to be deemed inevitable. But that the Son of God should die, this is beyond all expectation, and not only above nature, but contrary thereto. He who is equal with God deigns to hang upon the cross, and die. I know of nothing that seems more out of rule and beyond expectation than this. The sun darkened at noon is a fit accompaniment of the death of Jesus. Is it not so?

Further, this miracle was not only out of the order of nature, but it was one which would have been pronounced impossible. It is not possible that there should be an eclipse of the sun at the time of the full moon. The moon at the time when she is in her full is not in a position in which she could possibly cast her shadow upon the earth. The Passover was at the time of the full moon, and therefore it was not possible that the sun should then undergo an eclipse. This darkening of the sun was not strictly an astronomical eclipse; the darkness was doubtless produced in some other way; yet to those who were present it did seem to be a total eclipse of the sun—a thing impossible. Ah, brothers! when we come to deal with man and the fall and sin and God and Christ and the atonement, we are at home with impossibilities.

IMPOSSIBILITIES ACHIEVED.

How should the Holy One have sin laid upon Him? That I do not know. A wise man has told us, as if it were an axiom, that the imputation or the non-imputation of sin is an impossibility. Be it so: we have become familiar with such things since we have beheld the cross. Things which men call absurdities have become foundation truths to us. The doctrine of the cross is to them that perish foolishness. As it was so, that the sun was eclipsed when it was impossible that he should be eclipsed, so has Jesus performed on our behalf, in the agonies of His death, things which, in the ordinary judgment of men, must be set down as utterly impossible. Our faith is at home in wonderland, where the Lord's thoughts are seen to be as high above our thoughts as the heavens are above the earth.

And now, when I come to think of it, this darkness appears to have been most natural and fitting. If we had to write out the story of our Lord's death we could not omit the darkness without neglecting a most important item. The darkness seems a part of the of that great transaction. Read the story through and you are not at all startled with the darkness; after once familiarizing your mind with the thought that this is the Son of God, and that He stretches His hands to the cruel death of the cross, you do not wonder at the rending of the veil of the temple; you are not astonished at the earthquake or at the rising of certain of the dead. These are proper attendants of our Lord's passion; and so is the darkness. It drops into its place, it seems as if it could not have been otherwise.

I cannot say more from want of voice, though I had many more things to say. Sit down, and let the thick darkness cover you till you cannot even see the cross, and only know that out of reach of mortal eye your Lord wrought out the redemption of His people. He wrought in silence a miracle of patience and of love, by which light has come to those who sit in darkness and in the valley of the shadow of death.

THE CONCEALING VEIL.

II. Secondly, I desire you to regard this darkness as a veil which conceals. The Christ is hanging on yonder tree. I see the dreadful cross. I can see the thieves on either side. I look around, and I sorrowfully mark that motley group of citizens from Jerusalem, and scribes and priests and strangers from different countries, mingled with Roman soldiers. They turn their eyes on Him, and for the most part gaze with cruel scorn upon the Holy One who is in the centre. In truth it is an awful sight. I must confess I never read the story of the Master's death, knowing what I do of the pain of crucifixion, without deep anguish; crucifixion was a death worthy to have been invented by devils. The pain which it involved was immeasurable; I will not torture you by describing it.

But there was more than anguish upon Calvary; ridicule and contempt embittered all. Those jests, those cruel gibes, those mockeries, those thrustings out of the tongue, what shall we say of these? At times I have felt some little sympathy with the French prince who cried: "If I had been there with my guards, I would soon have swept those wretches away." It was too terrible a sight; the pain of the victim was grievous enough, but the abominable wickedness of the mockers who could bear? Let us thank God that in the middle of the crime there came down a darkness which rendered it impossible for them to go further with it. Jesus must die; for His pains there must be no alleviation, and from death there must be for Him no deliverance; but the scoffers must be silenced. Most effectually their mouths were closed by the dense darkness which shut them in.

What I see in that veil is, first of all, that it was a concealment for those guilty enemies. Did you ever think of that? It is as if God Himself said: "I cannot bear it. I will not see this infamy! Descend, O veil!" Down fell the heavy shades.

"I asked the heavens, 'What foe to God hath done This unexampled deed?' The heavens exclaim, 'Twas man; and we in horror snatched the sun From such a spectacle of guilt and shame.'"

Thank God, the cross is a hiding-place. I would say to any guilty ones here: Thank God that the Lord Jesus has made it possible for your sins to be hidden more completely than by thick darkness. Thank God that in Christ He does not see you with that stern eye of justice which would involve your destruction. Had not Jesus interposed, whose death you have despised, you had wrought out in your own death the result of your own sin long ago; but for your Lord's sake you are allowed to live as if God did not see you. This long-suffering is meant to bring you to repentance. Will you not come?

SUFFERING HIDDEN.

But, further, that darkness was a sacred concealment for the blessed Person of our divine Lord. So to speak, the angels found for their King a pavilion of thick clouds, in the which His Majesty might be sheltered in its hour of misery. It was too much for wicked eyes to gaze so rudely on that immaculate Person. It was not meet that revellers should see the contortions of that sacred frame, indwelt with Deity, while He was being broken beneath the iron rod of divine wrath on our behalf. It was meet that God should cover Him, so that none should see all He did and all He bare when He was made sin for us. I bless God devoutly for thus hiding my Lord away; thus was He screened from eyes which were not fit to see the Sun much less to look upon the Sun of Righteousness.

This darkness also warns us, even us who are most reverent. This darkness tells us all that the Passion is a great mystery, into which we cannot pry. I try to explain it as substitution, and I feel that where the language of Scripture is explicit, I may and must be explicit too. But yet I feel that the idea of substitution does not cover the whole of the matter, and that no human conception can completely grasp the whole of the dread mystery. It was wrought in darkness, because the full, far-reaching meaning and result cannot be beheld of finite mind. Tell me the death of the Lord Jesus was a grand example of self-sacrifice—I can see that and much more. Tell me it was a wondrous obedience to the will of God—I can see that and much more. Tell me it was the bearing of what ought to have been borne by myriads of sinners of the human race, as the chastisement of their sin—I can see that, and found my best hope upon it. But do not tell me that this is all that is in the cross. No; great as this would be, there is much more in our Redeemer's death.

God only knows the love of God; Christ only knows all that He accomplished when He bowed His head and gave up the ghost. There are common mysteries of nature into which it were irreverence to pry; but this is a divine mystery, before which we put our shoes from off our feet, for the place called Calvary is holy ground. God veiled the cross in darkness, and in darkness much of its deeper meaning lies; not because God would not reveal it, but because we have not capacity enough to discern it all. God was manifest in the flesh, and in that human flesh He put away sin by His own sacrifice; this we all know; but "without controversy great is the mystery of godliness."

AN INSTRUCTIVE SYMBOL.

III. Now we pass on to speak of this darkness as a symbol which instructs. The veil falls down and conceals; but, at the same time, as an emblem, it reveals. It seems to say: "Attempt not to search within, but learn from the veil itself; it hath cherub work upon it." This darkness teaches us what Jesus suffered; it aids us to guess at the griefs which we may not actually see.

The symbol reminds us of what our Lord Jesus Christ endured. The darkness outside of Him was the figure of the darkness that was within Him. In Gethsemane a thick darkness fell upon our Lord's spirit. He was "exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." His joy was communion with God—that joy was gone, and He was in the dark. His day was the light of His Father's face; that face was hidden and gathered around Him. Brothers, I should sin against that veil if I were to pretend that I could tell you what the sorrow was which oppressed the Saviour's soul; only so far can I speak as it has been given me to have fellowship with Him in His sufferings.

Have you ever felt a deep and overwhelming horror of sin—your own sin and the sins of others? Have you ever seen sin in the light of God's love? Has it ever darkly hovered over your sensitive conscience? Has an unknown sense of wrath crept over you like midnight gloom; and has it been about you, around you, above you, and within you? Have you felt shut up in your feebleness, and yet shut out from God? Have you looked around and found no help, no comfort even in God—no hope, no peace? In all this you have sipped a little of that salt sea into which our Lord was cast. This it was that made Him sweat great drops of blood falling to the ground; and this it was which on the cross made Him utter that appalling cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" It was not the crown of thorns, or the scourge, or the cross which made Him cry, but the darkness, the awful darkness of desertion which oppressed His mind and made Him feel like one distraught.

THE DARK FOE.

Again, I think I see in that darkness, also what it was that Jesus was battling with; for we must never forget that the cross was a battlefield to Him, wherein He triumphed gloriously. He was fighting then with darkness; with the powers of darkness of which Satan is the head; with the darkness of human ignorance, depravity, and falsehood. The battle thus apparent at Golgotha has been raging ever since. Then was the conflict at its height; for the chiefs of the two great armies met in personal conflict. The present battle in which you and I take our little share is as nothing compared with that wherein all the powers of darkness in their dense battalions hurled themselves against the Almighty Son of God. He bore their onset, endured the tremendous shock of their assault, and in the end, with shout of victory, He led captivity captive. Let us not be afraid of all the darkness which besets us on our way home, since Jesus is the light which conquers it all.

The darkness never came to an end till the Lord Jesus broke the silence. All had been still, and the darkness had grown terrible. At last He spoke, and His voice uttered a psalm. It was the twenty-second Psalm. "My God," saith He, "My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Each repeated "Eloi" flashed morning upon the scene. By the time He had uttered the cry "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" men had begun to see again, and some even ventured to misinterpret His words, more in terror than in ignorance. Brethren, no light will ever come to dark hearts unless Jesus shall speak; and the light will not be clear until we hear the voice of His sorrows on our behalf, as He cries: "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" His voice of grief must be the end of our griefs; His cry out of the darkness must cheer away our gloom, and bring the heavenly morning to our minds.

PROPHETIC SYMPATHY.

IV. I come to my fourth point, and my closing words will deal with the sympathy which prophesies. Do you see the sympathy of nature with her Lord—the sympathy of the sun in the heavens with the Sun of Righteousness? The first sympathetic fact I see is this: all lights are dim when Christ shines not. All is dark when He does not shine. In the Church, if Jesus be not there, what is there? If Jesus Christ be not fully preached, if He be not with us by His Spirit, then everything is in darkness. Obscure the cross, and you have obscured all spiritual teaching. You cannot say, "We will be conspicuous in every other point, and clear upon every other doctrine, but we will shun the atonement, since so many cavil at it." No, sirs, if that candle be put under a bushel the whole house is dark. All theology sympathizes with the cross, and is colored and tintured by it. Your pious service, your books, your public worship, will all be in sympathy with the cross one way or another. If the cross is in the dark, so will all your work be.

"What think ye of Christ? is the test
To try both your work and your scheme;
You cannot be right in the rest,
Unless you think rightly of Him."

Next, see the dependence of all creation upon Christ, as evidenced by its darkness when He withdraws. I believe, my friends, that there is a much more wonderful sympathy between Christ and the world of nature than any of us have ever dreamed. We are waiting for the Coming of the Lord from heaven, and there is no hill or dale, there is no mountain or sea, but what is in perfect harmony with the waiting Church. Wonder not that there should be earthquakes in divers place, blazing volcanoes, terrible tempests, and sore spreadings of deadly disease. Marvel not when you hear of dire portents, and things that make one's heart to quail, for such things must be till the end shall come.

THE COMING CRISIS.

You that expect placid history till Christ shall come expect you know not what. You that think that generous politics shall create order and content, and that the extension of free-trade shall breathe universal peace over the nations, look for the living among the dead. Till the Lord shall come, the word has gone out: "Overturn, overturn, overturn," and overturned all things must be, not only in other kingdoms, but in this also, till Jesus comes. All that can be shaken shall be shaken, and only His immovable throne and truth shall abide. Now is the time of the Lord's battle with darkness, and we may not hope as yet for unbroken light.

Another practical lesson is this: If we are in the dark at this time, if our spirits are sunk in gloom, let us not despair, for the Lord Christ Himself was there. If I have fallen into misery on account of sin, let me not give up all hope, for the Father's Well-beloved passed through denser darkness than mine. O believing soul, if thou art in the dark thou art near the King's cellars, and there are wines on the lees well refined lying there. Thou hast gotten into the pavilion of the Lord, and now mayest thou speak with Him.

Last Monday I was cheered beyond all I can tell you by a letter from a brother who had been restored to life, light, and liberty by the discourse of last Sabbath morning. I know no greater joy than to be useful to your souls. For this reason, I have tried to preach this morning, though I am quite unfit for it physically. Oh, I do pray I may hear more news from saved ones! Oh, that some spirit that has wandered out into the dark moorland may spy the candle in my window, and finds its way home! If you have found my Lord, I charge you never let Him go, but cleave to Him till the day break, and the shadows flee away. God help you so to do for Jesus' sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A Missionary's Night Among Lions.*

THE illustrious and devoted Christian missionary, Dr. Robert Moffat, was on a tour among the Barolongs; they had halted beside a pool of water, and at night they lighted their campfires. Scarcely had the missionary got into his wagon to pass the night, when he heard the oxen stamping their feet with fright. A lion had just followed a heifer which they had neglected to tie up, and carried it off to a distance of about a hundred yards. They heard him breaking the bones of the animal, which was sending forth most lamentable cries. They fired several times in the direction of the noise, and the lion only replied by roaring. Once he even came up to the wagons, two natives having flung fire-sticks at him. The sight of the fire only seemed to redouble his fury. He was rushing on them when a ball struck the ground close by him, and he turned away still roaring.

"As the fuel was getting very low," says Dr. Moffat, "I profited by the temporary departure of the lion to go and seek some wood. I had not gone far when I perceived between myself and the horizon four animals, whose attention seemed to have been aroused by the noise which I had made in breaking some dry branches. Looking at them more closely I perceived that these new visitors were no other than lions. I immediately beat a retreat, crawling on my hands and knees toward the pond to inform our guide of the danger we were in. I found him not less frightened than myself, and looking fixedly in the opposite direction; there, indeed, were two more lions and a cub devouring us with their looks, and appearing only to await our movements in order to decide on their own. We lost no time in intrenching ourselves in the wagon and in raking up our fire, while at only a short distance from us we could hear the first lion tearing and devouring his prey. When one of the other famished animals, which was prowling about the outskirts attempted to approach him, he would drive him away with such a horrible howling as made our poor oxen tremble, and was by no means reassuring to ourselves. We had too much ground to fear that, out of six lions, there might be, at least, one which would spring on us without allowing himself to be stopped by our miserable fire. The two Barolongs begrudged the animal his succulent repast, and from time to time a sigh of regret would escape them at the thought of the loss of their cow, and of all the milk with which she would have supplied them. A little before day-break, having swallowed the whole animal, the lion retired, leaving nothing behind but the remains of the bones.

"When the morning arrived we examined the place, and we found from the traces of the lion that he was of the largest size, and that he alone had devoured the heifer. The foot-marks of the other lions did not approach within thirty yards of the place. Although I had often heard of the enormous quantity of food which a hungry lion would devour, it required nothing less than such a demonstration as this to convince me that a single individual was capable of devouring all the flesh of a heifer, without counting a large quantity of bones; for there only remained a rib or two and even many of the marrow-bones had been broken, as if with a hammer."

UNLIKE Mr. Moody, Sam Jones has chosen as his helper in Gospel work not a singer, but a preacher. Sam Small is affectionately spoken of by his leader as "his son Timothy," for it was through the blessing of God on Sam Jones's preaching that Sam Small was led to abandon a wicked life, and his profession, to devote himself to evangelistic work. There is a hearty, cordial union between the two men.

Sam Small was born at Knoxville, Tenn., on July 3d, 1851. He is, therefore, now thirty-five years of age. He received an excellent education, and was early taught the value of religion. As a boy he became familiar with the Scriptures, gaining much doctrinal knowledge, which afterward lay dormant, but now that his heart has been changed, is of inestimable service to him in his work. At the age of eighteen he was sent to Emory and Henry College of Virginia, where, under Methodist tuition, he acquired more religious knowledge. It was, however, intellectual knowledge only; his heart was untouched.

In 1871, having finished his college course, he went into newspaper work at Nashville. His career as owner was disastrous, but as a writer he made a brilliant success. His "Old Si" papers, published in 1876 in the Atlanta Constitution, gave him a national reputation. In 1878, having a strong desire for travel, he secured the appointment of Secretary to the American Commission to the Paris Exposition, and travelled extensively in France and England. His position, education, and gentlemanly bearing gained access for him to the upper ranks of society in both countries, while his journalistic habits and instincts led him to mix also with the lowest classes.

He returned home with enlarged experience, and with a budget of incidents and amusing anecdotes which made him a valuable acquisition to a newspaper staff and to social gatherings. Tall, slight, and graceful in appearance, and witty and good-humored in conversation, he was one of the most popular young men in Atlanta, Ga., where he took up his residence. Such a life as Mr. Small led was necessarily full of temptations. His fall was a terrible one. He became thoroughly dissipated, was often drunk, and though he could make money faster than most men, he was always in debt. His wife bore with him patiently and tried with all the power of a good wife's love to win him to reformation, but his course was steadily and rapidly downward to utter ruin.

That was his condition when, on September 13th last year, he was with his wife and children at Cartersville, and went to hear Sam Jones preach. His early training, all his scriptural knowledge, his aching head and his empty pockets, his wife's sorrowful face and his own conscience were on the side of the preacher; and, to use his own expression, he was "badly floored." He came out of the hall a broken-down man. Characteristically he tried to recover his equanimity by an application to his worst enemy. Sam Small went out and got drunk. It was of no use; the truth had taken too firm a hold upon him. The Holy Spirit held him face to face with his conscience, and two days after he heard Sam Jones preach he was on his knees pleading for pardon and strength to lead a new life. He did not rise until he had the assurance that his prayer was answered. That same night he declared publicly the change which had passed in him, and renouncing the world, vowed in the strength of God to give his whole future to the Lord's service.

Mr. Small's reputation in Atlanta was the first thing to be made available. Every one knew him, and in spite of his degradation he was generally liked. He therefore commenced, right then and there, to hold religious meetings, and there was no lack of an audience. The old study, the old doctrines that were mere theories before were now living truths, and he could not but tell out from an overflowing heart the story of his experience. God blessed and used the personal testimony, as He always does when it is sincere, and it was in this case exceptionally powerful on account of the brilliant gifts of the speaker and his established reputation. Sam Jones heard of the work and sent for his spiritual son, and from that time the two have worked together, and God has abundantly blessed their united service.

HARVEY'S NARROW ESCAPE.

THERE was a large lake in the grounds around Dr. Mowbrey's well-known school, which had a little island in the centre. Around this the water in summer had that dark look which tells of great depth. There the best fish were to be caught, and many a boy got into trouble through stealing off in the school boat on holidays to lie in the shadow of the big trees on the island with his rod. The place had the charm which always attracts the school-boy of being forbidden ground. In summer and winter there was a standing prohibition against going in its vicinity, for not only was the water dangerously deep, but in winter the ice was less secure than in the more open part. Dr. Mowbrey had given orders that no boy should skate or slide there, and a notice to this effect was placed by the side of the lake.

It was the Saturday holiday. Many of the boys were assembled on the ice, some skating, some sliding; others were enjoying sleigh rides. Snow had fallen in the night, sufficient to spoil in some degree the smooth surface of the ice. Near the island, however, where the trees hung over and sheltered the water, it was smooth and clear, and appeared very inviting. The lads looked longingly at it from a distance as they glided by.

When it began to grow dark, many boys went away, till at last only a few of the bigger boys, among whom Tom Harvey and Harry Herbert were the leaders, were left on the pond. Harvey proposed to one or two near him that they should skate over to the island in the middle. "It was a shame," he said, "that such a beautiful piece of ice should be left unused."

"But we should get into trouble if we were seen," said another lad; "besides, it's not safe there, you know."

"Nonsense about safety! It's all nonsense; Dr. Mowbrey's as fidgety as an old woman, and besides, who's to tell of us?"

"Well, go ahead. We'll just have one spin around before we go in."

"That's right; any one that's afraid need not come," said Harvey, and he darted off in the direction of the island. He passed the boundary mark, and was gliding swiftly over the clear, dark, forbidden ice, when suddenly a crack was heard, which made the boys who were following him turn short round and skate back again. Harvey paused. A second and louder crack and he also turned, but the ice was too weak to sustain his weight during that momentary pause; it broke, and in an instant he had disappeared into the opening! The others stood horror-stricken, as if riveted to the spot where Harvey was last seen. A minute passed—the longest minute the boys had ever known, and they saw in the moonlight their companion rise panting to the surface and convulsively grasp the ice. He steadied himself and tried to climb upon it, but the ice around the hole was now cracked in all directions, and the piece he held broke and let him down again into the icy water. Again he rose and stretched his arms across the treacherous support.

"Hold on; don't try to get out," shouted Herbert.

"We'll save you."

"Be quick, then," gasped Harvey. "I'm freezing, and my hands are numbed. I can't hold on long."

"Now, boys," said Herbert, "give me your scarves and handkerchiefs. We must make a rope."

Quick as thought the boys took off their scarves, among which, happily, there were some of strongly woven silk. They were securely knotted together, Herbert speaking encouraging words to Harvey as he tied them. "Now, then, old fellow," he said, "be careful, and you'll soon be on your pins."

He advanced with the rope in his hand as near the edge of the hole as was prudent, and then bidding the boys behind lie down and hold him firmly by the feet, he threw himself prone on the ice and flung the end of the rope to his half-submerged school-fellow.

"Lay hold," he cried, "and take a turn of it around your wrist. Got it?"

"Yes."

"Now, then, boys, hold fast and pull me back if the ice breaks."

It did break, but a strong pull brought Herbert off the broken piece, and the rope, firm in his hand, brought Harvey to the edge of the enlarged hole. The ice was much stronger there, and another strong pull brought him out of the water at full length on the surface, and he was dragged along by the rope to the firm part where his companions were. He was shivering so that he could scarcely stand, but his skates were taken off and Herbert on one side and another strong lad on the other grasped him firmly by the arms and started at the double-quick for the school-house.

There was no scolding from the doctor when they arrived, which was a surprise. That astute pedagogue saw very clearly that the lesson they needed to learn had already been taught more effectively than he could teach it. He said nothing, and the boys slunk off to their bedroom heartily ashamed of their disobedience, while Harvey was put in the doctor's quarters to receive special care.

"I never felt like that before," said Herbert, when they were alone. "I shall never forget it as long as I live. We ought never to have gone there, boys; but when Harvey was under water it was too late to wish we hadn't gone. I don't know how you feel, but I've had a turn I shan't forget."

The next morning the doctor departed from his regular course of reading in chapel. He turned to the twenty-second chapter of Proverbs and read it slowly and solemnly. "Thorns and snares are in the way of the froward," he read, and paused. Looking up from the book his eyes passed from face to face, and all eyes were lowered under his gaze. "He that doth keep his soul shall be far from them." There was no need for any application of the words. They went home to each heart, and the lesson learned in terror was not forgotten.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

Joy in Service.

WHEN Juliet had read slowly half a dozen verses, she looked up at her hearer. Lena's dark nervous eyes were fixed upon her with an earnest gaze. Could these be tears that were dropping from them? "Again, again!" gasped the Esquimaux woman. Juliet forgot the dimness, the smokiness, the stifling scents of the hut; she forgot everything but that she, even she, was permitted to hold a life-giving cup to perhaps dying lips. The city-bred lady laid her hand on that of Lena, who held it with a tight, tight grasp. Again were the passages read (Juliet did not venture on fresh ones), this time with less painful effort. How sweet are Christ's words of love even in the Esquimaux tongue!

The woman who had been supporting Lena gently placed the sufferer's head on a pillow. Lena appeared to breathe with more ease. Juliet saw steps so closely, she had never approached so near to Himself. Juliet had gathered spiritual manna on the preceding night when she had given herself to the Saviour, but it was first in that smoky Esquimaux hut that she tasted its exquisite sweetness.

Juliet was almost startled at the feeling of something soft and warm moving by her feet. It was only a little child, who had just awoke from afternoon sleep. Little chubby hands now grasped Juliet's dress, trying by means of it to pull their tiny owner up to her knees. Such a soft baby voice lisped the name of "Mother," often the first word spoken by infant lips in whatever tongue.

"Ah! little Ruth," said Juliet softly, recognizing the innocent face looking confidently up; "you are—yes, for an Esquimaux, you are a pretty baby. It was very naughty of me to call you a bear's cub, a little horror."

Lena's sleep lasted for a good deal more than an hour, while Juliet patiently sat beside her, now amusing herself with the baby, now raising her thoughts toward Him who had sent her forth to do some work for Him even in that desolate place. At length the sick woman awoke, and as one refreshed and relieved, once more she listened with pleasure to the holy words from Juliet's lips, and then, her mission for the time ended, the young girl rose to depart. Her eyes, indeed, smarted from the smoke, her head ached from the closeness of the room, but she would not have exchanged the memory of that hour for that of the gayest that she had ever spent in luxurious London.

And what a sight met the eyes of Juliet as she emerged from the igloo into the open air! The sun, indeed, had sunk, but the sky was full of inimitable glory. The vault of heaven seemed all ablaze. Every color of the rainbow was seen in nature's magnificent fireworks, beside which how insignificant are those of man! Streamers of red, then of golden hue flashed before Juliet's delighted eyes. Then she clapped her hands with the joy of a child as sheaves of violet-tinted that softened expression on the dark face which gives a spiritual beauty even to the plainest features. She understood enough to know that the sufferer blessed her, to know that Lena faintly uttered the Saviour's name. Juliet saw Lena look up and smile as one who had made her peace with God. The Moravian missionaries had sown for years with toil and care, but the gathering in of that one precious sheaf had been left to the English stranger.

"She is dead!" said the sister who had been nursing Lena, as her eyelids closed and her breathing was stilled.

"No, she sleeps," said Juliet, who noticed, dark as was the hut, that a feather which lay on the pillow was slightly stirred by the sick woman's breath.

Juliet was imprisoned, as it were, by the clasp of Lena's hand; she dared not withdraw her own lest her doing so should break a slumber on which a life might depend.

Notwithstanding personal discomfort, that hour was one to which Juliet ever looked back as one of the most blessed which she had ever known. She had never before followed the track of the Lord's foot-arrows seemed to fall through the orange glow. The Aurora, the glorious northern light, was sweeping from horizon to zenith, lighting up the snow with fairer tints than those of summer, flushing the crystal icebergs that floated on the sea, then hanging over the gazer's head a canopy of radiance, a jewelled corona of light!

"Oh, it is like the last day, the splendor in which the Lord will come for His own!" exclaimed Juliet, overcome with delight. "And all His saints will be with Him; my precious friend will be with Him, and she will rejoice with me, and over me; death will never part us again! Oh, glorious hope, that, like the Aurora, can give brightness even to a Labrador night, and change desolation to beauty!"

The Aurora which had risen on the soul of Juliet was no evanescent brightness, no passing beauty. Anna instantly felt the change in her young companion's manner, and could hear it in the tone of her voice. And how would the suffering missionary have borne her own heavy burden of trial, had not a bright young sympathizing friend been sent to help her to support it. Anna, in addition to her physical infirmities and the trial of increasing darkness, was in anxious suspense regarding her husband and Fritz.

On the evening of the following day the sledge returned from Bethabara, under the charge of an Esquimaux belonging to that place. If there had been a lingering hope in Anna's mind that her husband, not finding a prolonged stay needful, would return in the sledge, that hope vanished away, as Juliet, who watched from the window, announced that only one form was in the conveyance, and that the form of a native.

"But he may bring a letter. Oh, that I could rise!" cried Anna, making a fruitless attempt to get up.

"I will bring it!" cried Juliet, throwing her gray plaid over head and shoulders, as she hurried to open the door even before the sledge could reach it.

She soon returned to Anna with a letter in her hand which smelled strongly of the disinfectant, of which the pastor, at the suggestion of his thoughtful wife, had taken a supply.

Anna took the letter, and hurriedly opened it; but the pastor's epistle was long, and crossed—her dim eyes could not easily read it.

"Read it to me, my child," said Anna, giving the letter to Juliet; "it will contain no secrets, and your eyes are younger than mine."

Juliet read aloud what follows:

"BETHABARA, November 12th, evening.

"MY DEAREST WIFE: The Lord brought us here in safety last night, and very thankful am I to find myself where the help of friends is so much needed. Two more Esquimaux had died yesterday, and several others have sickened. We buried our Brother Johanan and the dear sister this morning, with the three members of their flock, side by side in one wide grave. Poor dear Hans, broken down with grief and nursing, was not able to be present. But I am comforted regarding him, his soul is stayed on his God. Hans thinks on the blessedness of her who has left Labrador for heaven, where there shall be no more ice and frost, no more sickness and sorrow, where the wintry darkness of earth shall be exchanged for the eternal light which flows from the throne of the Lamb.

"Dear wife, as we should ever be mindful of the goodness of God, I will call you to join with me in giving thanks for travelling mercies. Our journey was not without its perils. The night came on; we got entangled in block ice; the sledge stuck in a hole. How we got out again I can scarcely imagine. In the midst of our trouble some of the traces broke, and the dogs got loose. I thought that Bethabara would never be reached, and tried to resign myself to being frozen to death on the way. The spirit of Fritz never failed; he seemed to have the strength of three men and the courage of ten. By his great exertions and skilful management the dogs were again lashed to the sledge, slipping and sliding, tumbling and falling, still they pulled, while Fritz pushed and lifted, and we found ourselves, after long delay, again on good firm snow. Never did I feel more thankful, for I could not help thinking of you.

"Our adventures were not quite over. We presently heard a howling behind. Said Fritz, 'There are wolves on our track.' Our dogs heard the sound, too, and rushed on as if they were mad, at some risk of upsetting the sledge. We were now guided only by the stars, for our delay when we stuck in the hole had deprived us of the moon, which sets early. One had need for the gift of strong faith at a moment like that. I prayed aloud, while Fritz cheered on the dogs and plied his whip. We were not far from Bethabara then, but we could not judge of the distance on account of the darkness.

"Presently, as I looked back, I could just see, like a shadow, a great wolf behind us; he had outstripped the rest. I told Fritz, who was of course looking on ahead, as a driver must do, especially the driver of a team of Esquimaux dogs. The wolf had made no noise; if it looked like a shadow, it was still as a shadow, no sound of pattering feet on the snow. Fritz said nothing; he half rose on his seat and turned round—the wolf was close to the sledge. Fritz dealt the brute such a blow with the butt of the whip (it was too near for use of the lash), that it gave a howl and lay sprawling. Whether the wolf was killed or not I know not; we saw nothing of it again, and in another minute we sighted the lights in Bethabara. Never were lights more welcome!"

"God be praised for the wonderful deliverance!" cried Anna, clasping her hands. "Go on, my child, go on!" Juliet resumed her reading.

"Now I must tell you of our present arrangements. Fritz says truly that it is absolutely necessary to separate the small-pox patients from the rest of the people, otherwise the plague will never be stayed till the station becomes a desolation. The crowding in the hot igloos is sure to spread contagion. There is no building suited for a hospital but the church, which is roomy, well-built, and has a large stove. I doubted whether it were lawful thus to use a house devoted to God, but Fritz reminded me of the words, 'I will have mercy, and not sacrifice,' and Brother Hans thought also that the case being one of necessity, our divine Master would sanction the act.

"Fritz insists on having the whole charge of the hospital, and will not leave it night or day. I have to take care of the station, give instruction to those not yet visited by sickness, and do what I can for poor Brother Hans. His share of the work is to arrange about food, fuel, and water being regularly brought to the porch of the church for Fritz to take in. He allows no one uninfected to enter. The Lord preserve him from taking the malady; he himself has no fear. Fritz prays you to collect anything in the shape of warm clothing or blankets for those whom God may please to restore to health, as their infected garments must be burned. Remind our people that what they give with self-denial is given to the Lord; it is He that hath need in the persons of His poor afflicted servants.

"Give my love and blessing to our dear flock, and ask for their constant prayers for us all. Remember me to our young friend. I pray that she may be led to seek the Lord while He may be found." Juliet colored as she read aloud the sentence never intended for her eyes. "I think anxiously of our poor Lena; may God send His angels to watch by her bedside, and speak comfort to her soul! I cannot write often, as we have no hands to spare, and the journey is too dangerous to send messengers without urgent need; but when the clothes and more medicine come in the sledge, I will take the opportunity of sending back a later account of our state. Fritz desires his Christian love. The Lord be with you, my best beloved! You are always in the thoughts and prayers of your faithful husband."

That letter was read over and over again; not a few tears were dropped on its pages; but Sister Anna was not one to give way to mere emotion; her affection ever took a practical form. She threw her whole mind into the work of supplying the needed garments. Anna sent for the leading Esquimaux in the little station, who promptly obeyed her call. Samson was a broad-shouldered, strongly-built man, whose appearance gave the impression of determined courage and great physical power, though his height was less than Juliet's. Anna, in Esquimaux, gave him an account of much that was contained in her husband's letter, and asked Samson to convey the pastor's messages to his people.

"We'll have a hunt for skins," said Samson, promptly; "there's nothing man makes like the clothing that God gives to the beasts. It will make the road safer if we clear off a few of the wolves, and may be, as the need is so great, the Lord will send us a bear."

"And see if our people cannot spare a few clothes," said Anna; "though I know that they are but poor. I will overlook our own little stores; we must manage to load the sledge."

"We'll try," said honest Samson, so earnestly that Juliet's heart warmed toward the Esquimaux, rough and shaggy as he was. A more true and generous heart beat under his wolf-skin jacket than beneath many a broadcloth coat.

"Oh, that I had something to give!" exclaimed Juliet, as Samson quitted the dwelling. "Would that I had a fairy's wand to change my watch and chain into furs and flannels! I have my seal-skin jacket," she added, in a hesitating tone.

"I would never suffer you to part with that," said Sister Anna with decision; "it would be simply sacrificing your life. You, delicately nurtured, and venturing forth in the cold as you do, would be frozen to death in weather which the hardy Esquimaux can hardly endure."

Juliet thought of her precious gray plaid; but her whole soul shrank from the idea of parting with that, the sole relic of her Maria. Yet might it not be pleasing to the Lord if she laid this—the one precious thing which she possessed—at His feet! Juliet could not make up her mind to the sacrifice then; she could hardly endure to think of her precious relic being wrapped round an Esquimaux form.

She was aroused from her reflections by Anna's voice. "I think that the rug before the fireplace could be made into a famous warm coat; the work is so coarse that even I might manage it, if you thread my needle, dear Juliet; and—let's see—we might take the cloth table-cover for a dress."

"What! the ornament of the parlor," exclaimed Juliet, "with the pretty border of flowers worked by your own hands!"

"We might cut off the border, and keep it for the next table-cover," said Anna; "perhaps material will come in the Harmony."

A busy time followed. Anna searched through her little possessions, and Juliet had often to remonstrate; it was difficult to prevent the invalid from giving away what she herself absolutely needed. To transform the rug and the table-cover into clothes gave plenty of occupation to industrious fingers, Juliet taking her share in the work.

Curious contributions came in from the Esquimaux huts. Some gifts might be classed with the widow's mite, the givers possessed so little. Samson brought back two wolves' skins from his hunting, vexed that he had no encounter with a bear, though a terrible scar on his face showed that his gift, such as it was, had been bought with peril and blood.

And yet the all collected in nine days was not much. Juliet's spirit was heavy, for except some labor, she as yet had contributed nothing. She saw Samson loading the sledge which he undertook to drive, a service—as we have seen—of some risk. Juliet ran back to her own room. With passionate sorrow, as if parting with a cherished friend, she kissed the gray plaid again and again, then with a murmured "given to the Lord," she placed it in the keeping of Samson to be taken to the afflicted station.

What a golden stream would flow into the Lord's treasury, if Christian ladies opened their jewel-cases, and had the courage, for the Saviour's sake, to part with ornaments hoarded with jealous care though perhaps never worn!

JESUS AT BETHESDA.

S. S. Lesson for May 23, John 5:1-18. Golden Text, verse 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jesus Obedient to the Law—The Place of Healing—The Waiting People—The Waiting in these Days—The Competition at the Pool—The Will the Crucial Question—The Impotent Man's Difficulty—The Test of Faith—Prompt Obedience—Critical Spectators—Christ's Injunction to the Healed Man—Giving his Testimony—The Constant Worker.

"AFTER this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem." As a Jew, Jesus was under the law; and all through His life He punctually performed all His Father's commandments in the law. "Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which He shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles" (Deut. 16:16). Son of God though He was, Jesus obeyed the law, showing us how obedience, equally with faith, is part of the will of God. It was while He was at Jerusalem on this occasion that we find Him attracted by the need of poor sick people to the pool of Bethesda.

The Hebrew word "Bethesda" signifies "The House of Mercy," and Jesus' presence there would have made it a house of mercy for each one, had they but recognized Him as the Messiah, "the Lord that healeth thee" (Ex. 15:26). They were within a few yards of the great Fountain of healing virtue, but they knew it not. The need was there, and the Remedy was there, but they were blind to it; they looked another way. Bethesda consisted of a pool surrounded by five porches. "In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water." Oh, how many there are in sore need of spirit, soul or body, who are for something which the eye can see, or which the ear can hear, or which can be made real to them by the evidence of their senses! Some are waiting for the help of some human being; many sick people are waiting for a doctor of whose skill they may have heard, or watching the success of some new remedy which they have applied; or, it may be, they are waiting for an opportunity to try the benefit of another climate, or they are waiting until some circumstance in their lives may be more favorable for recovery from their sickness. How many there are who are oppressed by temporal needs, and have come into great business difficulties; they are waiting until trade revives or until some one shall lend them a large sum of money; waiting for anything and everything except for God. "Blessed are all they that wait for Him" (Isa. 30:18). How many there are in spiritual need, who are waiting until they can attend some meeting where others have found blessing, or some conference of Christians which is at hand, or waiting until they can have a talk with somebody more deeply instructed in the things of God, waiting in some way "for the moving of the water."

"A certain man was there, which had an infirmity thirty and eight years." As far as we can gather, he had been thirty-eight years living with the fond expectation of being, some day or other, the first to be put into the pool. The compassion of Jesus was stirred. He would willingly have healed every man, every woman, every child among those around Him. Seeing this man lie, and knowing that he had been a long time in that case, Jesus saith unto him:

"WILT THOU

be made whole?" The usual answer to this question is, "Of course, I will; there is nothing I desire so much as to be healed." And yet after all it comes to a point of will. Man is always attempting to make himself believe, and to persuade others, that he is ready for every blessing which God has to give him; but that he has great difficulty in obtaining this blessing from God. He will say, "I have prayed and prayed for years, and yet have received no answer from God. I have tried and struggled; I have considered the matter; I have examined my faith, and I have exercised all the faith I could, and yet the answer to my prayers is not come." The Lord says, "I am willing, and ye are not." "Ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life" (John 5:40).

The question of Jesus was, "Wilt thou be made whole?" Not "Wilt thou help thyself to be made whole?" When once we understand that the work of our salvation, of our sanctification, and of our healing, is altogether the work of God, it comes to the point of submitting ourselves to His operations, yielding ourselves so completely to Him that all our past efforts of soul or body come to be seen as valueless and often as a mistake. We have to come to Him bankrupt, and as beggars; helpless, foolish, base, despised, even in our own eyes, and without one shadow of excuse, either for our own sin, for the imperfections of our Christian lives, or for the failure to apprehend Jesus as the Healer of our bodies. "The impotent man answered Him, Sir, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me." "An unanswerable excuse," many would say, "who could dispute that he had justice on his side?" And yet this excuse could not pass with Jesus. There stood One who had done miracles in Jerusalem (John 2:23), others believed on Him, yet this man knew Him not. Close beside him was He who had all the power of healing for spirit, soul and body contained in Himself. Many of us have excused ourselves from being holy, by saying, "I have no one to help me in my family life; all is against me." "I have no help at home; my husband or my wife is no help to me." "I have no help in my church, I have no help in my business; all is against me; everybody seems to stand a better chance than I do." And how many invalids will say, "So and so got healing so easily and so readily, but I have not the same faith; my friends don't believe in divine healing; my minister discourages me; I have no man to put me into the pool."

Jesus did not enter into argument, but simply gave the command, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk." It was a test of faith. The impotent man had no power to rise; still less to take up his bed, and walk; but He who spoke the word caused light to come into darkness in the first days of the creation. He upholdeth all things by the word of His power (Heb. 1:3); and that word has not lost its creative power to this very day. The man proved his willingness to be made whole by his obedience, without waiting for any feeling of power to obey. "Immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed and walked." He did not first try his strength and make attempts, but, confident in Him who spoke the word, he simply did as he was told, and was healed.

But there were those looking on who did not believe in divine healing, neither did they believe in the divinity of the Lord Jesus. These were of two classes, first, incurable sufferers who longed for healing, but not from Jesus; secondly, criticising Jews. There were plenty of Jews round about Jesus whenever He visited Jerusalem, whose only object was to criticise and find fault. They did not directly attack Him on this occasion, but said to the man, "It is the Sabbath day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed." The man did not argue the point in any abstract way, but simply gave his authority for what he was doing. He answered them, "He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk." But when they asked him who it was that gave him such a strange command, he did not know. He had met with Jesus and yet had not known Him. "Jesus had conveyed Himself away, a multitude being in that place," for Jesus always avoided popularity. There are many who receive blessing from Jesus and know little of Him who has done so much for them; they know the salvation better than the Saviour, the healing better than the Healer. But Jesus never willingly leaves any one long in such a case.

"Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." Very frequently in the healings of Jesus we see that He deals with the soul first and the body after, as in the case of the palsied man. Here the order is reversed. He won the heart of this man by healing his body first, but He could not leave that soul unsaved, and therefore His word, "Sin no more lest a worse thing come unto thee." A man was healed of paralysis. He had been a terrible drunkard, but was converted at the time of his healing. Three months after he again became drunk, and immediately his paralysis returned. He learned that the body, which was healed, belonged to the Lord. He confessed his sin, yielded himself spirit, soul and body to the Lord, and trusted Him to keep him from sinning. He was healed a second time, and cured of the taste for strong drink. But if a man who has been touched by Jesus persists in sin, the last state of that man is worse than the first.

When a man knows Jesus personally he is to Him. "The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus, which had made him whole. And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay Him, because He had done these things on the Sabbath day." If these Jews had known anything of divine compassion, surely they would have rejoiced that this man, so long holden by sickness, was now healed, free from pain and suffering, and able to work for his own living. Surely they would have encouraged every sick man at the pool of Bethesda to apply to the same Healer, who had healed him before their very eyes. But they cared more for their own reputation than they did for either the souls or bodies of those who were around them. Jesus answered them simply, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." Jesus is always at work. "When we see the least of what He is doing, either in our own souls, or circumstances, or our work for God, He never ceases His operations all day long and every day, through the most common things of life, Jesus is at work turning everything into use for the education of His disciples. Yielded to Him, following His leading, we may be blest and helped forward every hour of the day.

There are times when it would seem to us as though God had forsaken some spiritual work in which we are engaged; souls are not saved; we have lost our power in speaking; everything seems to go wrong. Has Jesus left off working? Not for a moment; the work is dearer to Him than to us, but He sees that work and workers need a fresh nearness to Him, and He puts us out of conceit with the work and with ourselves that we may know our nothingness, that we may let Him search us as with candles and tell us if there is anything which grieves Him, and also bring us to such a dependence upon Him that we shall wonder at our ever thinking for a moment that we were of any importance in His work. He lets us go behind the scenes, and, instead of seeing the machinery, He lets us see the engine which moves all, and we take off the shoes from off our feet and know that we are on holy ground, and our souls say, "The Lord is in His holy temple: let all the earth keep silence before Him" (Hab. 2:20). We may well fall back, and stand out of the way when the Son of God says to us, "Trust me, I am at the work."

LAW AND LOVE.

BY JOSEPH A. TORREY.

Lord, Thy commandments are exceeding broad;
How can a creature, weak and blind, fulfil
The measureless compass of Thy righteous will,
Or in Thy sacred presence stand unawed?
And how shall we escape Thy chastening rod
Who sin in thought and word and deed, and still Add sin to sin, and stripe to stripe, and fill
The measure of Thy righteous wrath, O God?
But, Father, Thy most precious name is Love;
Thou dost condemn, but yet Thou dost redeem;
Lower than angels, yet far raised above
The shining throng that sin not, do we seem,
Because, though fallen, Christ our souls doth draw
To love Thee wholly. Love fulfils the Law!

Its Significance—A Change of Policy Indicated—Features of the Exhibition—The Interesting Compound—The Kaffir Contingent—Other Living Exhibits—Plan of the Building—Indian Screens—A Significant Hint to Struggling Artisans—A Monument of Pearls—The Opening Ceremony—An Evangelistic Opportunity.

THERE is a deeper significance for the world at large in the exhibition opened in London on May 4th than usually attaches to such enterprises. It is an indication of a change of policy which will eventually make itself felt the world over. For more than twenty years an influence of a utilitarian character has swayed British politics. The statesmen who have exercised most power during that time have belonged to what is known as "the Manchester school." Cobden and Bright were its acknowledged apostles. The test they applied to all questions was, "Will it pay?" Commercial treaties, the expansion of trade, non-intervention in foreign politics, save as they touched commercial interests, were the leading characteristics of this school of statesmen. It was perfectly consistent with their principles that they were inclined to regard of Great Britain as in some respects a burden. They did not pay in the commercial sense. The cost of protecting them was not directly reimbursed. Their identity with the mother country involved liability to foreign complications, which occasionally necessitated costly wars. If John Bright could have had his way unchecked the connection of Canada, Australia, India, and other dependencies with England would have been severed long ago. He made no secret of his conviction that the connection was not worth maintaining. It was the swing of the pendulum from the other extreme, which, at the beginning of the century, was seen in English meddling in every European quarrel, and taking a hand in all the fighting that was going in different parts of the globe. There is much to be said for the Manchester school of statesmanship. England profited little by her continental wars, but carried to an extreme, it was degrading and selfish. The reaction appears to have set in, and this exhibition is a conspicuous evidence of it. It is a distinct and direct effort to draw closer the ties that bind the scattered dependencies of England, and also, on the other hand, to stimulate the interest and foster the pride of the Englishmen at home in the people and the productions of the colonies. This exhibition is, in a sense, designed to make the members of the family better known to each other and to foster a family affection. Its probable result will be to make the English people proud of their colonial connections, who have passed the trying stage of childhood and have become stalwart sons, able to perform a very creditable share in the world's work; and it may produce the feeling in the colonies that it is a grander and a better thing to be a member of a magnificent family, than to be alone, isolated, and independent among strangers. Whether or not that will be the result the scheme is a wise one, and it does credit to the penetration and sagacity of the Prince of Wales, who is the originator of it.

A FAMILY PARTY

FEATURES OF THE SHOW.

The Exhibition occupies buildings specially erected in the Horticultural Gardens, South Kensington. The galleries, courts, and gardens cover an area of about twenty-two acres. Among the one hundred and twenty gentlemen who form the Royal Commission for the construction and management of the Exhibition are sixteen of the most powerful princes in the Indian Empire, several of whom, it is expected, will visit the capital in person. There is an outlying block of the Exhibition area of which Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen, the Secretary, seems to be prouder than of all the art treasures or ethnographic curiosities which are arranged in the courts. It is the temporary residence of the Oriental members of the national family, who have travelled all the way from India to join the circle. The place is known among the officials as a term which to residents in the Oriental dependencies will sufficiently indicate its character. The Compound is set apart for the accommodation of such natives from India and the colonies as are engaged to appear in the various courts in their characteristic costumes and occupations during the Exhibition. From India there are three Punjabees, nineteen Hindoos, fifteen Mohammedans, and six Bombay and Madrassee boys. There are seven Cingalese, four Malays, and eight Chinese. Fraternizing with them also is the deputation from South Africa, a Kaffir priest, wife, son, daughter, and baby in one hut; a Kaffir with his wife and child, and a Bushman with his wife and baby in another. A couple of Zulu men are in the collection, and in due course there will appear some Red Indians, Maories from Australia, and a family of Cyprites.

The inhabitants of this interesting Compound seem to be contented and happy. One of the Kaffirs, a bright, intelligent fellow, has been twenty-three years in the public service at the Cape. This colony of seventy-five diverse beings maintain their own customs as far as possible. The Hindoos kill their own goats and kill them in an extemporized slaughter-house, the Mohammedans taking particular care not to defile their meat by contact with anything touched by the rest.

Watching a group of these Oriental workmen, hammering away at their metal as they squat on the ground, or patiently proceeding with a job at carving, may be seen a venerable Hindoo, said to be over a hundred years old. The Malays and Cingalese can be recognized easily by their long hair twisted into a knot; and the Zulus, with their fine, coffee-colored skin, stalwart proportions, and heavy type of face, are always conspicuous. Their babies will doubtless be the feature of the Exhibition of colonial productions that will have the most interest for the British matron. The undersized Bushman and his wife, it must be conceded, wear the palm of ugliness; but the Kaffir damsel, who is civilized and dresses neatly in European style, is good-looking, and is a general favorite in the building. The workers placidly pursue their various occupations, mostly squatting on the ground, and the patient perseverance with which they labor silently and with Oriental calm amazes the British artisan, loud of voice and noisy in all his movements.

Thousands of persons who would deem themselves insulted if they were not catalogued among the educated classes will from the maps and photographs in the Australasian Courts learn for the first time many rudimentary geographical facts, and will henceforth be saved from the blunder of confounding New Zealand with Queensland, and Brisbane with Victoria.

THE WHOLE OF THE SOUTH GALLERIES

are devoted to India and Ceylon, while the Dominion of Canada is located in the Central Gallery and part of the Western Gallery. Between them are situated the Australian Courts, subdivided among the five divisions of the island continent and Fiji, flanked on the west by New Zealand, and on the east by the West Indies, which are placed in the southern halves of the Western and Eastern Galleries respectively. Between the West Indies and Queensland lie Malta and Cyprus; and to the north are British Guiana and Hong Kong, which appropriately finds a place in the old Chinese Court. In the Queen's Gate Annexed will be found representations of the productions of the possessions of England in Africa—the Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Gold Coast, Lagos, and the West African settlements; while the remaining smaller colonies have been placed in the Eastern Arcade.

A BROAD PROMENADE

—twenty-three feet in width—is arranged straight down the Middle Court of the Southern Galleries. This Central Court has been subdivided among the Indian provinces and states. Each court has its distinctive screen; and thus will be presented a series of screens, with carving in wood or stone, inlaid work, or in plaster, representative of the many styles of art in India. These interesting objects have been executed by native workmen in India, at the expense of the Royal Commission, supplemented by liberal grants from several of the native chiefs. In each court is placed a skeleton map of India, with the particular province plainly indicated, and all the principal towns in it shown. Visitors will thus be able to realize at a glance the special portion of the empire from which the articles come; and by this means they will be the more readily able to compare the products of the various provinces. In a building in the south promenade will be represented; and among other exhibits will be seen large logs of teak sent by the Bombay and Burmah Trading Corporation, which played a not unimportant part in the causes which led to the annexation of King Theebaw's dominions.

THE LATEST OF BRITAIN'S ACQUISITIONS

To the north of the Indian Court, and on the site of the old Royal Pavilion, is erected in the forecourt of which there is a bazaar, wherein native artificers follow their respective trades. The entrance to the palace is through a carved stone gateway from Gwalior (see illustration on first page), which the Maharajah Scindia has presented. The shops in the forecourt of the Indian Palace—the decorative wood-work for which was carved by native workmen—are filled with native artisans. They are genuine artisans, such as may be seen at work within the precincts of the palaces of some of the Indian princes. The following industries will be shown in practice: Carpet weaving, wood-carving and turning, gold and silversmiths' work, Delhi embossed copper work, brass founding, seal engraving, sweet-meat making, earthenware and glazed ware, stone carving, cotton printing and dyeing, silk weaving, Kincob weaving, clay-figure making, from Lucknow, and miniature painting.

A SIGNIFICANT HINT

is given to the struggling artisans of England by the Commissioners on apologizing for the Australian exhibit.

While promising visitors a rare treat in the courts of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, West Australia, Queensland, and New Zealand, the promoters suggest that a certain sameness must be expected. These rich but comparatively undeveloped dependencies want, above everything else, population. Without artisans there can be no manufactures, and without manufactures the range of exhibits must be necessarily limited. The whole population of these vast areas is smaller than the population now crowded into the city of London and its suburbs.

Great interest will doubtless attach to the gold exhibits. With a view to afford the public some idea of the actual results of quartz mining in Victoria, the Council have placed in the Australian courts a number of gilt cubes, constructed to represent in size and bulk the total yield of gold respectively extracted by the public mining companies of the colony from the date of the commencement of active operations by each incorporated company. The cubes exhibited represent solid masses of gold, and bear an inscription stating the quantity of metal, the time taken to consolidate, and the name of the operative undertaking.

Gold is not the only mineral, however, to be obtained from these southern colonies, and the exhibits include copper, tin, silver, antimony, and other valuable yields. One rarely sees a coal fire in Australia. There is nevertheless fair coal in New South Wales and Queensland, if not in other colonies. Hitherto Newcastle, in the mother country, has been the great coal emporium for Australia, but when the establishment of factories makes it remunerative to open up the nearer coal seams, there will be an abundance of material forthcoming. Many of the Australasian woods are too hard to be worked by ordinary tools, but there are quantities of the finest timbers that may be at once utilized by carpenters and cabinet makers, and in all the courts the best samples are shown. In the West Australian Court a striking monument has been built up of

PEARL SHELLS.

This represents an adventurous industry carried on principally in Torres Straits by divers who go down among the sharks and other sea monsters for shells such as those glittering with opaline tints in the trophy. Occasionally a valuable pearl is found inside, but the direct object of the venture is the inner lining of the shell, from which mother-of-pearl is made. Ethnography is copiously illustrated in the native curiosities, and the New South Wales Court has a magnificent collection of weapons and utensils from New Guinea.

Upon the north-western border of New South Wales, principally on the Clarence River, sugar is successfully grown; but the sugar plantation at its highest prosperity must be sought nearer the Tropic of Capricorn, out of the region of harmful frosts. The Queensland Court accordingly shows the marvellous sugar-producing capabilities of that colony, and also indicates the long list of valuable semi-tropical products which may there be grown. In all the courts the aid of photography has been used to show the character of tropical growths and products which could not themselves be sent so long a distance.

THE OPENING CEREMONY

on May 4th was a scene of extraordinary impressiveness. The vast interior was packed with an assemblage numbering thousands, and composed of the very élite of London. The spectacle presented was magnificent and legend-like. There were scores of foreign princes and diplomats in court dress; hundreds of British officers in full uniform, resplendent with gold lace and bright buttons; Chinese and Japanese officials in rich and picturesque silk, and numberless men proudly wearing decorations. The display of gold lace, medals, and colors on the part of the men was phenomenal, while the ladies were gorgeously attired. The Queen was warmly welcomed, and appeared pleased by the reception. The proceedings consisted of a carefully prepared programme of music, the presentation of addresses to the Queen by the colonies participating in the Exhibition, and a formal declaration by Her Majesty that the show was open.

A very appropriate feature of the ceremony was the singing of "Home, Sweet Home" by the Canadian prima-donna, Madame Albani. At its conclusion the Queen was formally addressed by the Commissioner, and in reply said: "I heartily concur in the belief you have expressed that the Prince Consort, my beloved husband, had he been spared, would have witnessed with intense interest the development of his ideas, and would, I may add, have seen with pleasure our son taking the lead in a movement of which he was the originator." She then handed to "our son" the monster gold key, half a foot long, and brilliant with rubies and emeralds, which is not a toy, but a master-key opening every door in the building. A flourish of trumpets proclaimed to the people outside, as the Prince of Wales took the key from his mother's hands, that the Exhibition was formally opened.

It is gratifying to notice that special efforts are being made by the Christian public of London to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the visit of large numbers of people from distant lands to extend the knowledge of the Gospel. It may be hoped especially that among those who go from India, some at least may carry back with them a treasure outweighing in value all the wealth of this world.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Wonderful Change Somewhere.—At a recent meeting Mr. Ferrie related: "A gentleman once said to an aged Christian woman, 'How do you know you are a new creature?' 'If I am not a new creature,' answered the old lady, 'everything around and within has become new. There has been a marvellous change either in me or in the things around me.' That word is gloriously true—'Wherefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold all things are become new.'"

A Safe Resting-Place.—Mr. Bamford remarked: "Two women were dying not far from our place of meeting, and they sent word for one of our workers to call and see them. I myself visited one of them, and after prayer and a few words of Scripture promises, I inquired: 'Are you resting on Jesus?' 'I thank God I am truly resting on Jesus,' she replied, with a happy smile. A short time afterward she made a slight movement, and she was asked by her daughter if she wanted anything. Her reply was: 'No, no, my dear; I want nothing now but Jesus.' In a few hours passed in this delightful frame of mind she gently passed away."

Cleaning a Room for Jesus.—Two lady workers called upon the other woman, and found her lying in a most untidy apartment, with many discomforts around her. After saying a few words to her, one lady said to the other: 'How miserable this place is! I feel I should like to clean it. Will you help me?' There was a little reluctance on the part of the other, for the ladies were delicately nurtured and unused to such work. 'It is work to be done for Jesus' sake,' said the first lady, pressing her. 'Then I will help you,' said her companion. They commenced, and worked until the room was clean and tidy. The sick woman's husband returned home shortly afterward, and found the ladies praying with his wife. He was struck with the great change that had taken place in his home, and declared that he scarcely knew it to be the same room. He said: 'I have been spoken with and prayed with over and over again, but nothing has moved me like this.' He has since, through God's grace, given himself to Christ, and owned that it was the ladies' work that made him think for the first time that there was some good in religion."

Christ Among Lodging-House Refugees.—Mr. Bamford said: "At the close of a recent meeting in a tramps' lodging-house, which I and some of my friends held there, many poor broken-down fellows, with tears streaming down their care-worn faces, were earnestly seeking the way of salvation through Christ. One man touched me on the arm, and said: 'Would you speak with me for a minute?' I knew by the accent of his speech and manner that he had been well educated. 'Surely,' I said, as I followed him into a seat, and he began: 'Since last Sunday, sir, when you were here, I have been very anxious about my soul.' He disclosed the fact that at one time he held a responsible and remunerative position in Ireland, but that drink had dragged him down, until now he had to take refuge in a common lodging-house, but with crushed spirit he sought the Saviour who had been long searching for him. And did He seek in vain? No! the Good Shepherd found the wandering sheep, and he is now safe in the fold."

The Fragments of a Wasted Life.—"I Attended a meeting of students last night, where I heard many testimonies from them of how they had been brought to the Lord; but there was one with which I was particularly struck. A young man rose and said, 'Behold the fragments of a wasted life!' and then he went on to tell us that he had been brought up in a God-fearing household, and that he always had the idea that he was a Christian until he went away from home, and then he found that his Christianity would not stand the wear and tear of life at the University. Gradually he gave up his religious duties, and in a reckless moment he was induced to buy an infidel book which, after reading himself, he lent to two companions; and his one great grief concerning these two young men is, that one committed suicide and the other is a vagrant in a foreign land. After three years of careless and sinful life at college he returned home. Here he grew worse. At length, wearied of seeing the pained expression on his parents' faces caused by him, he left his home and went to Wales, where he was engaged as a physician's assistant. After living there for some time an epidemic broke out, and he, among many others, was stricken down. One day in the midst of his illness a lady came and sang to him the hymn, 'Nothing but leaves.' 'Ah, that is me,' he remarked, as she concluded. 'You ought to read your Bible in private,' she said. He took her advice, and read on until he came to the verse in John 3:16, 'For God so loved the world,' etc. 'That is the verse for me,' he said, and getting on his knees he asked the Lord to forgive him for the sake of Jesus. The Lord heard him, as He always does hear the cry for pardon."

Beaten by a Brother.—"A Few Days Ago, at the close of a Gospel meeting, I spoke to a young man who was sitting with a rather hopeless look upon his face. 'Are you a follower of the Lord?' I inquired. 'No,' he said, 'I am not, but I should like very much to be saved. It is not for the want of knowledge that I am not; I know my Bible well. But I have a brother who is a professing Christian, and his life is so inconsistent that I doubt if there be much in Christianity, after all. For example: I live with him, and last week he unjustly demanded from me all my wages, and when I refused to do so he beat me, and then told me to go out of his house and never enter it again; so, you see, sir, that is what keeps me from being a Christian.' 'And do you really believe such a man has got a renewed heart?' 'No,' he said, 'I do not.' 'And so you are going to remain unsaved because some one professes to be a Christian who is not; and if you cannot live peaceably together here, how are you going to spend eternity in his company?' 'I do not know,' he rejoined; 'it is very hard.' 'Well,' I said, 'if you will take Jesus at His word to-night He will not fail you.' The result was that this young man closed with Christ. But, oh, what harm such men as this poor fellow's brother can do! How they keep the doubting and the faltering back!"

Forgiven with Dying Lips.—Mr. J. G. Forbes said: "A dearly loved and only son of his father, who lavished all care and love upon him, left his home, and, like the prodigal, sought to satisfy himself with the fleeting pleasures of this world. When far from his home he heard by the lips of a stranger that his father was dying. What a shock this was to him! He determined to see his father once again, if possible, before he passed away, and with this purpose in view he at once set out for his old home, which he reached about nightfall. Knowing the house well, he gained an entrance without any one seeing him. Noiselessly he entered his father's room. There was no one there but the dear father whom he had come so far to see, lying still and motionless—too still the son feared. Breathless and trembling he cautiously advanced toward the bed, and kneeling by its side he buried his face in his hands, and in an agony of grief and repentance sobbed as if his heart would break. Yet his grief, though deep, was not loud, for he intended going as he had come, without being perceived by any one. But while he knelt there, the father slowly opened his eyes, and at once saw the reflection of his son in a large mirror, which stood opposite the bed. In feeble accents, and placing his trembling hands on his boy's head, he murmured, 'My son! my son!' He could say no more. 'My father, will you—can you forgive me?' cried the young man. Clasped there in a close embrace, forgiveness was granted to the penitent boy. If such is the forgiving love of an earthly father, can you, poor sinner, limit the power or love of our Heavenly Father?"

THE LABOR QUESTION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 16, 1886.

"The earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."—GENESIS I: 2.

The Talmagian Version of the Creation—The Threatened Social Chaos—To be Averted by the Church—The Awful Peril—What Anarchy is—Advice to Three Classes of Laborers—Freedom of Workers—No Intimidation of Scabs—Mutual Dependence of Labor and Capital—Their Interests Identical—Relief in Co-operation—In Confidential Relations—In Religious Influence—A Scene at the Gate of Heaven—A Democratic Religion.

OUT in space there hung a great chunk of rock and mud and water and shell. Thousands of miles in diameter, more thousands of miles in circumference. A great mass of ugliness, confusion, and distortion, uselessness, ghastliness, and horror. It seemed like a great commons on which smashed-up worlds were dumped. It was what poetry and prose, scientist and Christian agree in calling chaos. Out of that black, rough, shapeless egg our beautiful world was hatched. God stood over that original and said: "Atlantic Ocean, you go right away and lie down there! Pacific Ocean, you sleep there! Caucasian range of mountains, you stand there! Mount Washington, you be sentinel there! Mont Blanc, you put on your coronet of crystal there! Mississippi, you march there, and Missouri you marry it there!" And He gathered in His Almighty hands the sand and mud and rock, and rolled and heaved and moulded and dented and compressed them into shape, and then dropped them in four places; and the one was Asia, and another was Europe, and another Africa, and another America, North and South.

SOCIAL CHAOS THREATENED.

That original chaos was like the confusion and anarchy into which the human race ever and anon has a tendency to plunge. God has said: "Let there be light of law, light of justice, light of peace, light of love!" "No! No!" say anarchic voices, "let there be darkness, let there be cut-throatery, let there be eternal imbroglia, let there be chaos."

Such a social condition many are expecting because of the overshadowing contest between Labor and Capital; there has not been an intelligent man or woman during the last two months who has not asked the question, "Shall we have bloody revolution in this country?" I have heard many answer the question in the affirmative; I answer it in the negative.

THE CHURCH AS PEACEMAKER.

There may be and there have been terrific outbursts of popular frenzy, but there will be no anarchy, for the Church of Christ, the mightiest and grandest institution of the planet, shall, laying hold of the strength of the eternal God, come out, and putting one hand on the shoulder of Labor and the other on the shoulder of Capital, say, "I come in the name of the God who turned chaos into magnificent order, to settle this dispute by the principles of eternal justice and kindness; and now I command you, take your hands off of each other's throats." The only impartial institution on this subject is the Church, for it is made up of both capitalists and laborers, and was founded by Christ, who was a carpenter, and so has a right to speak for all laborers, and who owns the earth and the solar system and the universe, and so can speak for the capitalists.

As for myself, as an individual I have a right to be heard. My father was a farmer and my grandfather, and they had to work for a living; and every dollar I own I earned by the sweat of my own brow, and I owe no man anything, and if any obligation has escaped my memory, come and present your bill when I descend from this pulpit, and I will pay you on the spot. I am going to say all that I think and feel on this subject, and without any reservation, asking your prayers that I may be divinely directed in this important series of Sabbath morning discourses:

That Labor has grievances I will show you plainly before I get through this course of sermons. That Capital has had outrages committed upon it I will make evident beyond dispute. But there are right and wrong ways of attempting a reformation.

When I say there will be no return to social chaos I do not underrate the awful PERIL OF THESE TIMES.

We must admit that the tendency is toward revolution. Great throngs gather at some points of disturbance in almost all our cities. Rail-trains hurled over the rocks. Workmen beaten to death within sight of their wives and children. Factories assailed by mobs. The faithful police of our cities exhausted by vigilance night and day. In some cases the military called out. The whole country asking the question, "What next?" A part of Belgium one great riot. Germany and Austria keeping their workmen quiet only by standing armies so vast that they are eating out the life of those nations. The only reason that Ireland is in peace is because she is hoping for Home Rule and the triumph of Gladstonism. The labor quarrel is hemispheric, aye, a world-wide quarrel, and the whole tendency is toward anarchy.

But one way in which we may avoid anarchy is by letting the people know

WHAT ANARCHY IS.

We must have the wreck pointed out in order to steer clear of it. Anarchy is abolition of right of property. It makes your store and your house and your money and your family mine, and mine yours. It is wholesale robbery. It is every man's hand against every other man. It is arson and murder and rapine and lust and death triumphant. It means no law, no church, no defence, no rights, no happiness, no God. It means hell let loose on earth, and society a combination of devils incarnate. It means extermination of everything good and the coronation of everything infamous. Do you want it? Will you have it? Before you let it get a good foothold in America take a good look at the dragon.

Look at Paris, where for a few days it held sway, the gutters red with blood and the walks down the street a stepping between corpses, the Archbishop shot as he tries to quell the mob, and every man and woman armed with knife or pistol or bludgeon. Let this country take one good, clear, scrutinizing look at anarchy before it is admitted, and it will never be allowed to set up its reign in our borders. No; there is too much good sense dominant in this country to permit anarchy. All good people will, together with the officers of civil government, cry "Peace!" and it will be re-established. Meanwhile, my brotherly counsel is to

THREE CLASSES OF LABORERS.

First, to those who are at work. Stick to it. Do not amid the excitement of these times drop your employment, hoping that something better will turn up. He who gives up work now, whether he be railroad man, mechanic, farmer, clerk, or any other kind of employé, will probably give it up for starvation. You may not like the line of steamers that you are sailing in, but do not jump overboard in the middle of the Atlantic. Be a little earlier than usual at your post of work while this turmoil lasts, and attend to your occupation with a little more assiduity than has ever characterized you.

My brotherly counsel, in the second place, is to those who have resigned work. It is best for you and best for everybody to go back immediately. Do not wait to see what others do. Get on board the train of national prosperity before it starts again, for start it will, start soon and start mightily. Last year in the city of New York there were 45 general strikes and 177 shop strikes. Successful strikes, 97; strikes lost, 34; strikes pending at the time the statistics were made, 59; strikes compromised, 32. Would you like me to tell you who will make the most out of the present almost universal strike? I can and will. Those will make the most out of it who go first to work.

My third word of brotherly advice is to the nearly two million people who could not get work before this trouble began, and who have themselves and their families to support, to go now and take the vacated places. Go in and take those places a million and a half strong. Green hands you may be now, but you will not be green hands long. My sentiment is full liberty for all who want to strike to do so, and full liberty for all who want to take the vacated places. Other industries will open for those who are now taking a vacation, for we have only opened the outside door of this continent, and there is room in this country for eight hundred million people, and for each one of them a home and a livelihood and a God!

PLENTY OF ROOM.

So, however others may feel about this excitement as wide as the continent, I am not scared a bit. The storm will hush. Christ will put His foot upon it as upon agitated Galilee. As at the beginning, chaos will give place to order as the Spirit of God moves upon the waters. But hear it, workingmen of America! Your first step toward light and betterment of condition will be an assertion of your individual independence from the dictation of your fellow-workmen. You are a free man, and let no organization come between you and your best interests. Do not let any man, or any body of men, tell you where you shall work, or where you shall not work, when you shall work, or when you shall not work. If a man wants to belong to a labor organization, let him belong. If he does not want to belong to a labor organization, let him have perfect liberty to stay out. You own yourself. Let no man put a manacle on your hand or foot or head or heart.

I belong to a ministerial association that meets once a week. I love all the members very much. We may help each other in a hundred ways, but when that association shall tell me to quit my work and go somewhere else, that I must stop right away because a brother minister has been badly treated down in Texas, I will say to that ministerial association, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" Furthermore, I have a right to resign my pastorate of this church and say to the people, "I decline to work for you any longer. I am going. Good-by." But I have no right, after I have quit this pulpit, to linger around the doors on Sunday mornings and evenings with a shot-gun to intimidate or hinder the minister who comes to take my place. I may quit my place and continue to be a gentleman, but when I interfere with my successor in this pulpit I become a criminal, and deserve nothing better than soup in a tin bowl in Sing Sing Penitentiary. Your first duty, oh laboring man, is to your family! Let no one but Almighty God dictate to you how you shall support them. Work when you please, where you please, at what you please, and allow no one for a hundred millionth part of a second to interfere with your right. When we emerge from the present unhappiness, as we soon will, we shall find many tyrannies broken, and Labor and Capital will march shoulder to shoulder.

MUTUAL DEPENDENCE.

This day I declare the mutual dependence of Labor and Capital. An old tentmaker put it just right—I mean Paul—when he declared: "The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee." You have examined some elaborate machinery—a thousand wheels, a thousand bands, a thousand levers, a thousand pulleys, but all controlled by one great water-wheel, all the parts adjoined so that if you jarred one part you jarred all the parts. Well, society is a great piece of mechanism, a thousand wheels, a thousand pulleys, a thousand levers, but all controlled by one great and ever-revolving force—the wheel of God's providence. The professions interdependent, all the trades interdependent, Capital and Labor interdependent, so that the man who lives in a mansion on the hill, and the man who breaks cobble-stones at the foot of the hill affect each other's misfortune or prosperity. Dives cannot kick Lazarus without hurting his own foot. They who throw Shadrach into the furnace get their own faces scorched and blackened. No such thing as independence. Smite society at any one point and you smite the entire community.

IDENTICAL INTERESTS.

Relief will come to the working-classes of this country through a better understanding between Capital and Labor. Before this contest goes much further it will be found that their interests are identical; what helps one helps both; what injures one injures both. Until the crack of doom there will be no relief for the working-classes until there is a better understanding between Labor and Capital and this war ends. Every speech that Capital makes against Labor is an adjournment of our national prosperity. Every speech that Labor makes against Capital is an adjournment of our national prosperity. The capitalists of the country, so far as I know them, are successful laborers. If the capitalists in this house to-day would draw their glove, you would see the broken finger-nail, the scar of an old blister, here and there a stiffened finger-joint. The great publishers of New York and Philadelphia, so far as I know them, were bookbinders or printers on small pay. The carriage manufacturers of the country used to sandpaper the wagon-bodies in the wheelwright's shop.

PHILANTHROPIC CAPITALISTS.

Peter Cooper was a glue-maker. No one begrudged him his millions of dollars, for he built Cooper Institute and swung open its doors for every poor man's son, and said to the day laborer: "Send your boy up to my Institute if you want him to have a splendid education." And a young man of this church was the other day walking in Greenwood Cemetery, and he saw two young men putting flowers on the grave of Peter Cooper. My friend supposed the young men were relatives of Peter Cooper and decorated his grave for that reason. "No," they said, "we put these flowers on his grave because it was through him we got our education." Abraham Van Nest was a harness-maker in New York. Through economy and industry and skill he got a great fortune. He gave away to help others hundreds of thousands of dollars. I shall never forget the scene when I, a green country lad, stopped at his house, and after passing the evening with him he came to the door and came outside and said: "Here, De Witt, is fifty dollars to get books with. Don't say anything about it." And I never did till the good old man was gone. Henry Clay was "the Mill-boy of the Slashes." Hugh Miller, a stonemason; Columbus, a weaver; Halley, a soap-boiler; Arkwright, a barber; the learned Bloomfield, a shoemaker; Hogarth, an engraver of pewter plate, and Horace Greeley started life in New York with ten dollars and seventy-five cents in his pocket.

The distance between Capital and Labor is not a great gulf over which is swung a Niagara suspension bridge; it is only a step, and the laborers here will cross over and become capitalists, and the capitalists will cross over and become laborers. Would to God they would shake hands while they are crossing, these from one side, and those from the other side.

WHO THE COMBATANTS ARE.

The combatants in this great war between Capital and Labor are chiefly, on the one side, men of fortune who have never been obliged to toil, and who despise labor, and, on the other hand, men who could get labor, but will not have it, will not stick to it. It is the hand cursing the eye, or the eye cursing the hand. I want it understood that the laborers are the highest style of capitalists. Where is their investment? In the bank? No. In railroad stock? No. Their muscles, their nerves, their bones, their mechanical skill, their physical health, are the highest kind of capital. The man who has two feet, and two ears, and two eyes, and ten fingers, owns a machinery that puts into nothingness Corliss's engine and all the railroad rolling stock, and all the carpet and screw and cotton factories on the planet. I wave the flag of truce this morning between these contestants. I demand a cessation of hostilities between Labor and Capital. What is good for one is good for both. What is bad for one is bad for both.

CO-OPERATION.

Again, relief will come to the working-classes of this country through a co-operative association. I am not now referring to trades-unions. We may hereafter discuss that question. But I refer to that plan by which laborers become their own capitalists, taking their surpluses and putting them together and carrying on great enterprises. In England and Wales there are seven hundred and sixty-five co-operative associations, with three hundred thousand members, with a capital of fourteen million of dollars, doing business in one year to the amount of fifty-seven million dollars. In Troy, N. Y., there was a co-operative iron foundry association. It worked well long enough to give an idea of what could be accomplished when the experiment is fully developed.

You say that there have been great failures in that direction. I admit it. Every great movement at the start is a failure. The application of steam power a failure, electro-telegraphy a failure, railroading a failure, but after awhile the world's chief successes. I hear some say, "Why, it is absurd to talk of a surplus to be put into this co-operative association, when men can hardly get enough to eat and wear and take care of their families." I reply, Put into my hand the money spent in the last five years in this country by the laboring classes for rum and tobacco, and I will start a co-operative institution of monetary power that will surpass any financial institution in the United States.

TAKEN INTO CONFIDENCE.

Again, I remark, that relief will come to the working-classes through more thorough discovery on the part of employers that it is best for them to let their employes know just how matters stand. The most of the capitalists of to-day are making less than six per cent, less than five per cent, less than four per cent, on their investments. Here and there is an anacanda swallowing down everything, but such are the exceptions. It is often the case that employes blame their employer because they suppose he is getting along grandly, when he is oppressed to the last point of oppression. I knew a manufacturer who employed more than a thousand hands. I said to him: "Do you ever have any trouble with your workmen? do you have any strikes?" "No," he said. "What! in this time of angry discussion between Capital and Labor, no trouble?" "None at all—none." I said: "How is that?" "Well," he said: "I have a way of my own. Every little while I call my employes together and I say, 'Now, boys, I want to show you how matters stand. What you turned out this year brought so much. You see it isn't as much as we got last year. I can't afford to pay you as much as I did. Now, you know I put all my means in this business. What do you think ought to be my percentage, and what wages ought I to pay you? Come, let us settle this.' And," said that manufacturer, "we are always unanimous. When we suffer, we all suffer together. When we advance, we advance together, and my men would die for me." But when a man goes among his employes with a supercilious air, and drives up to his factory as though he were the autocrat of the universe, with the sun and the moon in his vest-pockets, moving amid the wheels of the factory, chiefly anxious lest a greased or smirched hand should touch his immaculate broadcloth, he will see at the end he has made an awful mistake. I think that employers will find out after awhile that it is to their interest, as far as possible, to explain matters to their employes. You be frank with them, and they will be frank with you.

Again, I remark, relief will come to the laboring classes through the religious rectification of the country. Labor is appreciated and rewarded just in proportion as a country is Christianized. Show me a community that is thoroughly infidel, and I will show you a community where wages are small. Show me a community that is thoroughly Christianized, and I will show you a community where wages are comparatively large. How do I account for it? The philosophy is easy. Our religion is a democratic religion. It makes the owner of the mill understand he is a brother to all the operatives in that mill. Born of the same heavenly Father, to lie down in the same dust, to be saved by the same supreme mercy. No putting on of airs in the sepulchre or in the judgment.

An engineer in a New England factory gets sleepy, and he does not watch the steam-gauge, and there is a wild thunder of explosion, and the owner of the mill and one of the workmen are slain. The two slain men come up toward the gate of heaven. The owner of the mill knocks at the gate. The celestial gate-keeper cries, "Who is there?" The reply comes, "I was the owner of a factory at Fall River, where there was an explosion just now, and I lost my life, and I want to come in." "Why do you want to come in, and by what right do you come in?" asks the celestial gate-keeper. "Oh," says the man, "I employed two or three hundred hands! I was a great man at Fall River." "You employed two or three hundred men," says the gate-keeper, "but how much Christian grace did you employ?" "None at all," says the owner of the mill. "Step back," says the celestial gate-keeper; "no admittance here for you." Right after comes up the poor workman. He knocks at the gate. The shining gate-keeper says, "Who is there?" He says, "I am a poor workman; I come up from the explosion in Fall River; I would like to enter." "What is your right to come in here?" asks the shining gate-keeper. The workman says, "I heard that a shining Messenger came forth from your world to our world to redeem it; I have been a bad man; I used to swear when I hurt my hand with the wheel; I used to be angry; I have done a great many wrong things, but I confessed it all to the Messenger that came from your country, and after I confessed it He told me to come up here, and that you may know I have a right to come, there is His name on the palm of my hand; here is His name on my forehead." Then there is a sound of working pulleys, and the gates lift, and the workingman goes in. There was a vast difference between the funerals at Fall River. The owner of the mill had a great funeral. The poor workman had a small funeral. The man who came up on his own pompous resources was shut out of heaven. The poor man, trusting in the grace of Jesus Christ, entered. So, you see, it is

A DEMOCRATIC RELIGION.

I do not care how much money you have, you have not enough money to buy your way through the gate. My friends, you need to saturate our populations with the religion of Christ, and wages will be larger, employers will be more considerate, all the tides of thrift will set in. I have the highest authority for saying that godliness is profitable for the life that now is. It pays for the employer. It pays for the employe. The hard hand of the wheel and the soft hand of the counting-room will clasp each other yet. They will clasp each other in congratulation. They will clasp each other on the glorious morning of the Millennium. The hard hand will say, "I ploughed the desert into a garden;" the soft hand will reply, "I furnished the seed." The one hand will say, "I thrashed the mountains;" the other hand will say, "I paid for the flail." The one hand will say, "I hammered the spear into a pruning-hook;" and the other hand will answer, "I signed the treaty of peace that made that possible." Then Capital and Labor will lie down together, and the lion and the lamb, and the leopard and the kid, and there will be nothing to hurt or to destroy in all God's holy mount, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

A LETTER FROM AN INDIAN GIRL.

IN the Christian School at the Santee Agency in Nebraska is a little girl of Indian parentage whose father is a Christian, and is doing all he is able to evangelize his brethren. He is now teaching at Burrill Station, Swift-Bear's Colony, Dak. The American Missionary publishes the following naïve communication from his little daughter, dated March 8th, 1886: "My dear lady: I am going to write to you. I am a Indian girl, and my Dakota name is Winona, and my English name is Fannie Frazier. I am 12 years old. I stay here five years. I like to go to school. I read in the Second Reader and Dakota Bible, and White's Arithmetic. I go to school in the morning and we sew in the afternoon. My father is Indian, his Dakota name is Petachnake. He is gone to teach to Swift Bear with my mother and uncle Willie. . . . My father went away in the Fall. The Indians where he is, wear blanket over their head and paint their faces. The men have long hair. They eat rice and bread and wild potatoes and wild beans, and the girls and boys braid their hair in two braids, and wear their shawls over their heads and paint their face, and come in that way to school. When they read, the other boys and girls laugh at them, but they don't be ashamed. When they come to church they come in that way too, and when they sing, they don't sing, they just only hold the book; only my father and mother, they sing; then my father read Bible, and if one boy or girl laugh and play, then their mother told them to stop. One man there has five wives, and they all have children. Every four weeks they go some where and get their food. There are some deers, and the men shoot them. My grandfather is a minister, and his wife is sick. That is all I have to say, so good by."

A CHINESE PHILANTHROPIST.

AN interesting sketch is given in the Spirit of Missions of Ahok, a converted Chinaman, who is a great merchant in the city of Foochow. He was, it appears, convinced some years ago of the truth of Christianity, but was prevented making a confession of faith by a business difficulty. His rivals in trade keep their men at work on Sundays as well as other days, and as Ahok employs over a thousand hands, he knew that in becoming a Christian he would be a loser to a serious extent. Four years ago, however, God gave him strength to bear this loss, and he presented himself for baptism. Since that his hands rest on Sunday.

Ahok is abundant in good works and alms-deeds. Though of humble origin, he has by industry, business tact, and integrity risen to a position of great wealth and influence. He has been created a mandarin by the government, in recognition of his many benefactions, one of which is the saving of innumerable girl babies by contributing to the support of poor mothers, who without this aid would put their female infants to death. The number of this kind of Mr. Ahok's pensioners is from three hundred to five hundred a year. As regards well-to-do parents, who simply "cannot be bothered with rearing useless girls," he seeks to influence them by pamphlets against the cruel custom of child-murder, and by endeavoring to create a healthy public sentiment on the subject.

Mr. Ahok has acquired the English language, and it delights him to extend the hospitalities of his elegant home to English and American visitors and residents at Foochow. He is exceedingly friendly to foreigners, and gives them his unvarying support when they are in a just antagonism to his own countrymen. He never fails by every means in his power to help and honor all persons connected with Christian missions. Among the very numerous good deeds of this exemplary Christian has been the foundation in a healthy situation in the country of a House of Rest for any over-wearied mission workers.

He has been the means of the conversion of his wife, his mother, and many others. He has two Christian meetings every week at his largest store, and a monthly one at his residence. He urges and encourages all his relatives, friends, and employés to become followers of Christ, and he himself is a living epistle of Christ known and read of all men. He has not only given $1000 as a first donation to the new Chinese Christian mission to Corea, but he has accompanied the Rev. J. R. Wolfe and the two Chinese evangelists to that country to see the mission started.

CHARMS AND ORNAMENTS SURRENDERED.

A TEST of sincerity was recently applied in a meeting of converts at the East Central African Mission with results which compare very favorably with those that would follow a similar test in our own land. In the course of a communication from the station of Makodweni, published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Wilcox says:

"Converts here have just as much of the earthly element clinging to them as anywhere, and among the few chosen ones there are doubtless the many who were merely called and who may only endure for a time, as is the case everywhere in the world. But we have certainly great reason for encouragement. At our meeting at Mongwe I had been preaching about how the early Christians brought all their wealth and laid it down at the apostles' feet. They—that is, our people here—had professed to have given up tobacco, beer, etc., but that was not enough; they must consecrate all to the Lord and not keep back anything. Now what had they left that they would not give up? With scarcely a moment's forethought as to what I was going to do, but observing their foolish ornaments of iron and brass on their ankles and wrists and dangling from their ears and around their necks, I asked who was willing to lay them down, hardly supposing that one would consent upon the spot. But immediately they began to strip them off.

"Some of these ornaments were grown into their bodies in such a way that we had to send for instruments to cut them off. There were charms of snake skins and bones, to part with which, most natives think, is next to parting with their lives. But, excepting the girls, not one of those who professed Christ went out of that house wearing any kind of ornament."

A PRAYER FOR A MURDERER.

MOST of our readers have doubtless read of the determined attempt made by a burglar to commit a murder on May 5th at Englewood, N. J. Two young men, George and Louis Coe, were returning home on that night, when they saw a light in the Sunday-School Library attached to the school-house. They knew something must be wrong, so they went to the window and looked in. They saw a burglar making up a package of books and a few valuables. They went away, and securing the assistance of a neighbor, returned with him to protect the school property. George Coe was the first to enter the building. No sooner did the burglar find himself disturbed than he drew his revolver and fired. George Coe was hit, and the burglar, apparently resolved to make sure of his work, fired again as he staggered, and continued shooting till he emptied his pistol. Two of the shots entered Coe's body, and a third grazed his temple. He was removed to his home and physicians were called, but they gave no hope of his recovery. The desperate criminal escaped, but has since been captured, and has confessed his crime.

On May 11th we had the privilege of reading a message from the wounded young man, written when he was believed to be near death. It is worthy of record, because it shows the influence of the spirit of Him who prayed on the cross, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." There is no philosophy known to men that would lead a young man whose bright earthly career was cut short by an unprovoked crime to the magnanimity it displays. This is the letter, written by the cousin of the sufferer:

"DEAR BROTHER H—: I write at the dictation of my poor cousin, George Coe, of whose condition you have doubtless read in the papers. He lies in a critical state, but bears his pain like a man and a Christian. These are his words to you: 'I desire that you will offer special petitions for my recovery at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, and that you will pray that the Spirit may be poured out on the unfortunate man who was the cause of my misfortune, so that he may be led to see the error of his ways and may finally obtain an entrance into heaven.'"

The special petitions were duly presented. We are glad to learn that the latest accounts of Mr. Coe's condition are of an unexpectedly favorable turn, a remarkable absence of fever, and that one of the bullets, which could not be probed for on account of the delicate organs near which it had passed, had been found in the bed, having fallen out of the wound of itself.

AN ECCENTRIC PREACHER.

A CURIOUS paragraph went the round of the press last week. It was based on a protest made by a Methodist Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania against the appointment of the Rev. J. Lee Gamble as its minister. A number of the members of the church are opposed to him because he holds and preaches certain doctrines. Among them are: That fairs, festivals, and entertainments should not be held in the church; the pastor's salary should not be raised by such methods; Christians should marry none but Christians, and he will not officiate at any marriage in which that principle is not observed, nor when either party uses stimulants or tobacco; Christians ought to wear no superfluous or costly raiment—gold or ornaments; the world is growing worse and not better, and will continue so to do until Christ comes, which event is very near; and God has made provision for sickness as well as sin. The holding and preaching of these doctrines render the preacher unacceptable to the church. They are quoted as evidence of his eccentricity, and as it is further stated that he persists in walking to keep his Sunday engagements instead of using the cars, and that during the war he was confined in Libby Prison for a long time, and left it a physical wreck, though he is now robust in body, there is a thinly concealed hint that the man is demented. We are not surprised if his sanity is really doubted. Isaiah spoke of a time when he that departed from evil would be accounted mad (Isa. 59: 15, marg.).

A STINGY MAN'S HAMS.

IN one of Sam Jones's sermons published by Messrs J. S. Ogilvie & Company, of New York, the evangelist tells the following story, as an illustration of the fact that the Christian man has often to fight after his conversion with the devil, who still tries to control him:

There was a very stingy man I heard of once—very scarce, you know, but occasionally you will run across a stingy man. Well, we ran across one down in our country. His wife was a Methodist, and he would go with his wife to church, but he never would pay a dime toward the support of the church—he was very close—and one summer he professed religion and joined the church himself.

Well, shortly after he joined the church the steward went over to his house and spoke to him kindly, and told him: "Our preacher is scarce now of provisions, and I come over to see if I could get some meat from you for the preacher." He had a smoke-house full, and he thought a minute. "Why," said he, "certainly I will give the preacher some meat."

He went out to his smoke-house; the steward sat in the window. He walked out to the smoke-house, unlocked the door, got a big, fine ham down, brought it about half way back toward the house, and stopped and laid it down in the path, looked at it a minute, and turned around and walked back to the smoke-house, got another, and came and laid it down, and he stood and looked at it a minute, turned right around to the smoke-house and got another, and came and laid it down. The steward was watching him, and saw him look down at the three hams.

The steward could not understand it, but at last he overheard the man mutter: "If you don't shut your mouth, you old stingy devil, you, I will go and give him all there is in the smoke-house." The devil was in him, the devil was in him, and the devil told him every time: "You going to give away that ham?" "Are you going to give away that ham?" And just kept after him, and he tried to hush the devil's mouth by putting in one ham at a time; but finally he silenced him when he said: "If you don't hush your mouth I will give him every ham in the smoke-house." And the devil hushed then.

The Second Stage of Christ's Coming—The Harvest Ingathering of All Living Christians—The Battle of Armageddon—Some Characteristics of the Millennium—Dates Ending between 1898 and 1900.

RECAPITULATION.

A BRIEF recapitulation of the nine stupendous events already noticed will be useful in this place, that a full appreciation may be had of the tenth event, in which they will culminate, and for which they will be a preparation:

FIRST.—Great wars and revolutions commencing not later than about eleven or twelve years before the End of this Age, and completely transforming by eight or nine years before the End, the now existing twenty-three kingdoms or States within the countries of Caesar's original Roman Empire into an Allied Confederacy of Ten Kingdoms ruled by Ten Sovereigns, as represented by ten horns of Daniel's wild beast (7: 24)—viz., Britain separated from Ireland, France extended to the Rhine, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Bulgaria.

SECOND.—The rise of a Napoleon after the formation of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, eight or nine years before the End, as an Eleventh Little Sovereign among the Ten Sovereigns—the Little Horn of Daniel 7 and 8, who will presently become "King of the North" (Syria) (Dan. 11: 40).

THIRD.—A great stir, excitement, and inquiry into these prophecies will agitate Christian people's minds when they behold the startling phenomenon of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy and the wars just preceding it, and still more when the Napoleon rises in the East, and becomes King of Syria (Matt. 25: 1-10).

FOURTH.—The making of a seven years' covenant between many of the Jews and the before-mentioned Napoleonic Sovereign (Dan. 9: 27).

FIFTH.—The recommencement of the Jewish daily sacrifices in Jerusalem, about two hundred and fifty days, or eight months and ten days after the date of the covenant (Dan. 8: 14), because it is 2300 days before the cleansing of the sanctuary.

SIXTH.—The coming of Christ peacefully in its first stage to raise to life deceased Christians, and to take them up together with 144,000 watchful living Christians to meet Him in the heavens—constituting the first-fruits ascension—about two years and two weeks after the covenant (1 Thes. 4: 16, 17; Rev. 12: 5; 14: 1-5).

SEVENTH.—A world-wide preaching of the Gospel of the kingdom to all nations, accompanied by a Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit, fulfilling the First Angel Message and First Seal in Revelation 14: 6; v. 2; Joel 2: 28-32.

EIGHTH.—Universal war will then rage during the second Seal (Rev. 6) for several months further on, just before the three and a half years' Great Tribulation, and the ten kingdoms will become Red, Communistic republics, as described in Revelation 17.

NINTH.—The great tribulation and anti-Christian persecution for three and a half years—the second half of the seven years of the Jewish covenant week, during which the Antichrist Napoleon will massacre millions of Christians, especially throughout the ten kingdoms (Dan. 7: 25; 9: 27; Rev. 11: 2, 3; 12: 6, 14; 13: 5).

THE TENTH EVENT.

The coming of Christ, wrathfully in its second stage, to take up to the heavens all remaining Christians converted during the tribulation, and then to descend at the battle of Armageddon to destroy Antichrist and to begin the Millennium, is seven years and two and a half months after the covenant made with the Jews.

This second act or crisis of our Lord's return will be a wrathful manifestation of His presence in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those that obey not His Gospel; but just before His descent to inflict this vengeance, there will be the harvest ingathering to heaven by translation of all the living Christians then found on the earth, and who will have passed through the three and a half years' tribulation. The following passages describe this:

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days . . . they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, and shall send His angels, and they shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from the uttermost parts of the earth" (Matt. 24: 29-31; Mark 13: 25).

"After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and people and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands. These are they that came out of the great tribulation" (i.e., the tribulation of three and a half years described under the seals in Revelation 6; 7: 9-14).

THE BATTLE OF ARMAGEDDON

is then fought immediately after the ingathering to the heavens of the great multitude of the elect.* It is described in the nineteenth chapter of Revelation, and the fourteenth of Zechariah, and the thirty-eighth of Ezekiel. After this, the spared remnant of mankind will be converted, and will inhabit the earth in successive generations during the Millennium of 1000 years, and will be ruled by the glorified resurrection saints coming down from the heavenly Jerusalem from day to day. Thus will Christ, with His immortal saints, personally reign for 1000 years over the mortal inhabitants of the earth. (Read Rev. 19, 20, and 21; Ezek. 39; Dan. 7: 14; and last chapters of Isaiah and Zechariah.)

THE FOCUS PERIOD.

The following prophetic dates apparently terminate between A.D. 1898 and 1900 as the End of this Age or Dispensation, and Personal Descent of Christ on Mount Olivet (Zech. 14: 1-4), and beginning of the Millennium of 1000 years (Rev. 20). The 6000 years are universally believed to be typified by the six days of Creation, each representing 1000 years, to be followed by the seventh day of Millennial rest—the seventh thousand years (Rev. 20). Thus we are living in the Saturday night of the World's Week. The Chronology of Usher, adopted in the marginal references of Bibles, places Christ's Nativity about the year 4004, but the recent researches of Clinton and others show that Usher missed at least one hundred years out of the whole period of the Judges, making that period to be about three hundred and fifty instead of four hundred and fifty years, as stated in Acts 13: 20. "He gave them Judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years."

Usher gives B.C. 1444 in Joshua 14 as the date of the dividing of the land of Canaan and the beginning of the period of the Judges, and B.C. 1094-95 in 1 Samuel 12 as the date when the era of the Judges ended. This gives only three hundred and fifty years for the reigns of the Judges. Christ's birth was really about 4104, or in general terms, 4100, Anno Mundi (i.e., in the year of the world).

THE SEVEN TIMES.

The 2520 years, or seven times (7 × 360 year-days) is the whole Chronological length of Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic Image representing the duration of the four universal Gentile Empires prefigured by it—viz., the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Macedonian, and Roman Empires (see Dan. 2: 31-45; 7: 4: 16). It commenced at the Babylonian Empire's full establishment, about B.C. 620, and reaches to A.D. 1900.

The 2300 years (Dan. 8: 14), with the supplementary forty-five years, is explained in Daniel 9: 24, 25 to have its first sixty-nine weeks of years, or four hundred and eighty-three years measured off from it and terminating with the cutting off of the Messiah—the crucifixion of Christ—which took place, according to the late Duke of Manchester and other eminent chronologists, between A.D. 36 and 38, for the birth of Christ seems to have been about A.D. 3 or 5 in the Christian Era.

The 2300 years terminate simultaneously with the 1290 years, and therefore from their joint termination in 1853-55 there are forty-five years more (the prolongation of the 1335 beyond the 1290, Dan. 12: 11, 12) to elapse before the time of full blessedness; and forty-five years added to 1853-55 end between 1898 and 1900, as the End of this Age. The 1260 years of the Mahomedan Antichrist treading down the Holy City Jerusalem (Rev. 11: 2-9) commenced with the Mahomedan capture of Jerusalem, A.D. 637-38, and end A.D. 1897-98.

The three and a half years of the Slaying of the Witnesses will then follow from 1897 to 1900, if they are to come just after the 1260 years. The 360 years in Rev. 10: 6 which described the Reformation about 1545 is denoted by "a time" or year (360 year-days). Hence the Angel's declaration, "There shall be a Time No Longer," means that there does not remain so long a period as 360 years from 1545—i.e., that the End will come before 1905.

THE NAPOLEONIC IDEA.

AT this time, when students of prophecy are expecting the approaching manifestation of the Napoleonic Antichrist, much interest attaches to the schemes devised by the founder of the Napoleonic dynasty, which included a conception of European dictatorship. A curious and deeply-interesting manuscript* recently discovered among a quantity of historical papers confirms this fact. The manuscript was unfinished, unsigned, and undated, but the finder, M. Lalanne, succeeded in identifying its author, by his handwriting, as Claude Fauriel, who was a professor at the Sorbonne when Napoleon was made First Consul. Fauriel, who was a keen and vigilant observer, says: "Bonaparte had formed the project of uniting and concentrating in his own hands, not only all the authority of the French Republic from within, but also all its influence on neighboring countries. Several States, all independent of each other, and each governed by its own laws, were to form the various portions of one and the same empire under the rule of one and the same hereditary and absolute chief, who should have a special right over and a particular title in each of these different districts." Fauriel goes on to show how this plan of Napoleon's was to be executed, by beginning with the smaller States near at hand, and gradually drawing in the more powerful kings by discrediting them with their people. We know now how Napoleon's scheme collapsed at Waterloo, but the mighty Napoleon of the last days will cherish the same hope which his master, the devil, will give him the power to realize (Dan. 11: 21-24).

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Ominous Fall in the Price of Silver Took place in Europe last week. At this reduced rate the silver in our standard dollar is worth less than seventy-eight cents. Thus it would be possible to buy in Europe, for one hundred dollars in gold, enough silver to make one hundred and twenty-eight and a half silver dollars. Obviously our persistence in coining silver has not had the effect on the world's markets that was expected from it.

A Remarkable Decrease in Exports of Provisions is reported by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics. The report shows a falling off not only for the month of April but for the preceding four, six, and twelve months. The articles affected are beef, pork, and dairy products. The decrease for the month as compared with April, 1885, is $635,652. For the four months ending April, 30th, compared with the corresponding period of last year, it is $7,253,254. Beef and pork only for six months, show a reduction of $9,910,992. Dairy products for the year ending April 30th, as compared with the year before, are less by $4,405,134.

The Seizure of the American Ship, David J. Adams, by the Canadian Government, might at other times and in other circumstances lead to international complications, but in these happier days ought to be easily arranged. The treaty of 1818, under which the schooner was seized, stipulates that the bays and harbors of the Dominion shall be open to American fishermen seeking shelter, repairs, wood, or water, but not under other circumstances. The David J. Adams entered to purchase bait, which was clearly a purpose not covered by the treaty. The captain seemed to be aware that he was infringing it, for he tried to prevent identification by covering the ship's name with canvas, and he had also neglected to secure the permit which the United States laws require every ship to carry, which is sailing to a foreign port for trading purposes. It may be hoped that there is sufficient good feeling and common sense in both countries to prevent the incident being magnified beyond its proper proportions. The treaty of 1818 seems to have outlived its usefulness; more reciprocal privileges than it permits would be mutually beneficial.

The Eight-Hour Labor Movement has, it appears, met with success chiefly in the trades not subject to foreign competition. Bradstreet's circular states that the number of men who have joined in the demand is 325,000. Of these it has been conceded to 150,000 without a strike, and to 35,000 after striking, leaving 140,000 still on strike or defeated. The most successful men have been those engaged in building, furniture-making, and in the manufacture of machinery and agricultural implements. In some cases where the concession has been made, it will be withdrawn after certain contracts have been completed.

The Best Boycott Ever Proclaimed is Advocated by the chief of the Knight of Labor, who, as a rule, hates all boycotts. In a circular issued last week he advises every Knight of Labor to boycott intoxicating liquor for five years, and adds: "The firmest link in the chain of oppression is the one I forge when I drown manhood and reason in drink." In the same circular Mr. Powderly also expresses very emphatically his abhorrence of violence. He says: "We have had some trouble from members who talk about buying guns and dynamite. If the men who possess money enough to buy guns and dynamite would invest it in some well-selected work on labor they would put the money to good use." It may be hoped that the words of so influential a man will have their effect on the workingmen of the country.

Herr Most, the Anarchist Editor, was Arrested on May 11th in New York, under a warrant charging him with inciting to murder. At a meeting on April 23d, he advised workingmen to buy rifles and bayonets, and when they had them to "rise and take what belongs to you." For these words the grand jury indicted Most and others who made speeches at the same meeting. The others were easily captured, but Most succeeded in evading the vigilance of the police. As often happens his vices led to his capture. A woman with whom he held vicious relations was watched, and Most was caught hiding under the bed. He was dragged out and carried to prison, where he was held in bail. An arrest in circumstances so ignominious ought to render Most ridiculous in the eyes of his followers, who might still have continued to believe in him had he faced the not very serious danger boldly.

A Series of Violent Storms Involving a heavy loss of life were reported last week. The first visited Kansas City, Mo., on May 11th. As it was not a tornado, the calamity which resulted was probably due to the insecurity of the public buildings. The first indication of its approach was a darkness at noon almost like night. Suddenly, the wind rose with a force that swept all lighter objects before it, overturned vehicles, and broke in the windows. Torrents of rain fell, with some hail, until the streets looked like rivers. The tower of the Lathrop School building yielded before the wind, and with the huge bell hung in it fell upon the roof, and plunged through the intervening floors to the basement. The building was full of children, one hundred of whom were precipitated with the falling floors to the wreck below. Fifteen were killed on the spot, and many more were badly injured. The Court House also was ruined by the storm, but the court had been adjourned a short time before, and only one life was lost. A factory and a mill were also blown down and ten persons were killed. Twenty others lost their lives in other parts of the city. On the following day a cyclone passed over parts of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and West Virginia inflicting serious losses. The village of Odell was nearly swept out of existence. Public buildings, houses and barns were wrecked, and many people were killed, and others fatally injured. At Xenia, O., the fatalities were appalling. The storm became a cloud-burst, and was accompanied by thunder and lightning. It reached that city about ten o'clock at night, and continued until midnight. The river rose, broke through the embankment, and deluged the city. The deaths from falling buildings and drowning numbered twenty-nine, and there are many persons reported missing. From many other places distressing reports continue to arrive.

An Important Meeting of the Opponents of Mr. Gladstone's scheme of Home Rule for Ireland was held in London on May 14th. Its object was to cement the unnatural alliance of the Marquis of Hartington with Mr. Chamberlain and their respective followers. Lord Hartington declared that the pledges from Liberals to oppose Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule bill were sufficient in number to make the rejection of the bill on its second reading a certainty. The defeat of the bill, he said, would cast a heavy responsibility on him, which, however, he was quite prepared to accept. Several gentlemen made brief remarks in which they stated their determination to oppose any measure brought forward which did not equally apply to the whole kingdom. The prediction of Lord Hartington is confirmed by other authorities. Even the Daily News, Mr. Gladstone's organ, now despairs of the bill. It intimates, though probably without the Premier's authority, that if defeated he will resign, and leave the country to be governed by the Conservatives. From them the Irish will obtain no concessions. Lord Salisbury, who would be the head of a Conservative administration, ventilated last week his idea of the proper way to govern Ireland. He said: "Ireland wanted a firm, consistent policy—a firm government. That was the policy of the Tory party. He recommended that a portion of the money with which it was intended to buy out the Irish landlords should be spent in helping the Irish to emigrate. This, he said, would be the best remedy for Ireland." This statement displays the peer's lack of statesmanship. Firmness in the past has aggravated the discontent of the people, and emigration directly aids the opponents of English rule. Almost every Irishman who emigrates denies himself that he may save money to be spent in fighting England.

Confirmation of the Statements Made Last year by the Pall Mall Gazette is furnished in a cable dispatch received from London last week. It will be remembered that several American journals declared that the awful revelations then made were false, that no such crimes as those described were perpetrated, and that the monsters of vice then pilloried existed nowhere but in the brain of Mr. Stead. On May 11th, a man named Thomas Gibney, described in the London Directory as "a gentleman" was arraigned in a London police court for the offences described by Mr. Stead. The charges against the prisoner are of having assaulted since last December forty children under the age of sixteen years. The girls were all daughters of workingmen. The developments in the case have aroused intense indignation, and the authorities have had difficulty in saving the "gentleman" from the fury of the parents of his victims.

A Destructive Tornado Passed over the Spanish capital on May 12th. It struck Madrid shortly after sunset, and the scene of disaster is described as overwhelming. Cabs, carriages, omnibuses, and tramcars had the greatest difficulty in moving, the horses and drivers being literally blinded, while people bolted affrighted into the doorways of the cafés. Over the din of the gale, mingled with peals of thunder, were heard the shrieks of women and the crash of broken glass from falling windows. Chimney-pots and tiles were flying about and hit many fugitives. In one street alone eighteen were killed and eighty-nine wounded. In the outlying districts the loss of life was still more severe. Though the news did not reach the queen of Spain until late at night, she immediately drove through the city to see that the injured were properly cared for.

An Important Letter to Clergymen on the labor troubles was issued by Assistant Bishop Potter last week. In it he calls the attention of the clergy to the fact that among their congregations are a large number of employers and men who control the capital of the country. He urges every clergyman to remind his hearers of the law of brotherhood which Christianity brought into the world, "and both by precept and example taught men that they whose was the stewardship of exceptional gifts, whether of rank, wealth, learning, or cleverness, were not to treat them as their own, but as a trust for the whole community." He also recognizes a fact too much forgotten in the present day, that "what the laborer wants from his employer is fair and fraternal dealing, not almsgiving, and a recognition of his manhood rather than a condescension to his inferiority." The bishop appears to realize what class of society it is that is in most need of exhortation. We are glad to notice that the bishop does not arouse the hatred of workmen against religion and religious teachers by urging unemployed men to go and take the places vacated by strikers.

A Prayer Appropriate to the Labor Crisis was prepared by Bishop Potter, and issued to the clergy of New York last week, for use in the Protestant-Episcopal churches. It is as follows: "Almighty God, who in the former time leddest our fathers forth into a wealthy place, and didst set their feet in a large room, give Thy grace, we humbly beseech Thee, to us their children, that we may always approve ourselves a people mindful of Thy favor, and glad to do Thy will. Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners. Defend our liberties, preserve our unity. Save us from violence, discord, and confusion, from pride and arrogance, and from every evil way. Fashion into one happy people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Endue with the spirit of wisdom those whom we intrust in Thy name with the authority of governance, to the end that there be peace at home, and that we keep our place among the nations of the earth. In the time of our prosperity, temper our self-confidence with thankfulness, and in the day of trouble suffer not our trust in Thee to fail. All which we ask for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea whose Portrait and life appeared in this journal on December 3d, 1885, has been holding a series of services in Peterboro', Ontario, Canada. A letter from that place says: "Our town has been profoundly moved, through the instrumentality of Mr. Schiverea, the evangelist, who left us last Saturday. The names of more than six hundred professors of conversion have been taken by those who were engaged in the work. He attended over eighty meetings during his stay of less than four weeks. He appears to be indefatigable—physically, mentally, and spiritually. He has gone to Lindsay, where similar success appears to crown his labors."

The Services Conducted by Messrs. Jones and Small at Columbus, Miss., have been abundantly blessed. A correspondent of the Observer writes: "Our city has been the scene of a wonderful work of grace, under the preaching of the Georgia evangelist, 'Sam' Jones, and his colleague, Mr. Small. Their work has been followed by a remarkable outpouring of the Spirit of God. On Sunday, May 2d, the communion of the Lord's Supper was administered in the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Episcopal churches, to which were admitted respectively two hundred, forty-five, and twelve new members. The Baptists received about fifty. The aggregate amounts to something over three hundred, besides others who came from different parts of the State to participate in the glorious revival. The entire absence of emotional excitement was very marked."

Citizenship was Refused to an Applicant last week in a Brooklyn, N. Y., court. On May 13th a German presented himself in Judge Moore's court, and producing his certificate of declaration, asked for his naturalization papers. When the Bible was offered to him he declined to take the oath, and said that he did not believe in any obligation. He offered to affirm, however. Clerk York made him wait to see Judge Moore. The judge scrutinized the applicant very closely and asked: "Do you believe in the views expounded by John Most?" "I don't know. I may believe in them one of these days." "Then you are not well disposed toward the Government of the United States," said Judge Moore, "and are therefore not a fit person to be naturalized. You may go." The applicant departed with a look of unbounded amazement on his face. Apparently he had supposed that, having complied with the forms of the law, he would receive his papers as a matter of course. There is reason to fear that a similar surprise far more terrible in its results awaits some who rely on baptism, confirmation, or church membership as their title to citizenship in the kingdom of God (Luke 13: 26, 27).

A Congressman's Romantic Marriage is De-scribed in the Cleveland Leader. It states that one of the happiest couples now in Washington, D. C., first met on a battlefield in Kentucky. After the battle, a Confederate soldier was lying on the ground with a terrible shot wound in his leg. The troops were all gone, and only the dead and dying were left on the field. The soldier lay in agony, expecting to die, when he saw a number of young ladies from the town of Cynthiana come upon the field. One of them came to his side and spoke kindly to him, brought him water, raised his head, and made him as comfortable as she could. Noticing how his misery was increased by the rays of the sun beating on his uncovered head, she collected a number of ramrods, which were lying around, and stuck them in the ground. Over these she spread her shawl, effectually shielding him from the glare. He recovered from his wound, and, after the war, sought out the lady who had succored him and made her his wife. He is now in Congress, and the affection existing between himself and his wife is often the subject of remark among their friends. Doubtless the lady has given her husband, since their first meeting, many proofs of affection, but it was her kindness when he was lying wounded and helpless on the ground which first won his love. It is so with the Christian. He rejoices in oneness with his Lord, and learns more every day of His infinite love; but it was in the compassion displayed by the Son of God on Calvary that the union had its birth (1 John 4: 19).

A Curious Phenomenon was Witnessed in Georgia after the recent freshet. The people of Macon have found an enormous deposit of sand in the swamp and fields. The sand is as fine and white as that seen on the beach on Cumberland Island. It was known that this sand was washed upon the lands by the freshet, but where it came from was a puzzle when it was remembered that the river bottom and banks are of the reddest mud. The mystery has been explained. When the Harrison freshet occurred in 1841 the dwelling of a certain farmer at Juliette was levelled to the ground and the contents scattered. The waters subsided and left a deposit of this white sand several feet deep. A few days ago the farmer, having occasion to visit a portion of his land that he had not seen in some time, found the place bare of the sand that had lain on it for forty five years. He found there a number of articles that belonged to his parents which had been lost in the freshet of 1841, and had remained buried ever since. There were also wheel tracks on the hard clay made by wagon wheels at that time. And thus the sand that had been left on the land near Juliette by one freshet was, after nearly half a century, taken up by another freshet and deposited on the lands near Macon. The traces of the past found by the farmer must have seemed to him like the opening of a grave. So will it be in the revelations of the last day. Long-forgotten acts will come to light, and the marks of our passage through life will be visible (Luke 12: 2).

A Shower of Dead Birds fell in Chicago on May 9th. When the watchman of the Board of Trade building made his rounds, he found on the sidewalks and streets in front of the tower a large number of dead birds of all sorts. A little later the electrician came down and said that the roof was covered with dead birds, and each of the electric lamps in the big circle of light was filled with them, one globe having eight birds in it. They were of every known variety, and many were unfamiliar species. All shades and colors were there, scarlet, blue, pink, red, canary, mottled black and white, and there were some snipe and plover among them. The theory is that they were migratory flocks, going from south to north, and were attracted by the electric lights in the great lantern, which killed them the moment they touched it. One cannot but feel a touch of pity for the beautiful little creatures thus drawn to their death. It is infinitely more mournful to see young people drawn aside in their spiritual course by the glitter of the light of "science, falsely so called," or of ambition or pleasure, to the destruction of their souls (1 Tim. 6: 20, 21).

Seven Long Forgotten Bonds were Presented for payment at Indianapolis, Ind., last week. The State auditor was notified by a financial firm that a correspondent of theirs had seven bonds of the State of Indiana, one for $4000 and six for $1000 each, and asking what steps would be necessary to secure their payment. The bonds were sent for examination, and it was found that they are twenty-year bonds, bearing five per cent interest, issued by the State under the act of the Legislature of 1846, authorizing the issue, and further reading indicated that they were sold soon after coming into the hands of the original holder to a woman, who is still alive and demanding their payment. With interest the demand is for $24,000. The payment will probably be refused, as the accounts are closed and none of the present State officers are able to trace their issue. A suit to enforce payment will be brought. The claimant has herself to thank for the difficulty she will have in getting her money. Had she claimed the interest regularly as it became due, as she was entitled to do, the bonds would not have been forgotten by the State. Her negligence resembles the conduct of some professors who regard their religion as a life insurance to take effect at death. Of the benefits they might derive from it day by day during life they claim none (Isa. 51: 12-15).

Five Hundred Dollars Reward for the Re-covery of a hat was offered and paid in New York last week. It was said to have been lost from a train, but the trackmen were so pestered about it that they thought it must be at least a murder case that was being fathomed. The hat was found in the possession of a track-walker on Friday. The detective immediately turned back the leather lining and pronounced the hat the one they were in search of. He handed the finder $10. The reporter learned that the owner of the hat had promised the detectives $500 for its restoration. It had been blown from his head while passing from one car to another during a railroad journey to New York. It was not the hat he was anxious about, but a letter, which he had concealed under its lining. If that letter had been found and published, disgrace would have fallen on two families of high social position, and proceedings in the divorce court would have been commenced. So, by the payment of $500, the writer and the receiver of the letter escape exposure for this time. It would be well if their narrow escape leads them to amend their ways, but that is not the usual result. It more frequently leads to a continuance in evil courses, in forgetfulness of the fact that exposure more humiliating and punishment more terrible are certain (Eccles. 12: 14).

HOLDING FAST OUR PROFESSION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering (for he is faithful that promised)." — HEBREWS 10: 23.

A Timely Exhortation—I. What we have—Faith—Hope—The Topmost Stone—Hope of Christ's Second Coming—Resurrection Hope—II. What we have done—Made a Profession—Counting Age from Second Birth—The Water Mark—The Profession Renewed—III. What to do—Hold Fast—The Faith as well as the Profession—When Confession becomes a Necessity—Preaching by the Feet—IV. The Reason for it.

THE apostle is drawing certain inferences from the covenant of grace, upon which he has been enlarging. He shows that God has made a covenant with His people by which they are effectually preserved. "This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord; I will put My laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts; and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." He shows that by this covenant the fear of returning to our old sin is removed, and the guilt of our sin is forever put away. Then he tells us that since we are put in such a blessed position—a position which is altogether unique—it becomes us to hold fast to what we have received. Since the glorious Gospel has done so much for us, let us never quit it. Let us not dream of giving up that divine principle which has wrought us such blessedness; but "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering."

I pray God the Holy Spirit to bless these words as we shall think them over. May He make this meditation a means of establishment to us, that, while we hold fast the profession of our faith, the blessed truths of that faith may also hold us fast as an anchor holds a ship! Never was there a time in which this was more needful. That exhortation, "Let us hold fast," might well be written on the cover of every Christian's Bible. We live in such a changeable age, that we need all to be exhorted to be rooted and grounded, confirmed and established, in the truth.

I. First, then, dear brothers and sisters, let us think of

by the grace of God. If we read the text according to our present authorized translation, we have faith. If we have not this faith in possession, let us pause here and ask for it; and let us confess to God the great sin of unbelief in not believing in such a one as the Son of God. Yet it would not be true for us to say—some of us—that we do not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, for we do. We have no other confidence. Where could we find any other? If Jesus were to say, "Will ye also go away?" we should be compelled to answer, "Lord, to whom should we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." If the question be whether we have perfect holiness, we must answer it in the negative, to our great sorrow. If the question be whether we are highly advanced in divine grace, we should not dare to say that we are. It would be immodest if we put forth such a pretension; but if the inquiry be, "Dost thou believe in the Lord Jesus Christ?" then without hesitation we reply, "Lord, we trust Thee with undivided faith."

It is not a matter of question with you, dear friend, is it, as to whether you know Jesus to be the Son of God, very God of very God? It is past all question with you that Jesus bore your sins in His own body on the tree. You have no doubt about His wondrous death and His marvellous resurrection from among the dead. You also believe that He will shortly come to be our Judge—that He will gather the nations before Him, and that He will reign King of kings and Lord of lords. Your faith, then, in the Lord Jesus Christ is not a matter of "if" and "but;" you stake your salvation on it. I can truly say that if what I preach be not true, I am a lost man. I have invested all that I have in Christ. If this barque sink I drown, for I cannot swim, and I know no other life-boat.

You have faith; nor does your faith confine itself to the belief in the person and work of Christ, and to a simple trusting of yourself to Him; but you believe all that is revealed in relation to Jesus. A truth may sometimes amaze you because of its greatness; but that does not stagger your faith; for your faith deals with mysteries, and is familiar with sublimities which it never dreams of comprehending. We may imagine this or imagine that; but we think nothing of our imaginations. Our faith deals with what God says, not with what learned men think. What the Spirit of God has written in this inspired Book is truth to us, and we allow no human teaching to rank side by side with it. Well, then, we have faith—faith that believes, faith that learns, faith that reclines, faith that trusts herself entirely in the love of God, faith that can say, "Father, into Thy hand I commit my spirit."

SECOND ADVENT HOPE.

But another reading—and a very good reading, too—runs thus: "The confession of our hope." Oh, yes, beloved, if we have faith we have hope. We will take both renderings; for they are both correct in fact if not in the letter. If I begin to describe our hope, I must begin with what, I think, is always the topmost stone of it—the hope of the second advent of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; for we believe that when He shall appear, we shall also appear with Him in glory. We know that He has gone up into heaven. His apostles saw Him as He ascended from Olivet, and we believe the words which the angels declared soon after His departure to remind us of His coming again: "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." We expect Him to descend in person, and we hope ourselves to behold Him in that day. We expect Him to stand in the latter day upon the earth, and in our own flesh risen from the dead, we expect to behold our Saviour and our God. This is the glorious hope of the Church.

We have faith, and we have hope, and we know that we have them. Are we not enriched with the grace of God? Where faith and hope are found, love cannot be far off; for the three divine sisters are seldom separated. Let us love the Lord who has given us the first two.

II. Secondly, we have gone a step further than the silent possession of faith and hope. We have made and a confession of our hope. I am not going to say much about this, but to remind you of certain joyously solemn facts. You remember the time, dear brothers and sisters, when first you made a profession of your faith. It may do many of us good to go back to those early days. We are getting on in years, some of us, but we do not wish to feel old; at least, we want to keep as much of the freshness and joy of youth as we well can. Cheerfulness is most becoming in Christian men; we have a life within us of later birth than that which our mothers gave us, we will therefore measure our age from our second rather than our first birth. I like to see the old man grow young when he talks of Christ; let him on that point become enthusiastic, even as in his boyhood.

Perhaps some of you remember the place, the spot of ground, where Jesus met with you. If you do not, at least you recollect when you first whispered to your own heart with trembling hope, "I think I know the Lord." There was great tenderness of conscience upon you then, and you would not have professed what was not true for all the world. You said within yourself, "I half said that I was a believer; but I do not think I dare say it again." Yet within a short time it oozed out again, when you were in company and felt forced to defend your Saviour. It was true of you in a blessed sense, "Thy speech bewrayeth thee. Thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth." At last it grew so warm round about you, that you thought you might as well come out for Jesus and derive help from the confession. The adversaries were ferreting you out, and you thought you had better come out and say, boldly, once for all, "It is even so." It was a day of great trembling, but of great joy, when first we avowed our faith in Jesus!

We want soft cushions now; we cannot stand to hear a sermon now, nor yet travel very far, especially in damp weather. It is very strange that we should have become so delicate; but it is so. How many miles we could walk when first we knew the Lord; the miles have grown much longer lately, or else our love has grown much shorter! Those were blessed days—changeable, showery, with little more than the dusk of dawn about them; but still there was a morning freshness about them upon which we look back with supreme delight, and somewhat of regret. Then was it a time of love, a season of buds and flowers, and song-birds, and overflowing life and hope.

A PERSONAL REMINISCENCE.

To me it is a solemn memory that I professed my faith openly in baptism. Vividly do I recall the scene. It was the third of May, and the weather was cold because of a keen wind. I see the broad river, and the crowds which lined the banks, and the company upon the ferry-boat. The word of the Lord was preached by a man of God who is now gone home; and when he had so done, he went down into the water, and we followed him, and he baptized us. I remember how, after being the slave of timidity, I rose from the liquid grave quickened into holy courage by that one act of decision, consecrated henceforth to bear a life-long testimony. By an avowed death to the world I professed my desire henceforth to live with Jesus, for Jesus, and like Jesus. Oh, that I had been more faithful to that profession! But there it was, and I am not ashamed of it, nor wishful to run back from it. Ah no! I bear in my body that water-mark, that fulfilment of the Holy Scriptures, which saith, "Having your hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and your bodies washed with pure water."

"High heaven that heard the solemn vow,
That vow renewed shall daily hear,
Till in life's latest time I bow,
And bless in death a bond so dear."

Let us remember also the many times in which we have repeated that profession of faith, that confession of hope; for instead of retracting it, we have gone on to repeat it. We have been marked anew with the King's name. If you ask how you have renewed your vows, I reply: you have done it many a time at the table of communion. And beside that, in many a prayer-meeting you have been present, and by your very presence have expressed your belief that it is not a vain thing to wait upon God. You have repeated your profession in the shop, and in the market, and in the place of business, and among your friends, and in your family, and to the partner of your life. I again break in upon the latter part of my discourse by saying, after all these times in which we have worn our Master's livery, shall we desert Him?

THE COST OF IT.

We have considered how we began this profession, and we have also seen how often we have made it since. Let us think for a minute what it has cost us. Has it been worth while to be on the Lord's side? Religion has cost many of its disciples somewhat dear; but it has cost nothing compared with its worth. What bashfulness it cost you to make the first confession of your faith! What a struggle it then appeared! You were weeks, some of you, before you dared to come and see such an awful person as the minister, to speak of your conversion to him. It had taken you weeks even to tell it to your wife, or to your husband. The dear soul, for once, seemed to grow into a very dragon when you wanted to tell him that you had found the Lord. I have known parents terribly afraid to let their children know of their conversion.

They were never half so afraid of sinning as they became afraid of being charged with repenting. You surmounted that difficulty, did you not? You cried to God about it, and you obtained courage; and now you wonder how you could have been so foolishly timid. Do not in future fall into the same fears.

WELCOME OSTRACISM.

But perhaps some of you lost the friendship of many by becoming disciples of the Lord Jesus. I know one who became a member of this church; she had moved in high and fashionable circles, but she said to me, "They have left me—every one of them." I said, "I am very thankful; for it will save you the trouble of quitting them. They will do you no good if they profess to be your friends; and they will do you less harm by giving you the cold shoulder." It is about the best thing that happens to a Christian man when worldlings cut his acquaintance. "Come ye out from among them," is to many a severe command; but all difficulty is removed when the world turns out from us, and casts out our name as evil. Still, it has cost many a tear, and many a sigh for the first believer in certain families to take up His cross, and come right out and follow Christ. "Canting hypocrite," "snivelling pretender"—such titles, and worse, they are quick to throw at us. It is but natural that the world we leave should give us a parting kick. Have ye suffered these many things in vain? Will ye now go back? Will ye turn again to the beggarly elements of the world, after having confronted persecution, and borne the enmity of men? No, by the grace of God you will "hold fast the profession of your faith without wavering."

THE GOOD OF IT.

"But what good does our profession do?" says one. I would say: Much every way. It is in itself a grand thing for his manliness for a man boldly to say, "I am a Christian." It is good for a soldier of the cross to draw the sword and throw away the scabbard by being openly known to be a Christian. The world then ceases to urge its coarser temptations. The enemies know whereabouts you are, and do not raise that question again. To show your colors may not appear to be a great thing, but to many it is half the battle.

Besides, the open confession of our faith has a good influence upon others. How could there be a Christian Church at all if every Christian man concealed his faith in his own bosom? If you love your Lord and have faith and hope in Him, do not delay to come forward and own His name and cause. Say boldly, "Where are His people? I will join with them. Do they meet with any reproach for obedience to Him? I will share that reproach. Have they any work for Christ on hand? I will take my share of that work."

THE DUTY.

III. The third point is to be, what are we now to do? I have entrenched upon it already, and I have done so intentionally. The answer is, we are called upon to hold fast the profession of our faith. Of course this includes the holding fast of your faith. The things which you have believed, continue to believe. Hold you fast to the old truth. The ships in yonder port are swinging with the tide just now. Please God they will swing back to the same place when the tide turns. They have done so before. There came a day when our churches almost all went round to Socinianism, and then their chapels were empty, and their day of power was gone. Earnest men rose up and preached the old Gospel again, and there was a grand revival. Now they are going off again, turning every man to his own error, save that the Lord has a faithful company that hold fast the faith, and will not let it go, and these will live to see a great revulsion of feeling yet. If they do not, that is a small matter to them; to be faithful to their God is their first and their last business.

But that is not the text. It is hold fast your profession of faith, your confession of hope; that is to say, stand to what you have done by way of open avowment of these things. Constantly keep up your confession. There are times when you will be inclined to put your flag away into the canvas case, and hide your coat of arms in the cellar. Then you may fitly judge that the devil is getting advantage over you, and that it is time that you by his sorceries. Tear up the wrappings, throw the bag away, and nail your flag aloft where every eye can see it. Whenever you feel inclined to be ashamed of Christ do not deliberate, but say, "This is wrong. There is coming over me something that I must not endure. If I were in a right state of mind I should never feel like this." Never yield to shameful cowardice; scorn such detestable meanness. Out with it, man! Out with it! If you might have gone on peaceably, and said nothing about your religion, yet whenever you feel at all afraid to do it, then say, "Now I must do it. I cannot allow my principles to remain in question." Only when you are out-and-out for Jesus can you be in a right condition. Anything short of this is full of evil. Since Satan tempts you to hide your faith, feel that He seeks your harm, and therefore come out all the more decidedly.

INCONSISTENCIES.

Beloved friends, may God help us never to do anything contrary to the confession of our faith. I have heard of such a thing as a Christian man making a confession of his faith by paying sixpence in the pound in the Bankruptcy Court. They say that he is making a good thing out of his failure. He is making his own damnation sure if he is robbing his creditors and yet professing to be a Christian. Here is a man making a confession of his faith. He is a very good Christian man in his own esteem, but he also knows a good glass of wine, and is most fluent when he is getting far into the bottle. Have drunkards any hope of eternal life? Look at yonder professor, he is going across to the saloon to stand at the counter and drink with those who blaspheme. That is his way of confessing his faith, I suppose. It is not mine. Have I not seen Christian women become noisily angry, and say harsh things to their servants? That is showing your Christianity, is it?

I do not want to be sarcastic, but I want you not to tempt me to be so. If you love the Lord, live as if you loved Him. Let us all try to do so; and let us watch that we never undo with our hands what we say with our tongues. I heard in Lancashire of some people who preached with their feet. It is the best way of preaching in the world. By your walk and conversation you will preach twice as well as by your talk. Your tongue is too soft a thing to influence dull minds; you must influence such by your lives.

IV. I may not detain you many more moments; and therefore let me answer the question

WHY ARE WE TO DO THIS?

We are to hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, because he is faithful that has promised. Have you found Him faithful? Has the Lord failed you? Has the Lord been untrue in His promises to you? If He has, then do not hold fast your profession. If, after all, it has been a mistake and a delusion, then give it up. But if He is faithful that has promised—if He has kept His word to you, and helped you in your trouble, sustained your heart under burdens, comforted you in the dark hour of trial—if till this moment you have proved the power of prayer, the wisdom of providence, and the truth of the sacred word, then deal with my Lord as He has dealt with you. Be not faithless to the Crucified. Oh, be not Judas to Him who is Jesus to you.

I have heard of a husband and wife who felt their love for each other to be so strong, that they almost wished to go through the wedding ceremony again, to show how content they were to bear the easy yoke of married love. Many of us could say the same. We would also be joined anew to our Lord. Let us afresh take upon us His yoke. Let us put our shoulder down to the cross again, and commence again to serve the Lord Jesus with the love of our espousals and the freshness of our earliest days. May the Lord bless us to that end. While we are doing this, I hope that others who never did love Him before will now say, "We will come with you and begin a new life from this good hour." It will be a happy, happy circumstance if this should be the case. God grant it may be so with many, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A FAMOUS PAINTER.

ALLUSION is often made in sermons and books to certain wonderful pictures of scenes in the life of Christ which are the work of the great Dutch painter, Rembrandt. In a recently published work* we find a suggestive criticism upon these pictures before which our preachers stand for hours, and come back with new power, inspired by seeing portrayed on canvas the ideas they have sought to embody in their sermons. M. Viardot refers to the dictum of another great critic that, "notwithstanding his immense defects, Rembrandt is perhaps the first painter in the world." Viardot adds: "I should leave the 'defects,' but should omit the 'perhaps.'" One of his earliest works was "The Presentation in the Temple," painted in 1631. Later examples are: "The Disciples Going to Emmaus;" "The Good Samaritan;" "The Woman Taken in Adultery;" "The Adoration of the Shepherds;" "The Crucifixion;" "The Nativity;" "The Resurrection;" "The Descent from the Cross;" "The Ascension," a picture in which the artist has succeeded in lighting up the canvas with the brilliancy emanating from the body of Christ; and "Ecce Homo." Of this last Viardot says: "The figures are of life-size. Jesus is in the centre, almost naked, with a girdle round His loins, a reed in His hand, and the crown of thorns on His head. On the right Pilate is washing his hands of the blood of the Innocent, one woman is pouring water for him from a golden jug, while another is holding the ewer. Rembrandt, the reformer, the enemy of tradition and Catholic pomp, and who understood the Gospel not in the Greek and pagan manner of the Renaissance, but in the simplicity of the Middle Ages, has painted the Christ of the Beggars. He succeeded, by force of expression, gesture and sentiment, and the great power of light and shadow, in making a work so wonderfully beautiful that words are wanting to convey any idea of the brilliancy with which it is radiant, or to express the emotion and admiration it excites in the soul. . . . I find in his pictures of history taken from the New Testament a fresh proof of the superiority of sacred subjects, of the supernatural—in short, even when it is reduced to the natural."

AT WILSON'S CREEK.

Though the battle of Wilson's Creek is not reckoned among the great battles of the war, there was more depending upon its issue than any one knew at the time, and than has been fully recognized since. The following extracts, describing incidents in that battle, are taken from a recently published work† by one who fought in the battle, and who also relates succinctly, yet fully, from the Southern standpoint, the political and military events which preceded it: "From the summit of Bloody Hill Lyon could see the entire field. It all lay before him, its outmost limits hardly a mile away. He knew now that Sigel had been defeated, and that the troops which had put him to flight would soon be coming, all flushed with victory, to join the force which Price was getting ready to hurl against his own disheartened men. He could see Gratiot hurrying even now with five hundred fresh troops to give vigor to the assault that was about to be made on his own weary men, broken down as these were by a long night march and by five hours of the very hardest fighting; could see him clambering up the hill-side now, himself and his men eager to fight under the eye of the brave soldier that was leading them to death or to victory. . . . He saw all this and more; and there was no hope left within him but to dash upon Price with all his might and crush him to the ground before the gathering forces could come to his help. . . . Price guarded carefully every part of his line. Wherever the danger was greatest and the battle most doubtful, thither would he hasten, and there would he stay till the danger was past. . . . Many a time did his men cry out to him, 'Don't lead us, General; don't come with us; take care of yourself for the sake of us all; we will go without you.' Several times his clothing was pierced with bullets, one of which inflicted a painful wound in his side. Turning with a smile to an officer that was near him, he said: 'That isn't fair; if I had been as slim as Lyon that fellow would have missed me entirely.' No one else knew till the battle was ended that he had been struck." The death of Lyon a little later is thus described: "Walking along his line from left to right, encouraging his men by his own intrepid bearing and a few well-spoken words; rallying them when they were beginning to give way; steadying them when they still stood to their duty; inspiring them with his own brave resolve to make one more effort to win the day while there was yet time to try, Lyon had nearly reached the advanced section of Totten's Battery, when his horse, whose bridle he held in his hand, was killed, and himself was wounded in the leg and in the head.

Stunned and dazed by the blow, and his brave soul cast down by the shock, he said in a confused way to those that were nearest that he feared the day was lost. But he came quickly to his senses, and ordering Sturgis to rally the First Iowa, which was beginning to break badly, he mounted a horse that was offered to him, and swinging his hat in the air, called out to his men to follow. A portion of Mitchell's Second Kansas closed quickly around him, and together they dashed into the fight. The next minute Mitchell was struck down, severely wounded, and almost simultaneously a fatal ball pierced Lyon's breast. He fell from his horse into the arms of his faithful orderly, who sprang forward to catch him, and in another minute he was dead."

MISS ROSE E. CLEVELAND.

THE sister of the President, and the present mistress of the White House, is a lady of remarkable talent and attainments. She is the youngest of the nine children of Richard and Anna Cleveland. She was born at Fayetteville, N. Y., in 1846, being therefore now in her fortieth year. When she was seven years old her father accepted the charge of the Presbyterian Church at Holland Patent, near Utica, and the family removed thither. A short time afterward Mr. Cleveland died, and the family quitted the parsonage.

Rose's education was then carried on by her widowed mother until she was ready to enter Houghton Seminary. Her career at that institution was a brilliant one. She graduated with the highest honors and afterward remained as a teacher. Two years afterward she was appointed principal of the Collegiate Institute at Lafayette, Ind.

The illness of her mother subsequently recalled Miss Cleveland to Holland Patent. She devoted herself with filial affection to ministering to her aged parent, meanwhile delivering a course of historical lectures to the students of Houghton Seminary. Mrs. Cleveland died in 1882, but her daughter continued to make Holland Patent her home, though frequent demands for her services as a lecturer rendered her life one of continual movement. The election of her brother to the Presidency in 1884 introduced her to new and responsible duties as the mistress of the White House. These she has discharged with a dignity and grace that have won for her the admiration and esteem of the somewhat exacting society of Washington.

Miss Cleveland's book on "George Eliot's Poetry and Other Studies," published last year, established her title to a high place in the ranks of the literary world. It indicated the possession of remarkable gifts, careful culture, and brilliant thought. One passage from its pages will show its religious tone. "I would study history," says the author, "in order to make my standing firmer in religious faith. In these days of ebb and quicksand, when agnosticism rears its stone wall in front of faith and writes upon it in black letters the end-all and be-all of all knowing, the unknowable, we have need to go where God is to confirm our faith in Him. And God is in history; He is there because the human soul is there. 'Take thy shoes from off thy feet, for this is holy ground.'"

THE BROOKLYN TABERNACLE.

THERE are doubtless many of our friends who read with interest and profit the sermons of Dr. Talmage printed in these columns from week to week who have not had the privilege of hearing the eloquent preacher in his own church. To all such the picture of the building in which those sermons are delivered will be welcome.

The Tabernacle is a massive building of brick and stone, capable of seating five thousand persons, and finding standing room for one thousand more. The style of its architecture is the Gothic, but, by a skilful adaptation, the acoustic defects for which Gothic edifices are notorious have been overcome. The interior is like an amphitheatre in the shape of a half moon. In the centre of the straight wall is the platform, and around it the seats are arranged in a semi-circle, rising gradually as they recede from the platform. A gallery, in shape like a gigantic horse-shoe, runs around the building, springing from the two sides of the straight wall, while in a recess between the two ends of the horse-shoe is a magnificent organ. Thus, the ideal of a speaker is achieved in the blending of the congregation on the floor and that in the gallery in one audience. The visitor feels that he is in a building of the Italian style until he raises his eyes to the roof, where he sees the graceful Gothic arches, and recognizes the triumph of architectural skill in the union of the two styles. By an ingenious arrangement the organist's keyboard is separated by the platform from the instrument, so that a nervous preacher is spared the irritation of having the organist at his back while he is preaching. There is no rail around the platform, and nothing upon it but a small table and a chair for the preacher's use.

This is the second edifice erected for the church since Dr. Talmage became its pastor, seventeen years ago. In 1869 a building capable of holding twelve hundred people was far too large for the Central Presbyterian Church. Whether it had more than nineteen members we do not know, but certain it is that the call to Dr. Talmage, which was apparently unanimous, was subscribed with only nineteen signatures. A year afterward a new church was needed, and it was necessary to have it large enough to hold three thousand persons. That was filled to overflowing, and in 1872 it had to be enlarged. Scarcely had the extension been made when the whole building was burned to the ground. "Well, the building was never large enough," was the comment Dr. Talmage made to the trustees as they gazed mournfully on the smoking ruins. Arrangements were immediately made for the erection of the present edifice, which holds just double the number of people that could be crammed into its predecessor. It was built in a year, and was dedicated January 22d, 1874. The trustees doubtless thought it would be large enough, but if one of them would drop his official character and go to the Tabernacle some Sunday morning as a visitor, and stand during the service among the perspiring crowd that fills aisles, corridors, and lobbies, he would wish the place had been built a little larger still, so that at any rate he might have been able to stand without the sensation of being under a hydraulic press. Not only has the congregation thus grown beyond the bounds set for it, but the nineteen of the inner circle of 1869 have grown to thirty-three hundred and fifty, and additions to their number are continually being made.

STEPHEN AYLMER'S TEMPTATION.

It was lunch-time, and workmen and clerks were hurrying out of warehouses and workshops on their way to the restaurants. There was only half an hour at their disposal, and every minute was precious. Time did not seem of much value, however, to Stephen Aylmer, a bright young clerk who came out of Crosby's with a number of others. He turned in an opposite direction to his comrades and walked to the bridge over the river, which was not much frequented at that hour of the day. Here he leaned on the parapet, and taking off his hat that the wind might cool his heated brow, he looked off in the distance with a gaze which was full of trouble. He was wrestling with a problem that has perplexed many Christians older than he. He was wondering how it was that trouble after trouble came in quick succession on his godly parents, while wicked men enjoyed an immunity. There was a crisis at home even then. A sick father, a delicate mother, two young sisters, and an execution in the house. That was why, hungry though he was, that Stephen Aylmer did not go to the restaurant with the others to get a lunch. Money was needed at home, and while his father was sick no money could be had but the little Stephen was able to take there. It was not for himself that Stephen cared, however. The cloud on his face was drifted there by the consciousness of what those he loved were suffering.

"Is that the way you spend your time, young man?" said a voice behind Stephen.

"This is our lunch-time, sir," the young man said, as he turned and recognized a merchant with whom he had been brought in contact during his engagement at Crosby's.

"Is this where you get your lunch?"

"No, sir; I did not feel like having lunch today, so I came here to be quiet."

"I noticed your name on that receipt you gave me yesterday. Are you a son of Richard Aylmer?"

"Yes, sir; he is my father. He is very sick just now."

Stephen Aylmer's Reverie Interrupted.

"Sorry to hear that. I knew him well some years ago. Will you give me his address? I'll call and see him."

Stephen wrote the address down for him. "By the way," said the merchant, "was there anything wrong with your accounts yesterday? I noticed that you seemed surprised."

"Yes, sir, but there was nothing wrong. I had several accounts to pay, and Mr. Crosby gave me a considerable sum over what I needed to pay them. I thought there was a mistake when I found it out at your office, but I have learned since that it was a test of my honesty. I am told that Mr. Crosby did it purposely."

"I do not like such tricks," said the merchant. "Did you feel tempted?"

"I am sorry to say I did for a moment. We need money badly at home, sir, and last night there was a special need. I had the surplus in my pocket as Mr. Crosby told me to hand him the accounts this morning. The thought crossed my mind that Mr. Crosby might never ask me for it, but it was only for a moment. My father and mother have always taught us to be honest."

"And you gave it in this morning, did you? Was Mr. Crosby surprised?"

"No, sir. I expected he would be, but, you see, he knew all about it."

"Still, he ought not to put temptation in any young man's way. Good-by. Tell your father I shall look in upon him soon," and the merchant went his way, and Stephen returned to his desk.

Stephen had spoken lightly of the ordeal through which he had passed, but, in truth, the temptation had been severe. It so happened that the surplus which he supposed to be a mistake would have relieved his family of a pressing claim—in fact, the one for which the execution had been levied. Happily, his parents' training had been supplemented by his own conversion, and the sophistry by which Satan wins so many victims was foiled in Stephen's case.

That night as he wended his way homeward his heart was full of sadness. It might be that he would find the poor furniture which the family owned carried away in satisfaction of the debt, and he knew his father was little likely to survive such a shock. In the crowded streets his thoughts were raised in prayer to God that in some way deliverance might come. Like many other Christians, Stephen's faith in the efficacy of prayer was largely theoretic. It was therefore with amazement that on his arrival at home he found the whole family rejoicing over a deliverance exceeding his most sanguine dreams. Not only was the pressing debt paid and money provided for immediate wants, but an offer was awaiting him of employment at a far higher salary than he was now receiving, and with prospects of advancement. The merchant who had spoken to him on the bridge was God's agent in answering his prayer, and even before he uttered it, it had been answered. That was only the first of many experiences that Stephen could have quoted in answer, if, in after days, he had been asked, "What profit shall we have if we pray unto Him?" (Job 21:15.)

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Labrador Christmas.

AFTER the departure of the sledge, life at Eschol fell back into its ordinary routine. Contrary to all expectation, Lena was actually recovering, to the very great pleasure of Juliet, because she regarded the Esquimaux as a kind of spiritual child of her own.

Again the sledge returned with a letter, the last received from Bethabara, though the pastor's absence was yet to last for weeks. Brother Wilhelm wrote that only one more death had occurred, that of an Esquimaux child; it was hoped that with care all the rest of the stricken ones might recover, and no new case was reported. "What troubles me most," wrote the pastor, "is that Fritz is unwell. I trust and pray that he is not sickening for small-pox, he does not himself think that he has taken the infection." Though this account of the younger missionary caused anxiety to his friends, yet, on the whole, the report from Bethabara was good, and fervent thanksgivings were offered in Eschol.

One of Juliet's favorite amusements was to consult her companion about the "heaps of things" which she intended to send from home to astonish the Labrador folk.

"Eighteen months hence, little Ruth will be able to enjoy a doll's house," said Juliet one day, when the fast falling snow prevented her being able to sally forth. "I should like to see her delight. But how she will pity the wax babies for being clothed in nothing better than white muslin, and how short a time the muslin will remain white in those chubby, oily little hands! Oh!" continued Juliet with a mirthful laugh. "I must see Ruth for once clean, perfectly clean! I believe that she would be shades whiter, and her mother would hardly know her again. I have set my heart on giving my little Puffin a thorough good washing."

"It must be in warm water, then," said the practical Anna.

"Trust me for that!" cried Juliet; "I would not run the risk of losing a finger, or impairing my little Puffin's beauty by a frost-bitten nose! But, oh, what will be the use of washing the baby if I have to put on it again that horrid seal-skin! I wish that I had something for a warm little dress."

"Everything has gone to Bethabara," said Anna, "except, indeed, some sheets of cotton wadding with which you might quilt some lighter material, were any at hand."

"I have it!" exclaimed Juliet, suddenly; "I will turn my wretched pink dress, and make a quilted garment out of the skirt! The Esquimaux baby shall come out as a Labrador rose, and walk—or crawl—in silk attire!" The idea of Ruth so dressed in an igloo brought a smile to the lips of Anna. Juliet ran for her despised, discarded dress; could even that be turned into something useful! It would be, Juliet thought, a type of its former wearer.

The maiden set to work with childish glee. A little pink hood to the quilted dress was not forgotten. It was trimmed with some scraps of white fox-skin, which the careful Anna had preserved, but had not thought worth sending to the convalescent patients.

Whether the little garment made by Juliet Erle would have been admired in the fashionable circles in which she had formerly moved, might be more than doubted; but not her most elaborate piece of German-work had ever looked so well in her eyes. She completed her task on the shortest day of the year, chiefly, of course, by lamplight, and it made the day seem short indeed.

The next thing was to sally forth for the baby; the cold had been so intense that the snow which had fallen on the preceding day had been frozen quite hard; there was no need to walk in snowshoes, of which a pair, of huge dimensions, was hung up in the porch.

Juliet ventured out, and soon returned with a warm little bundle in her arms, completely covered up, head and all, with a blanket. She disappeared with it into her room, where a kettle was steaming. Juliet had at first to coax the obstreperous and recusant baby, who was of a conservative disposition, and counted the power to remain dirty as among an infant's rights. But Juliet overcame opposition, and was too busy in her occupation, close to the fire, to notice any noise from without.

Anna, who had now quite recovered from the effects of her fall, had been left engaged in knitting a Christmas comforter for her husband, in the little parlor, into which Juliet's apartment opened.

Presently the reformer emerged from her room in a triumphant spirit, holding the pink-coated and hooded baby aloft in her arms. As Juliet exclaimed, "Is she not a beauty?" to her astonishment she confronted Fritz.

"A beauty, indeed!" was his joyful reply; and then Juliet perceived that Anna was embracing her husband.

Yes, the travellers had returned safely, in a borrowed reindeer sledge which had brought them at speed over the waste. Except that Fritz looked thin, neither were the worse for their errand of mercy, and both were in joyous spirits. Almost the first thing that struck the eye of Juliet was that Fritz's shoulders and chest were swathed in her own gray plaid.

"You think me a robber!" cried Fritz, playfully, as he observed her look of pleased surprise. "The fact is, that as head physician, nurse, and hospital inspector, I had to burn my upper garments as well as other people's, were it but for the sake of example. Now, had I driven a sledge hither with no better protection than such clothes as Brother Hans kindly supplied, I might have turned to an icicle on the way. I thought it, therefore, lawful for a time to take a loan of your plaid, which I will honestly return to you as soon as I have an opportunity of supplying my wants by the chase."

"I never wish it back," exclaimed Juliet; and she thought, as she turned away with tearful eyes, "Fritz is far more worthy than I am to wear my Maria's plaid."

The mission-house now seemed quite gay. The pastor was delighted to be in his own home again, and to see his wife, except as regarded defective sight, able to resume her household duties. Anna was perfectly happy with her good man beside her once more. Warmly and gratefully Anna spoke of the ministrations of Juliet, filling the hearts of her hearers with joy.

Then what a pleasure it was that the absentees were back in time for Christmas, whose festivities would have been so saddened had they remained away! The simple-hearted Moravians much enjoyed making preparations for the annual treat. Without Fritz's help how could the Christmas-tree have been prepared, with its glittering tapers and pretty trifles, conspicuous among which were pink silk bags made by Juliet out of the remnants of her dress, which, furnished with needless, thread, and tape by Anna, made splendid school prizes for girls. Juliet learned the art of making paper flowers, as not a vestige of a real one was to be found. A text executed in moss on white cotton which looked like snow, was an object of great admiration, Glory to God and good-will toward men, the angel's message to a fallen world, cheering the Labrador wilds. Then there was practising of carols by an Esquimaux choir, tutored by Anna and Fritz, to hail the glad morn with songs of praise.

After divine service in church, the mission house was thrown open to Esquimaux guests, and Juliet was surprised to see with what scanty materials an entertainment could be made that afforded so much delight. There was the ingenious card-board model of the Bethlehem stable, kept carefully from year to year for the grand occasion. There were a few mechanical toys which delighted the men as much as the children; and pictures, of the brightest colors, to amuse and instruct, and show the natives of the north the strange animals, lions, tigers, and elephants of the south. Home-manufactured cake, thickly iced, with steaming coffee, was handed round. Juliet served, and smiled, and enjoyed herself as if the sky were bright and the earth clothed with verdure. She had never known a happier Christmas than that passed in Eschol.

A week later, on New Year's Day, before sunrise, she wrote in her journal: "The year has closed; to me what a marvellous year! How darkened with trials! how gemmed with mercies—a golden pattern on a sable background! It is strange to recall how I began it! I danced in the New Year, light of heart, thankless for mercies past, all unconscious of dangers near. I recollect pausing in the whirl of the dance, partly to take breath, partly to rearrange my wreath, which had been a little displaced by the rapid motion. I was by the mirror which was over the mantelpiece, under which a profusion of costly exotics belied the winter season, and the ormulu clock at that moment chimed out the hour of twelve. I intuitively counted the tinkling strokes.

"The Old Year's knell, and the New Year's welcome," said Dermot Denis, my lively partner. 'He comes like a carrier with a sealed parcel for every one of us. Don't you wish that you could break the seal and peep in?'

"What should I see?" said I, lightly. 'A huge bundle of invitations to dinner-parties and balls, varied with concert tickets and opera tickets, and railway tickets when the season is over. Life is so same, one can always guess beforehand what is coming.'

"I hope that my packet contains an elephant and half a dozen tigers," said Denis, laughing: 'for I am off to India next month.'

"In search of adventures," I observed.

"I once read an absurd poem," said my partner, 'about a fellow possessed of second sight, who at a party like this, given to dance in the New Year, saw a shroud mysteriously enfolding every guest who was to die within the twelve month.'

"What a horrid idea!" cried I.

"And after the poor seer had noticed this and that person laughing or dancing, all unconsciously swathed in the snow-white shroud, he chanced to glance downward, and—luckless chap!—what should he see but the cold, white, misty mantle wrapped around his own breast!"

"The writer of such an odious story should be condemned to walk the streets dressed in a shroud for a penance," laughed I. 'Shall we go on with the dance?'

"Oh, surely I was then a dead soul myself, wrapped in a shroud of vanity! She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth. I now believe that word to be true. Could I have opened my sealed parcel in that ball-room, how fearfully startled I should have been! How the lights would have faded before me, the loud, lively, exciting music have sunk to a wail! And yet I can thank God even for the miseries—the horrors that were then before me; they were links in a chain to draw me out of my living tomb!

"And now another sealed packet lies before me; would I open it if I could? No; but I am certain that it contains blessings. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life. No Christian need fear the future.

"In all probability I shall leave these shores in the course of the year. It seems strange that the thought does not bring one unmingled pleasure. I shall part with pain from those whom I have learned to reverence and love—pious, simple-hearted Pastor Wilhelm, Sister Anna, the wise and true, and Fritz. Even Lena and Ruth, and other brown-skinned Esquimaux, it is a sorrow to think that I shall never look on their faces again. I do not think that I ever made a true friendship till last year, and my friendships seem only made to be broken. I had scarcely time to know my angel Maria before I lost her, and now Sister Anna, and the rest, oh, thank God, there is a meeting-place above! My tears are dropping on the page.

"I shall have difficulties before me, I foresee, on my return home. I cannot lead the same giddy life that I did before I knew the love of Christ; I could not bear to lead it, so unsatisfying, so insipid. But if I adopt any other, what opposition I shall meet with from all my friends and relations! I see before me Cecilia's stare of surprise when I tell her that I do not care for balls any more, that I will not go to the opera; Dora will be dreadfully angry. The Maddens, Aycotts, Lady Belinda, all will count me no better than a fool. I shall be the butt of Gertie's endless jests—harder to bear than her mother's anger. The thought is a burden on my soul. Yet why should it be such a burden? To be counted a fool for Christ's sake, should I not deem it an honor? Is there not a special 'blessed' which could never be applied to me if I always lived with those dear good Moravians?

"I must find some work at home to do for God; that, as it seems to me, is a necessity for every Christian. But oh, how I need some one to advise me and teach me how to begin! If Maria had only been living! I shall have no one on earth to consult, but that will make me more earnestly seek the help of my Lord. He has given to my soul its hunger, and He will supply the manna.

"Night.—We exchanged kindly greetings this morning, good wishes for the opening year. The dear old pastor was in an unusually playful mood. 'I wish you,' he said to me, a joyful return to your native land, and plenty of little puffins to clothe, though not perhaps in garments of rose-tinted silk. And to you,' he continued, turning to Fritz with a meaning smile, 'I wish—what I know to be one of heaven's choicest gifts—a good wife, the best wife in the world except one,' and his loving glance rested on Anna.

"Fritz flushed to the roots of his hair. This is the first time that I have heard his coming marriage alluded to in his presence. I am sure that he felt embarrassed, and I noticed that dear considerate Sister Anna instantly changed the conversation.

JESUS FEEDING FIVE THOUSAND.

S. S. Lesson for May 30, John 6:1-21. Golden Text, verse 35. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The People Attracted—Wonder, Curiosity, and Personal Need—A Baseless Assertion—Men Convinced by Miracles—Philip under Proof—Provision in the Hand of Omnipotence—The Despised Fragments—At Sea without Jesus—The Disciples Afraid—What Jesus Brings with Him.

AFTER a season of teaching in Jerusalem, treating especially of the spiritual and physical resurrection of the dead, Jesus returned to Galilee, where He continued His ministry of love and prayer. On one occasion He crossed the Sea of Galilee, and "a great multitude followed Him, because they saw His miracles which He did on them that were diseased." Wonder and curiosity, as well as personal need, had conspired to bring them together. Many of them had brought sick ones with them at great inconvenience, for "they followed Him on foot out of the cities" (Matt. 14:13). His design had been to go apart for a little season of rest (Matt. 14:13; Mark 6:31-33). But Jesus never made a plan which He would hold to through thick and thin, come what might. He knew that the ordering of all things was in His Father's hand, whose wisdom was unerring. Therefore, when the people followed Him, He did not tell them that He was reserving that time for rest, and fretfully tax them with want of consideration, as many Christian workers have done under similar circumstances. No; "Jesus went forth, and saw a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, and healed their sick" (Matt. 14:14).

THE USE OF MIRACLE.

Men say that the healing of the sick and the signs, which God has ordained to "follow them that believe" (Mark 16:17), are not needed in our days. Whence comes such an idea? Surely not from God; nor yet from those who, looking out on the vast extent of darkness in the heathen world, see how very small a proportion make even an outward claim to be Christian; not from those who see that the larger part of outward Christianity is but a kind of modified heathenism, full of superstition and worldliness; not from those who are aware that even the larger number of converted people are living lives of no spiritual power. Men need something which shall be an evidence to their senses that God is God, and that He does answer prayer; and there is a something in their hearts which cries out for a real God, which is appealed to when the sick are healed by Him without outward means before their very eyes; when answers to prayer, for which there is no other way of accounting but by the fact that God is real, are taking place in their very midst. Wherever these things occur there the multitudes draw together, whether they be heathen or nominal Christians. God's power in healing convinced Naaman that there was "no God in all the earth, but in Israel" (II Kings 5:15). The plagues of Egypt led the magicians to say: "This is the finger of God" (Ex. 8:19). Nebuchadnezzar was led to the knowledge of the true God by seeing His witnesses unhurt in the fiery furnace, and he cried: "There is no other God that can deliver after this sort" (Dan. 3:29)!

THE TEST OF FAITH.

Jesus was the first to think how the multitude needed food. He is full of consideration all the time, and for everybody. "He saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? And this he said to prove him: for He Himself knew what He would do." Many of the difficulties we meet with day by day are sent to prove us, whether we will fall back on our own poor, easily-exhausted resources, or whether we will endure "as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11:27); whether we will look at "the things which are seen and temporal, or at the things which are not seen and eternal" (II Cor. 4:18). Philip did what most would have done under similar circumstances—he began to take stock of what was in hand. But Jesus, the Creator of all things, was there, and "He Himself knew what He would do." Thank God, He who sees the future knows always what He will do. At this very moment Jesus sees right through the thing which is puzzling you, dear, perplexed child of God. You cannot understand your experience, nor God's dealings with you; you don't see how things can work out right; but He sees all. There is nothing hidden from Him; let Him have the helm of your little ship, and all will be well.

Philip's calculation only landed him in perplexity. "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little." And from whence should come two hundred pence, and where was the store out there in the wilderness? Even at this computation each one would have only "a little"! But the Source of the manna in the wilderness was there; yet Philip had not grasped the fact; he saw only what was according to nature. "How can this difficulty be overcome?" thought a Christian worker. "My fellow-workers do not see with me, and misunderstand my motives in everything; the work is suffering, and yet any word on the subject is unendurable to them; I see the cause of God injured, and there is no way out of it." But Jesus "Himself knew what He would do," and in His own way, above and beyond the conceptions of man, He adjusted the whole matter. "One of His disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto Him, There is a lad here, which hath five barley loaves, and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?" This was the human side. God was about to reverse the question, "What are they in the hand of Omnipotence?"

THE ATTITUDE OF FAITH.

"Jesus said, Make the people sit down." God loves to have us "sit down." "Mary . . . sat at Jesus' feet, and heard His word;" and He said of her, "One thing is needful; and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her" (Luke 10:42). "I sat down under His shadow with great delight, and His fruit was sweet to my taste" (Cant. 2:3). We sit down to receive as we rest, to receive while we do nothing else. "The men sat down." It is when we sit down that God rises up. "Jesus took the loaves." Resources in His hands are resources in creative hands, transforming hands, adapting hands, almighty hands. He gave thanks before man saw the fulness of provision, and then He distributed. By the time the bread and fish had reached each man and woman and child it was "as much as they would." Andrew's conceptions of "a little" for each one were left far behind, Philip's computations were nowhere. Oh, how, again and again, the words of John the Baptist must have come back to them, "There standeth One among you whom ye know not" (John 1:26)!

"When they were filled, He said unto His disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." When God fed His people with manna in the wilderness, each man must gather for himself; under the law man must help himself. But Jesus feeds with His own hand those who come to Him for the Bread of life, and the disciples whom He bids to carry it to them gather up the fragments which the multitudes break off, and in which they see no value. Oh, how much there is in the fragments, the little words of Jesus, those things which the Spirit reveals to us as left behind by others! They have not noticed them, but they are rich treasure to us. The fragments were more than the original provision; they gathered twelve baskets of "the fragments of the five barley loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten."

A great impression was made upon the multitude by this miracle. It went from mouth to mouth, "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world." Those who had before doubted Him had now no doubt that He was the Messiah. But they looked for no other but a reigning Messiah, such as we are all looking for when Jesus comes again. These hardy Galileans were about to "take Him by force to make Him a king." But this was not the mind of Jesus. "He departed again into a mountain Himself alone." "I receive not honor from men" (John 5:41).

The disciples were left alone, and they took ship "and went over the sea toward Capernaum." Darkness had come on, and "Jesus was not come to them." To be without Him, when they were wont to have Him always near, was an incalculable loss. The sea arose by reason of a great wind that blew. Had Jesus been in the ship this need have caused little or no anxiety. Yet how often, even when Jesus is with us, we are unconscious of because we are occupied with the things we see and feel! He who could feed the multitude could also still the waves. He who could save us from "everlasting punishment" can also reverse, in the present moment, all the engines of Satan's artillery which are brought against us. Ruin may stare us in the face, but the silver and the gold are His, and we belong to the same Owner. Our Christian reputation may be at stake, and all our influence for God seems to be losing ground; but He to whom that reputation and that influence really belong has His hand upon the mainspring of circumstances, and, if fully trusted, He will bring all out right. If the learned Moses had to pass through the shepherd life in the desert of Midian to the leadership of God's people Israel; if Joseph had to pass through slavery and unjust imprisonment to the rulership of Egypt, let us believe that God is also leading us "by the right way" (Ps. 107:7).

SLAVES OF FEAR.

The disciples saw Jesus walking on the sea, but they did not recognize Him, for it was dark. Thank God, Jesus is near when it is too dark for us to see Him! He sees us all the time, He never slumbereth nor sleepeth, and He has His plan made out for us, and is only waiting to be trusted. The disciples were afraid. Oh, what slaves we are to fear! Over ninety times we are taught in the Bible to "fear not;" yet how common is the sin of fear! We think of former experiences, and expect the same thing to happen again, instead of resting in the blessed fact that He to whom all power belongs both in heaven and earth is on our side. Jesus said, "It is I; be not afraid." They knew the voice; it was the very same which wakes the dead. It was enough. "Then they willingly received Him into the ship."

Jesus within, all went well. Jesus received into the heart, into the trial, into the circumstances, into the weakness, the sickness, or aught else, and the end of the trial is come. "Immediately the ship was at the land whither they went." Jesus really taken into the ship is Jesus really trusted; it includes a complete and unreserved surrender to Him. Then God's aim is attained, the trial ceases, and we open our eyes and wonder where it is gone. We are at the shore, the storm is left behind us.

THE SECRET.

BY H. B. STOWE.

When winds are raging o'er the upper ocean,
And billows wild contend with angry roar,
'Tis said, far down beneath the wild commotion,
That peaceful stillness reigneth evermore.

Far, far beneath the noise of tempest dieth,
And silver waves chime ever peacefully;
And no rude storm, how fiercely soe'er he flieeth,
Disturbs the Sabbath of that deeper sea.

So to the soul that knows thy love, O Purest,
There is a temple peaceful evermore;
And all the bubble of life's angry voices
Dies in hushed stillness at its sacred door.

Far, far away the noise of passion dieth,
And loving thoughts rise ever peacefully,
And no rude storm, how fiercely soe'er he flieeth,
Disturbs that deeper rest, O Lord, in Thee.

O rest of rests! O peace serene, eternal!
That ever liveth, and Thou changest never!
And in the secret of Thy presence dwelleth
Fullness of joy, forever and forever.

PHOTOGRAPHY AT HOME!

AMUSEMENT, INSTRUCTION, AND PROFIT.

Our NEW Camera
The IMPROVED EXPERT
A $15 OUTFIT FOR $10
4x5 Plates, taking Cabinet Sized Photographs.

In offering our IMPROVED EXPERT CAMERA and OUTFIT to the public we claim that we are offering more for the money than has ever been attempted by any house in the trade. In the first place we offer not only a FIRST-CLASS CAMERA with LENS, TRIPOD, PLATE-HOLDER and FOCUSING SCREEN, at as low a price as the cheapest styles have ever been sold, but we give with every Camera a COMPLETE OUTFIT, comprising everything necessary for the ENTIRE PROCESS OF TAKING AND FINISHING A PICTURE.

Nearly all beginners are misled by advertisements offering "Camera Outfits" for ten, twelve or fifteen dollars, as the case may be, only to find after purchasing one that they must make a further investment of from five to ten dollars before they can make the first attempt at Photography. THOROUGHLY WELL MADE OUR IMPROVED EXPERT OUTFIT consists of a 4x5 PLATE CAMERA, suitable for all kinds of work, with LENS, FOCUSING-SCREEN and TRIPOD, one DOUBLE REVERSIBLE PLATE HOLDER, one package of best instantaneous Dry Plates, one package of Seal-Plate Paper, Developer, Fixer, with all chemicals necessary for developing and fixing the plates, Toning solutions for finishing the pictures, and Trays for the different solutions, WITH COMPLETE DIRECTIONS, packed in a strong case. THE SCIENCE OF PHOTOGRAPHY has made greater strides toward perfection in the past few years than during any period since the invention of the Daguerrotype, which was the beginning of practical photography, and it is to the invention of the prepared gelatine dry plate that much of the improvement is due. The employment of dry plates dispenses with three quarters of the work necessary with the old or wet process, and enables the AMATEUR to do AT ONCE what requires months, if not years, of study and apprenticeship to attain under the old system.

Not only is the dry plate handler, quicker, and more cleanly than the wet process, but the results are far superior in every way, dry plates being now used by the leading photographers for the finest work. The manner of operating the Camera and producing the picture by the new process is SO SIMPLE that even a child can understand and follow it with good success, and it may be briefly described as follows: Set up the camera on the tripod, with the glass focusing-screen in position, the lens pointed at the view or object to be taken. Throw a cloth over the head and the picture will be seen on the glass screen, the camera back being pulled out until in focus—that is at the point where the view is seen the clearest and sharpest. The focusing-screen is then removed and the plate-holder (in which the plate has been inserted in the dark-room) is set in its place. Everything now being ready, the slide is pulled out of the plate-holder, and the cap removed, from the lens for a few seconds, causing the plate to receive the impression of the view at which the camera is pointed. Having thus exposed the plate to develop, which is done by the application of the chemicals in a dark-room, taking but a few minutes to accomplish, and after drying, the plate has become a finished negative, from which any number of pictures may be printed and finished. To print the pictures all that is required is to place the negative on a sheet of sensitized paper in the sunlight, the rays of the sun causing to appear on the paper the exact reproduction of that which was seen on the focusing-screen preparatory to exposing the plate. Any number of plates can be thus exposed, and kept for MONTHS if so desired before finishing. THE USES OF A CAMERA are beyond number, there are many things about every home that one could not, or would not, think of taking to a regular photographer—the house, the family group, the horse, the dog. A moment's reflection will enlarge the lists to dozens of pictures that one can produce with his own outfit which he would never have thought of going to a professional photographer for. When going upon a voyage, or short trip out of town, a camera is an invaluable companion. Everything that is interesting can be photographed, and the plates kept until it is convenient to develop them, thus preserving mementos that otherwise would be impossible to obtain. The wheelman, with his camera attached to his bicycle or tricycle, will find the pleasure of his runs greatly increased in photographing the beautiful scenes he passes on the road, or taking his brother riders in group.

Inventors, Machinists, Nurserymen, Tourists, School Teachers, Carpenters and Builders, Real Estate and Land Agents and hundreds of other tradesmen and professional men will find our IMPROVED EXPERT PHOTOGRAPHIC OUTFIT a source of great pleasure, convenience and inestimable value, and the uses to which it may be put are too numerous to mention but will readily suggest themselves. AS A MATTER OF PROFIT, we do not suppose that everyone who buys a Camera will want to turn it to making money, but we believe that any enterprising man or woman can easily earn many times the price of an outfit in his or her own town in a very short time. Hundreds of people would pay a good price for a photograph of their house and land, which costs but a trifle to produce, and we know of a great many amateurs who have started in a small way and become deeply interested in the art, and are now successful professional artists. The beauty of the photographic business lies in the fact that it brings you in contact with the very best class of people, that the profits are 300 to 500 per cent, and that you can Make $5.00 to $25.00 every day and that every job you do is a constant advertisement for you. The art of Photography is a profession which has usually required years of experience to become proficient in, but which can now be learned, by our system and instructions, by even very small boys and girls in a very short time.

WHY TOIL at hard labor to make money for others when you are here afforded an opportunity to respect and independent, the master of your own time, the recipient of your entire earnings, free to go and to do as you please.

OUR IMPROVED EXPERT CAMERA, as shown by the cut above, is finely wood of the latest model, with movable front board, brass trimmings, and our new swing lever for holding the back in focus, instead of the usual thumb-screw. Our patent reversible double plate-holder, supplied only with these cameras, is so constructed as to bring the length of the plate up and down when so desired, for taking an elevated view, without altering the position of the camera on the tripod, answering all purposes of a reversible back. The lenses are very carefully A Sharp Picture The Full Size of Plate, ground and will give The Best Picture That is Ever Produced, and the lightest ever produced. Our Ready Mixed Developer is one of the greatest boons ever offered to beginners, saving as it does all trouble of weighing out and dissolving the different chemicals. It is made from the best known formula, and is recommended as being the easiest for the amateur to handle, and gives the best results. No mysterious failures when using our ready mixed developer. We have spared no pains to make the entire outfit everything that could be desired in every detail, and we apprehend that it will have the largest sale of any low priced outfit that has ever been offered, combining as it does the many advantages of the best and will send one to any tag enumerated above. We want every Outfit address, complete with everything described above, on receipt of TEN DOLLARS. Send money by Post Office Money Order or Registered Letter. THERE is no better evidence that the criminal is a fool than the conduct of the gang of foreign agitators who have come to America. They are unable to understand the attitude of the Government or the treatment they have received from it. Because they were allowed to settle here, and were not molested when they proclaimed their Antichristian, diabolical gospel of dynamite, they supposed that they could carry their words into deeds with impunity. They were unable to perceive that the majesty of the great Republic, which treated their ravings with contempt, would crush them in the moment that they put their theories into practice. Had they possessed ordinary penetration, they would have perceived that in no country could dynamite have so little prospect of success as in a country where the people govern themselves. Under a European despotism they would be arrayed against a few, and the millions would regard their outrages with indifference, if not with sympathy. Here, every American expects the men whom he has assisted in appointing to office to do their duty, and his sympathies are with those men who are in his honorable service. The American knows that the maintenance of law and order is necessary in his own interest, and that the prevalence of anarchy means ruin to himself. They have therefore made few converts here, and when they raised their flag and began their devilish warfare they had no followers but their own fellow-immigrants, and no public support. Poor as many American workmen are, they are too intelligent to think that their wrongs can be righted by an outrage on law and order. Grievous, therefore, as was the terrible collision in Chicago on May 4th, it was not wholly without features that are encouraging. It must prove to the gang of foreign communists that the hellish doctrines they advocate will not triumph under the Stars and Stripes.

was formed, and warning had been given by the press as early as last January that Most and his gang were preparing to foist their leadership on the workingmen. The warning was treated with contempt by the public generally, but it had the effect of putting the authorities on their guard. It was known that there was to be a general strike on May 1st for a reduction of the hours of labor, and it was expected that the foreign agitators would attempt to take advantage of the excited feeling which would be sure to prevail to incite the strikers to outrages of murder and arson. Chicago would naturally be the centre in which such an attempt would be made. With devilish cunning the foreign leaders issued in their daily Organ der Anarchisten Deutscher Sprache (Organ of German-Speaking Anarchists) fiery editorials, calling upon the people to "Burn! Plunder! Lynch!" They announced that arms were ready, and bombs that would annihilate a regiment. Most's pamphlets were also freely circulated. Those works are a revelation of the depth of malignity to which human nature can sink. One of them is advertised in the Freiheit. It is called Revolutionäre Kriegswissenschaft—"Revolutionary War Science." The advertisement reads:

"A handbook for teaching the use and composition of nitro-glycerine, dynamite, gun-cotton, fulminating mercury, bombs, torches, poisons, etc. By Johann Most. Price 10 cents per copy, 7 cents for agents. Every revolutionist should be in possession of this pamphlet."

It bears out its title fully. Not only are the ordinary revolutionary weapons, dynamite and nitro-glycerine, treated, but novelties in construction and design are described graphically and fervently. For instance, a very pleasing engine of war is suggested in the familiar tomato can. "Let the cover be removed, and the contents poured out," says the doctor of destruction. He then describes how a hole must be made in the cover, in which a small vial can be inserted, after which the cover is to be replaced. Then benzine is to be poured in until the can is about two thirds full. A flask, of a kind described by him in other experiments, is filled with gunpowder, and securely plugged. But a fuse has been passed through the cork, and then the flask is inserted firmly through the mouth of the vial into the can. The author then suggests that the fuse be lit by contact with the burning end of a cigar. The bomb is now ready to be hurled into the "hostile room."

"At the moment when the fuse burns to the powder the latter explodes and causes simultaneous explosion of the benzine. The burning matter flies in every direction, and does its masterly work. It is self-evident that such a fire-brand needs not necessarily to be thrown, but may be laid down in the desired spot."

On May 3d, at a meeting the Anarchists, were present, inciting to murder, and they led the attack on the McCormick works. The result of that fight should have taught them a lesson.

AT MCCORMICK'S

there were twenty thousand men, many of them armed with pistols, but a mere handful of police put them to flight. August Spies, the editor of the Anarchist, was there, and did his utmost, assisted by his German allies, to inspire the mob. Twelve policemen faced the vast assemblage, and ordered the rioters to disperse or take the consequences. The reply was a volley of stones, and the officers fired the first shots of the strike; but nobody was hit. The strikers stood their ground, and another pistol-volley was fired over their heads. Then the fighting began in earnest. Bullets whistled right and left, and off to the southward a half dozen men on a shed kept up a plunging fire. At times it was a square stand-up fight. Policemen and strikers shot at each other at a distance of twenty paces. More patrol-wagons came up, and the rioters were driven away slowly from the works. They kept up a sullen resistance, however, in Blue Island Avenue, and as the patrol-wagons drove up they became targets for all kinds of missiles. After nearly an hour's desultory fighting, Captain O'Donnell drew up two hundred officers in a line, and succeeded in clearing the streets. There were desultory fights during the day in different parts of the city, but the grand culmination was kept for the following day, when the crucial test of what the men would do was to be made. The German leaders were to learn the extent of the influence Most, Spies, and their colleagues could exert. At a private meeting for dynamite-throwers. A man who was present at that meeting says: "Volunteers were called for to throw the bombs, but no one wished to speak up, fearing arrest, should it become known who had offered to act. It was then suggested that five hundred ballots be distributed, and that a skull and cross-bones be inscribed upon twenty of them. The persons who drew the latter ballots were expected to procure bombs and be on hand. This was done, and the chief, Spies, is the only man who knows who were drawn. I know that the twenty men received their bombs. The words 'To arms!' was to be the signal for the throwing of the bombs." Spies then issued a manifesto, calling upon the men to assemble on the following night, Tuesday, May 4th, at

LOTS WERE DRAWN

THE MEETING IN THE HAYMARKET.

By eight o'clock there were from fifteen to twenty thousand men on the ground, and the expectation of the Anarchists that the fight at McCormick's would have aroused the temper of the strikers to the highest point it could reach seemed to be justified. August Spies was the first speaker who addressed the crowd. After a long, rambling talk on the labor problem, he asked: "What means this display of Gatling guns, cannon, bayonets, patrol wagons, and clubs? What means the calling out of the First Regiment? It is an entertainment for you, gentlemen. The demand of the McCormick men was reasonable, and yet McCormick denies that he is responsible for the bloodshed yesterday. I say he lies. He is responsible for the death of our brothers. There are twenty-five to thirty thousand families in Chicago suffering starvation to-day because husbands and fathers are not men enough to stand up for their rights."

Loud cheers followed this speech, and the cries of "the lake" and "the rope" were heard from hoarse throats.

A. R. Parsons was the next speaker. He went into the labor statistics largely, and defined the difference between trade unionists and Socialists. Sam Fielden, a Socialistic Englishman, was the next and last speaker. He harangued the mob in a loud, blatant, reckless way. He said: "We who come here to address you are Socialists; rebels to the law. Legislation will never help you, never. Martin Foran went to Congress in the interest of labor, and he tells you that no legislation can be had for the workingmen. Can't we find some? When the rich men understand that it is not healthy to live among a lot of discontented workmen we shall be able to get legislation, and not before." That the mob was in sympathy with his utterances was evinced by the wild applause which was accorded him.

While this was going on Captains Bonfield and Ward, with nearly two hundred policemen, had been waiting patiently in the station for the Socialists to disperse or to attempt some act of lawlessness. When the officers who had been sent to mingle with them returned and reported the temper of the Anarchists both captains came to the conclusion that prompt measures only would avert another serious riot. The order to fall in went around among the lieutenants with lightning rapidity. It was repeated to the men, and they jumped into their places with accuracy and precision. When the column had reached the speakers' wagon, Captain Bonfield ordered, "Halt," and said:

"In the name of the State of Illinois I command this crowd to disperse."

THE BOMB THROWN.

As the words left his mouth the concerted signal-shout of "To arms!" was heard, and a spluttering spark of fire arched through the air from the opening of the alley and over the speakers' wagon. It was the burning fuse of a dynamite bomb. It was well aimed in its deadly mission, and fell directly in the middle of the street and between the first two double columns of police. The instant it struck the ground it exploded with a terrible, sullen roar, seeming to shake the earth. Men fearfully wounded and dying fell on all sides, the death-dealing contents of the bomb reaching almost to the rear ranks. Twenty-nine mangled officers were groaning on the ground. A Gatling gun could not have cut a wider swath. A scene of horror followed, the details of which may never be known. The officers for an instant broke ranks, but almost instantly recovered their presence of mind. Before they had time to realize the destruction which had been wrought in their ranks the crowds of Anarchists, gathered in front and on either side of them, opened fire with revolvers at almost point-blank range. The first volley of the mob was quite as fearful in its effect as was the explosion of the bomb, but the officers did not lose their presence of mind. Orders flew thick and fast from the captains and lieutenants, and within the briefest possible space of time they were charging the murderous assassins on every hand, dealing death and destruction to them with their revolvers.

The Anarchists did not sustain the charge an instant, but fled as soon as they could distinguish the blue coats and bright buttons of the officers through the smoke from their revolvers. It was an indescribable scramble for life. Scores of men were knocked down by those behind them and trampled upon like cattle in a car unable to rise. After the Anarchists had been dispersed the police set to work to look after their wounded and dying companions. Two of them were found where the bomb exploded, both so desperately wounded as to be past hope of recovery. About thirty others were found lying on the pavement in the vicinity and suffering from pistol-shot wounds in their limbs or their bodies, and unable to stir hand or foot. The strikers or members of the mob, too, lay around wounded or dying, but the officers paid no attention to them at first, only thinking of their fallen comrades. They picked them up and bore those who could not walk or move to the station, and assisted all with slight wounds to walk to their homes.

AN EYE-WITNESS

of the riot says: "I saw the affair from beginning to end, and I emphatically declare that the police deserve the highest praise of all law-abiding people. I fought in a New York regiment from 1861 to 1865, was in twenty-two battles, and I must say that I never saw greater courage, coolness, and discipline than the police who dispersed the rioters showed last night. They instantly closed their ranks after their comrades were cut down by the anarchist miscreants' grenade and charged on the rioters with a regularity and bravery that would have done credit to veteran soldiers."

An officer of the West Lake Street station the next day found a piece of the bomb buried in the wooden pavement of the street. It was about an inch in width, and seemed to be the part through which the fuse had been thrust. The bomb was evidently a composite or mortar one, made of a dense mixture of plaster of Paris and sand. The composite is one that requires little skill to form, and under a slight pressure it becomes as hard as stone. Loaded with blasting powder it forms one of the most destructive weapons. Whoever threw the bomb timed the fuse most accurately. It touched the ground, and the explosion was instantaneous. The promptness of the explosion led at first to the belief that it was an Orsini bomb set with percussion caps that fired it the moment it touched the ground. There is no doubt, however, that it was fired with a fuse.

The Police Department on May 13th made its complete report of the terrific struggle. From this it appears that sixty-six officers were struck down, of whom five died and ten have recovered. Fifty-one are still in hospital, and it is feared that many of them must die.

An organized raid on the dens of the Anarchists was commenced on the day following the riot, and has been continued. Spies, his brother, Fielding, Schwab, and other leaders were arrested, and are held without bail to be tried for murder. In Spies's office bombs similar to that thrown on May 4th were found, and others were discovered elsewhere. The labor unions at their meetings have passed resolutions repudiating the Socialists, and condemning violence in emphatic terms. An attempt was made to resume the publication of the Arbeiter Zeitung, but when the foreign-speaking and foreign-looking printers who had sprung from no one knows where had gotten the forms ready for press it was discovered that nobody would print the rabid sheet. The forms were first carted over to the printing establishment that has done the work for years, but the proprietor shook his head, and told the emissaries to get out. Establishment after establishment was visited, but with like result, and up to a late hour of the next day the issue had not been printed. It has, however, been printed in reduced form since then at some obscure establishment.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Return to the Devil's Bondage.—At a Recent meeting Dr. Cameron said: "I heard of a woman lately who had been bound hand and foot by strong drink. By some providential means she was led to see the harm it was doing to both soul and body, and entirely gave up the use of it. She stood firm for fifteen years, but at the end of that time she fell ill, and her medical attendant gave her some spirits, and the result was that the old appetite, like a furnace long damped down, was rekindled, and the unhappy woman speedily went down to a drunkard's grave. Had she taken Christ when she first gave up the use of strong drink, her case would have been a very different one. 'An arm of flesh must fail, in such a war as this.'"

A Patient's Testing Inquiry.—Dr. Cameron said: "I was called out the other day to visit a member of the Rev. Mr. Ross's church who was very ill, and the very first thing he asked me was, 'Doctor, shall I take some whiskey?' I looked at him gravely, and said, 'Certainly not.' And his reply was, 'I did not wish for any whiskey; I only asked to see if you were like the rest of the doctors, and would prescribe what in so many thousands of cases is no healing medicine, but a deadly poison. May the Lord, in whom I trust, ever give me grace to abstain from its use. I am so glad you are different! There are thousands around us being done to death through drink.'"

Running Away from Fits.—"I Know a Man just now who is subject to fits, and he tells me that whenever he feels the fit coming on, if he is in the street he just runs as hard as he can until he is almost ready to fall with the exertion, but it is the only way of keeping the fit back; if he simply walks, or stands still, or even thinks about it for a moment, he is sure to give away, and the fit comes on, and the man falls to the ground. And, friends, that is just what I tell you to do when the temptation of drink comes over you; put it from your mind, and, like the man who is subject to fits, run if you will, or anything else, if it will succeed in keeping you from whiskey, which is surely dragging you to a premature grave."

The Only Name.—A Traveller Drove up One day to the gate of a Continental castle which he wished to see. He knocked. The porter asked his name. He gave his card. The answer was, "No admittance." He must have a letter from the owner. He offered money. Still the same answer, "No admittance." He had come from a great distance—still the same answer. "Strange," said he. "I was told that there would be an order lying for me at the lodge." The porter went back and brought a pile of letters. "Are any of these for you?" He found the right order, presented it, and was admitted. Christ's name, not ours, is our only commendation and claim. Nothing less will do; nothing more is needed. Go up to the gate; tell your errand; name His name—what a welcome you will obtain!

A Wreck at Twenty-Six.—The Rev. Mr. Harding said: "I had a Sabbath-school class some years ago, and have since learned the fate of a number of the boys in that class. The other day when I was walking down one of our streets a person touched me on the shoulder. I turned round and did not at first recognize him, when he said, 'Mr. Harding, don't you know me?' 'Is that you, Willie?' I said, for I scarcely knew my old Sabbath-school scholar. He was a prematurely old man—only twenty-six years of age. I looked back sixteen years, and remembered him a frank, fine-looking boy. Since then he had got on very well, and had been a confidential agent in a merchant's office in Ireland; but unhappily he was led from the path of duty by worldly companions until he had lost his post. 'How long have you been in the city?' I asked. 'Three years,' he said. 'And have you any one with you?' 'No.' 'Where is your wife?' I inquired. 'I do not know; I have not seen or heard anything of her, or any of my people for three years.' Had that boy given himself to the Lord while he was young, he would have been a happy Christian now; but instead, he chose the path of sin, and now he is reaping as he has sown."

Fatal Fall from a Rigging.—Mr. Love Related: "I remember a few years ago witnessing a ship being dashed to pieces. It was a sad and terrible sight. The memory of it haunts me now. Out of eleven men on board ten were brought safely to land, but the remaining poor fellow lost his life while trying to save himself. He had been upon the rigging of the ship, and coming down, he lost his hold; falling against the side of the ship he dislocated his shoulder and was immediately swept, shrieking for help, into the boiling surge, and was seen no more. Dear friends, do not try to save yourselves, for your own efforts will all be in vain; but trust to Jesus, who is willing and able to save all who come unto God by Him. 'There is none other name under heaven whereby we can be saved.'"

Refused by the Insurance Company.—Sir William Collins said: "I was once asked by the life insurance company to examine a man who wished to get his life insured. He was a big, stout, strong, healthy-looking man, and to outward appearance one would have thought the life insurance company were quite safe in accepting him. After his examination, I saw clearly that he must be rejected. He was a chronic tippler, and he was bound to die in a very short time, because his lungs and his heart were so affected by drink that he was beyond cure, and soon he must be awakened to the awful reality that he must die by it. Dear friends, it was this case, and another similar to it, that awakened me to the great harm this alcoholic curse is, and since then I have determinedly set myself against it."

A Good Climb up the Right Ladder.—"A boy came to a Band of Hope meeting, and asked me if he might sign the pledge. 'Do not allow that boy to sign the pledge,' shouted a number of boys; 'his father keeps a whiskey shop.' 'I cannot help that,' said the boy, in a grieved voice. I gave him a note home to his parents, asking if they were willing that their son should join our Band of Hope. He returned the next night with a reply signed by both father and mother, that they were very willing that their son Henry should join us. Six years after that I stepped into a car, when a young gentleman put out his hand, saying, 'How do you do, Mr. Harding?' I then recognized my young friend Henry. He informed me that he was at college, and was successfully going through his course as a medical student. I have since learned that he is a devoted Christian man, holding a high position, and is much esteemed by every one. And this is what, through God's blessing, has become of the little boy whose father kept a whiskey shop."

Sure and Speedy Pay.—"On One of the Coldest days of the winter of 1882-1883," says a Christian lady, "I found it necessary to have my errand girl out most of the day. Before she started in the morning I noticed that she had neither gloves nor mittens, and fearing she would suffer if she went without, my first thought was to give her money and send her out to buy some mittens; but my second thought was that I needed a pair of gloves, and I had not money enough just then to buy for both of us. While undecided what to do, it came to my mind that 'He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord,' and as I was glad to lend to the Lord, I gave her the money, and she bought the mittens. Late in the afternoon of the same day a lady, who knew nothing of my circumstances, called to see me. She gave me a small sum of money, saying as she did so, that I was to buy a pair of gloves for myself. She told me that she bought a pair to send to me at Christmas, but in some unaccountable manner had lost them, and so gave me this two months later. Then I thought, not only 'He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord,' but also 'That which he hath given will he pay him again.'"

THE TREATMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 23, 1886.

"If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another."—GAL. 5:15.

"Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others."—PHIL. 2:4.

A Losing Business—Violence as a Blunder—Frederick the Great Threatened by a Miller—The Broken Bridge of Sympathy—Three Brutal Principles—The Right Rate of Pay—Scriptural Injunctions—A Friendly Interest to be Taken—Moral and Physical Necessities—Early Closing a Duty—Old Arthur Tappan's Family Prayers—Sir Titus Salt's Workmen—Foremen to be Watched—Forgiving to Offenders—An Aged General's Rebuke—A Physician's Self-Sacrifice.

THE labor agitation will soon quiet. The mills will again open, the railroads resume their traffic, our national prosperities again start. Of course, the damage done by the strikes cannot immediately be repaired. Wages will not be so high as they were. Spasmodically they may be higher, but they will drop lower. Strikes, whether right or wrong, always injure laborers more than the capitalists. You will see this in the starvation of next winter. Boycotting and violence and murder never pay. They are different.

STAGES OF ANARCHY.

God never blessed murder. The worst use you can put a man to is to kill him. Blow up to-morrow all the country seats on the banks of the Hudson, and all the fine houses on Madison Square, and Brooklyn Heights, and Bunker Hill, and Rittenhouse Square, and Beacon Street, and all the bricks and timber and stones will just fall back on the bare hands of American labor.

The worst enemies of the working classes in the United States and Ireland are their demented coadjutors. Assassination—the assassinations of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke in Phoenix Park, Dublin, Ireland, in the attempt to avenge the wrongs of Ireland, only turned away from that afflicted people millions of sympathizers. The attempts to blow up the House of Commons, in London, had only this effect—to throw out of employment tens of thousands of innocent Irish people in England. In this country the torch put to the factories that have discharged hands for good or bad reason; obstructions on the rail-tracks, in front of midnight express trains, because the offenders do not like the president of the company; strikes on shipboard the hour they were going to sail, or in printing offices the hour the paper was to go to press, or in the mines the day the coal was to be delivered, or on house scaffoldings so the builder fails in keeping his contract—all these are only a hard blow on the head of American labor, and cripple its arms, and lame its feet, and pierce its heart. Traps sprung suddenly upon employers and violence never took one knot out of the knuckles of toil, or put one farthing of wages into a callous palm. Barbarism will never cure the wrongs of civilization. Mark that!

A KING THREATENED BY A MILLER.

Frederick the Great admired some land near his palace at Potsdam, and he resolved to get it. It was owned by a miller. He offered the miller three times the value of the property. The miller would not take it because it was the old homestead, and he felt about as Naboth felt about his vineyard when Ahab wanted it. Frederick the Great was a rough and terrible man, and he ordered the miller into his presence, and the king with a stick in his hand—a stick with which he sometimes struck the officers of State—said to the miller: "Now, I have offered you three times the value of that property, and if you won't sell it I'll take it anyhow." The miller said: "Your Majesty, you won't." "Yes," said the king, "I will take it." "Then," said the miller, "if your Majesty does take it I will sue you in the Chancery Court." At that threat Frederick the Great yielded his infamous demand. And the most imperious outrage against the working classes will yet cower before the law. Violence and contrary to the law will never accomplish anything, but righteousness and according to the law will accomplish it.

THE WIDENING CHASM.

But gradually the damages done the laborer by the strikes will be repaired, and some important things ought now to be said. The whole tendency of our times, as you have noticed, is to make the chasm between employer and employé wider and wider. In olden time the head man of the factory, the master builder, the capitalist, the head man of the firm, worked side by side with their employés, working sometimes at the same bench, dining at the same table; and there are those here who can remember the time when the clerks of large commercial establishments were accustomed to board with the head men of the firm.

All that is changed, and the tendency is to make the distance between employer and employé wider and wider. The tendency is to make the employé feel that he is wronged by the success of the capitalist, and to make the capitalist feel: "Now, my laborers are only beasts of burden; I must give so much money for so much drudgery, just so many pieces of silver for so many beads of sweat." In other words, the bridge of sympathy is broken down at both ends. That feeling was well described by Thomas Carlyle when he said: "Plugson, of St. Dolly Undershot, buccaneer-like, says to his men: 'Noble spinners, this is the hundredth thousand we have gained, wherein I mean to dwell and plant my vineyards. The hundred thousand pound is mine, the daily wage was yours. Adieu, noble spinners; drink my health with this groat each, which I give you over and above.'"

Now, what we want is to rebuild that bridge of sympathy, and I put the trowel to one of the abutments to-day, and I preach more especially this morning to employers as such, although what I have to say will be appropriate to all who are in the house.

THREE BRUTAL PRINCIPLES.

The outrageous behavior of a multitude of laborers toward their employers during the last three months—behavior infamous and worthy of most condign punishment—may have induced some employers to neglect the real Christian duties that they owe to those whom they employ. Therefore I want to say to you whom I confront face to face, and those to whom these words may come, that all shipowners, all capitalists, all commercial firms, all master builders, all housewives, are bound to be interested in the entire welfare of their subordinates. Years ago some one gave three prescriptions for becoming a millionaire: First, spend your life in getting and keeping the earnings of other people; secondly, have no anxiety about the worriments, the losses, the disappointments of others; thirdly, do not mind the fact that your vast wealth implies the poverty of a great many people. Now, there is not a man in my audience who would consent to go out into life with those three principles to earn a fortune. It is your desire to do your whole duty to the men and women in your service.

THE RATE OF PAY.

First of all, then, pay as large wages as are reasonable and as your business will afford. Not necessarily what others pay, certainly not what your hired help say you must pay, for that is tyranny on the part of labor unbearable. The right of a laborer to tell his employer what he must pay implies the right of an employer to compel a man into a service whether he will or not, and either of those ideas is despicable. When an employer allows a laborer to say what he must do or have his business ruined, and the employer submits to it, he does every business man in the United States a wrong, and yields to a principle which, carried out, would dissolve society. Look over your affairs, and put yourselves in imagination in your laborer's place, and then pay him what before God and your own conscience you think you ought to pay him.

"God bless you" are well in their place, but they do not buy coal nor pay house rent nor get shoes for the children. At the same time you, the employer, ought to remember through what straits and strains you got the fortune by which you built your store or run the factory. You are to remember that you take all the risks and the employé takes none, or scarcely any. You are to remember that there may be reverses in fortune, and that some new style of machinery may make your machinery valueless, or some new style of tariff set your business back hopelessly and forever. You must take all that into consideration, and then pay what is reasonable.

BIBLE INJUNCTIONS.

Do not be too ready to cut down wages. As far as possible pay all, and pay promptly. There is a great deal of Bible teaching on this subject. Malachi: "I will be a swift witness against all sorcerers, and against all adulterers, and against those who oppress the hireling in his wages." Leviticus: "Thou shalt not keep the wages of the hireling all night unto the morning." Colossians: "Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven." So you see it is not a question between you and your employé so much as it is a question between you and God.

Do not say to your employés: "Now, if you don't like this place get another," when you know they cannot get another. As far as possible once a year visit at their homes your clerks and your workmen. That is the only way you can become acquainted with their wants. You will by such process find out that there is a blind parent or a sick sister being supported. You will find some of your young men in rooms without any fire in winter, and in summer sweltering in ill-ventilated apartments. You will find how much depends on the wages you pay or withhold.

BENEFICENT EMPLOYERS.

Moreover, it is your duty as employer, as far as possible, to mould the welfare of the employé. You ought to advise him about investments, about life insurance, about savings banks. You ought to give him the benefit of your experience. There are hundreds and thousands of employers in this country and England, I am glad to say, who are settling in the very best possible way the destiny of their employés. Such men as Marshall, of Leeds; Lister, of Bradford; Akroyd, of Halifax; and men so near at home it might offend their modesty if I mentioned their names. These men have built reading-rooms, libraries, concert halls, afforded croquet lawns, cricket grounds, gymnasiums, choral societies for their employés, and they have not merely paid the wages on Saturday night, but through the contentment and the thrift and the good morals of their employés, they are paying wages from generation to generation forever.

Again, I counsel all employers to look well after the physical health of their subordinates. Do not put on them any unnecessary fatigue. I never could understand why the drivers on our city cars must stand all day when they might just as well sit down and drive. It seems to me most unrighteous that so many of the female clerks in our stores should be compelled to stand all day, and through those hours when there are but few or no customers. These people have aches and annoyance and weariness enough without putting upon them additional fatigue. Unless those female clerks must go up and down on the business of the store, let them sit down.

Then, I would have you carry out this sanitary idea, and put into as few hours as possible the work of the day. Some time ago—whether it has been changed I know not—there were one thousand grocer clerks in Brooklyn who went to business at five o'clock in the morning and continued until ten o'clock at night. Now, that is inhuman. It seems to me all the merchants in all departments ought, by simultaneous movement, to come out in behalf of the early closing theory. These young men ought to have an opportunity of going to the Mercantile Library, to the reading-rooms, to the concert hall, to the gymnasium, to the church. They have nerves, they have brains, they have intellectual aspirations, they have immortal spirits. If they can do a good round day's work in the ten or eleven hours, you have no right to keep them harnessed for seventeen.

But, above all, I charge you, O employers! that you look after the moral and spiritual welfare of your employes. First, know where they spend their evenings. That decides everything. You do not want around your money drawer a young man who went last night to see Jack Sheppard! A man that comes into the store in the morning ghastly with midnight revelry is not the man for your store. The young man who spends his evenings in the society of refined women, or in musical or artistic circles, or in literary improvement is the young man for your store.

THE GUARDIAN OF EMPLOYEES.

Do not say of these young men: "If they do their work in the business hours, that is all I have to ask." God has made you that man's guardian. I want you to understand that many of these young men are orphans, or worse than orphans, flung out into society to struggle for themselves. A young man is pitched into the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, and a plank is pitched after him, and then he is told to take that and swim ashore. Treat that young man as you would like to have your son treated if you were dead. Do not tread on him. Do not swear at him. Do not send him on a useless errand. Say "Good-morning" and "Good-night" and "Good-by." You are deciding that man's destiny for two worlds.

One of my earliest remembrances is of OLD ARTHUR TAPPAN.

There were many differences of opinion about his politics, but no one who ever knew Arthur Tappan, and knew him well, doubted his being an earnest Christian. In his store in New York he had a room where every morning he called his employes together, and he prayed with them, read the Scriptures to them, sang with them, and then they entered on the duties of the day. On Monday morning the exercises differed, and he gathered the young men together and asked them where they had attended church, what had been their Sabbath experiences, and what had been the sermon.

Samuel Budgett had the largest business in the west of England. He had in a room of his warehouse a place pleasantly furnished with comfortable seats and "Fletcher's Family Devotions" and Wesleyan Hymn-books, and he gathered his employes together every morning, and having sung, they knelt down and prayed side by side—the employer and the employes. Do you wonder at that man's success, and that though thirty years before he had been a partner in a small retail shop in a small village, at his death he bequeathed many millions. God can trust such a man as that with plenty of money.

SIR TITUS SALT

had wealth which was beyond computation, and at Saltaire, England, he had a church and a chapel built and supported by himself—the church for those who preferred the Episcopal service, and the chapel for those who preferred the Methodist service. At the opening of one of his factories he gave a great dinner, and there were thirty five hundred people present, and in his after-dinner speech he said to these people gathered: "I cannot look around me and see this vast assemblage of friends and work-people without being moved. I feel greatly honored by the presence of the nobleman at my side, and I am especially delighted at the presence of my work-people. I hope to draw around me a population that will enjoy the beauties of this neighborhood—a population of well-paid, contented, happy operatives. I have given instructions to my architects that nothing is to be spared to render the dwellings of the operatives a pattern to the country, and if my life is spared by Divine Providence, I hope to see contentment, satisfaction, and happiness around me."

That is Christian character demonstrated. There are others in this country and in other lands on a smaller scale doing their best for their employes. They have not forgotten their own early struggles. They remember how they were discouraged, how hungry they were, and how cold and how tired they were, and though they may be sixty or seventy years of age, they know just how a boy feels between ten and twenty, and how a young man feels between twenty and thirty. They have not forgotten it. Those wealthy employers were not originally let down out of heaven with pulleys of silk in a wicker basket, satin-lined, fanned by cherubic wings. They started in roughest cradle, on whose rocker misfortune put her violent foot, and tipped them into the cold world. Those old men are sympathetic with boys.

LOOK AFTER THE FOREMAN.

But you are not only to be kind to those who are under you—Christianly kind—but you are also to see that your boss workman, and your head clerks, and your agents, and your overseers in stores are kind to those under them. Sometimes a man will get a little brief authority in a store or in a factory, and while they are very courteous to you, the capitalist, or to you, the head man of the firm, they are most brutal in their treatment of those under them. God only knows what some of the lads suffer in the cellars and in the lofts of some of our great establishments. They have no one to appeal to. The time will come when their arm will be strong, and they can defend themselves, but not now. Alas! for some of the cash boys and the messenger boys and the boys that sweep the store. Alas! for some of them. Now, you capitalist, you, the head man of the firm, must look, supervise, see those all around you, investigate all beneath you.

BE MERCIFUL

And, then, I charge you not to put unnecessary temptation in the way of your young men. Do not keep large sums of money lying around unguarded. Know how much money there is in the till. Do not have the account books loosely kept. There are temptations inevitable to young men, and enough of them, without your putting any unnecessary temptations in their way. Men in Wall Street, having thirty years of reputation for honesty, have dropped into Sing Sing and perdition, and you must be careful how you try a lad of fifteen. And if he do wrong, do not pounce on him like a hyena. If he prove himself unworthy of your confidence, do not call in the police, but take him home, tell why you dismissed him to those who will give him another chance. Many a young man has done wrong once who will never do wrong again. Ah! my friends, I think we can afford to give everybody another chance, when God knows we should all have been in perdition if He had not given us ten thousand chances.

Then, if in moving around your factory, or mill, or barn, or store you are inexorable with young men, God will remember it. Some day the wheel of fortune will turn, and you will be a pauper, and your daughter will go to the workhouse, and your son will die on the scaffold. If in moving among your young men you see one with an ominous pallor of cheek, or you hear him coughing behind the counter, say to him: "Stay home a day or two and rest, or go out and breathe the breath of the hills." If his mother die, do not demand that on the day after the funeral he be in the store. Give him, at least, a week to get over that which he will never get over.

A BRAVE GENERAL.

Employers, urge upon your employes, above all, a religious life. So far from that, how is it, young men? Instead of being cheered on the road to heaven, some of you are caricatured, and it is a hard thing for you to keep your Christian integrity in that store or factory where there are so many hostile to religion. Ziethen, a grave general under Frederick the Great, was a Christian. Frederick the Great was an infidel. One day Ziethen, the venerable, white-haired general, asked to be excused from military duty that he might attend the holy sacrament. He was excused. A few days after Ziethen was dining with the king and with many notables of Prussia, when Frederick the Great, in a jocose way, said: "Well, Ziethen, how did the sacrament of last Friday digest?" The venerable old warrior arose, and said: "For your Majesty I have risked my life many a time on the battle-field, and for your Majesty I would be willing any time to die; but you do wrong when you insult the Christian religion. You will forgive me if I, your old military servant, cannot bear in silence any insult to my Lord and my Saviour." Frederick the Great leaped to his feet, and he put out his hand, and he said: "Happy Ziethen, forgive me, forgive me!"

Oh, there are many being scoffed at for their religion! and I thank God there are many men as brave as Ziethen. Go to heaven yourself, O employer! Take all your people with you. Soon you will be through buying and selling, and through with manufacturing and building, and God will ask you: "Where are all those people over whom you had so great influence? Are they here? Will they be here?" O ship-owners! into what harbor will your crew sail? Oh, you merchant grocers! are those young men that under your care are providing food for the bodies and families of men, to go starved forever? Oh, you manufacturers of this United States! with so many wheels flying, and so many bands pulling, and so many new patterns turned out, and so many goods shipped, are the spinners, are the carmen, are the draymen, are the salesmen, are the watchers of your establishments working out everything but their own salvation? Can it be that, having those people under your care five, ten, twenty years, you have made no everlasting impression for good on their immortal souls? God turn us all back from such selfishness, and teach us to live for others and not for ourselves. Christ sets us the example of sacrifice, and so do many of His disciples.

A SELF-SACRIFICING PHYSICIAN.

One summer in California a gentleman who had just removed from the Sandwich Islands told me this incident. He said one of the Sandwich Islands is devoted to lepers. People getting sick of the leprosy on the other islands are sent to that isle of lepers. They never come off. They are in different stages of disease, but all who die on that island die of leprosy.

On one of the islands there was a physician who always wore his hand gloved, and it was often discussed why he always had a glove on that hand under all circumstances. One day he came to the authorities, and he withdrew his glove, and he said to the officers of the law: "You see on that hand a spot of the leprosy, and that I am doomed to die. I might hide this for a little while and keep away from the isle of lepers; but I am a physician, and I can go on that island and administer to the sufferings of those who are farther gone in the disease, and I should like to go now. It would be selfish in me to stay amid these luxurious surroundings when I might be of so much help to the wretched. Send me to the isle of the lepers." They, seeing the spot of leprosy, of course took the man into custody. He bade farewell to his family and his friends. It was an agonizing farewell. He could never see them again. He was taken to the isle of the lepers, and there wrought among the sick until prostrated by his own death, which at last came. Oh, that was magnificent self-denial, magnificent sacrifice, only surpassed by that of Him who exiled Himself from the hearth of heaven to this leprous island of a world, that He might physician our wounds, and weep our griefs, and die our deaths, turning the isle of a leprous world into a great blooming, paradisaical garden! Whether employer or employe, let us catch that spirit.

THE STATUS OF CHINESE WOMEN.

IN the course of an address at a recent missionary meeting Mrs. Swallow, the wife of a missionary in China, thus described the condition of women in that country: "Like other Eastern women, their place is low. Very few girls are taught to read, but among the rich and nobly born there are those thus favored; and China can boast of some women of literary ability, the first book on 'Female Education' having been written by a Chinese lady named Pau Chao, eight years before Christ. With few exceptions, however, they are uneducated, and treated as such, having but little choice in making their conditions in life, and few opportunities for supplying the higher needs of their nature. Even beauty is estimated by the smallness of their cramped and crushed feet, the size of which being, of course, largely dependent on the amount of torture undergone. There is little to break the routine of daily life. Ofttimes she is early sent to the home of her betrothed husband, and in too many instances treated more like a slave than a daughter. Should she fail to perpetuate the family name, then polygamy enters the family; and if her lord and master get enthralled in the opium vice, it would be no strange thing for him to do to sell his wife.

"Her sphere is very narrow, being mainly confined to cooking the rice, and other domestic duties. For instance, the floors must be well swept at least once a year. They relieve the dull monotony by gossiping and smoking tobacco. Little as the social and home life of these women is to be envied, it is not here that they are most needy. We must pass into the domain of the spiritual, and then the outlook becomes vague, blank, and unsatisfying. For three thousand years she has been worshipping idols, her mind filled with grim fears and weird fancies. Again, think of her mechanically chanting liturgies and burning incense for more than two thousand years as a Buddhist devotee, in constant dread of evil spirits, and haunted by the fear lest after death no one on earth would worship or offer sacrifices to her spirit, but that it would be left to wander,

Hovering bare,

Void in the void, and impotent in air.

Hope beyond the grave is dim and shadowy. Buddhism extends to its daughters a cold welcome. There is no hope for them unless through being reborn as men. Northern Buddhists add a special hell for females from which no release is possible. All the other abodes of punishment, with the exception of this female apartment, are only purgatories."

RUNNING A GAUNTLET OF ARROWS.

AN interesting letter which the Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, publishes from Mr. Grenfell, of the Congo Mission, recounts a hairbreadth escape from death which the mission party have experienced. Mr. Grenfell says:

"We got among the Lokuku people during an exploring voyage up the Congo, and for a couple of days our progress was among friends; then once more we were among timid folk, but soon passed them to reach our Lusaka acquaintances, among whom we spent a very satisfactory couple of days. As soon, however, as we had passed their limits, we found ourselves among determined enemies, who laid an ambush at a narrow pass, and succeeded in very much astonishing us with an unexpected flight of arrows, one of which stuck into the woodwork of the boat, just between my wife and myself, another struck the awning and came a foot through its thin planking, another went through the galley window right among the pots and pans, and several very narrowly missed one or the other of our party. But before we were recovered from our surprise we had, with God's good favor, safely run the gauntlet, and were away into wide water again, where we could not be reached from either shore. This was the first time during the journey that we had been attacked with poisoned arrows, and as there is a great deal of difference between a clean-cut wound and a poisoned one, the risk appealed to us very forcibly, so forcibly, indeed, that when, toward evening, we were met with a similar reception, we just turned round and started homeward, after having journeyed more than four hundred miles up the Juapa, and over nearly one thousand miles of new waterway."

A REMARKABLE ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERY.

A DISCOVERY announced in the New York Sun as having been made recently by the distinguished French astronomers, Messrs. Paul and Prosper Henry, is not less significant for the manner than for the matter of the achievement. The astronomers could not see what they describe, but when a photograph was taken of the scene revealed by their telescope, a microscopic examination of the picture disclosed the object so long sought. The Christian who walks by faith, not by sight, has spiritual experiences analogous to that of the astronomers. He reads on the sensitive plate of his faith things that are not visible to his eye (II Cor. 4: 18).

"Messrs. Henry, by means of their new photographing telescope, have found a nebula in the Pleiades which appears to be connected with the star Maia, one of the members of that famous group. The most powerful telescopes have failed to show any trace of this strange phenomenon when it is sought for with the eye alone. But it clearly impresses its image upon the photographic plate exposed to its radiation.

"The Messrs. Henry have published a drawing of the new nebula. It is of a very singular shape. Starting from the star, it sweeps away in a broad curve which gradually fades into invisibility at a distance of some three minutes of arc. It produces the impression of an enormous current of nebulous matter rushing spirally into the flames of this distant sun, as if it were the fuel that feeds them. The discovery of this nebula is doubly interesting because it has been known for many years that there was some mysterious object in the Pleiades which no telescope and no eye seemed to be able fully to grasp. As long ago as 1779, Jaurat published a map of this star group, in which a nebula was represented. But astronomers long looked for the nebula in vain. The labors of the Messrs. Henry show there is reason to hope that we shall yet get more than a mere glimpse of the hidden wonders of the heavens."

THE GOSPEL LOCOMOTIVE.

EVANGELIST SAM JONES, in one of his recent sermons, vehemently protested against the sleepy, half-hearted but decorous manner in which worldly Christians live their religion, and urged them to greater earnestness and activity. He said:

"Some people go toward heaven with a great deal more heaviness, and a great deal more slowness, and a great deal less activity than other people go to hell. That's a fact. I can see a sinner in this town on a double-quick every minute going toward hell and laugh in joy on his way, while a great many of God's people are dragging along as if they were going to misery, and say, 'I'll put the fearful day off as long as I can.' That won't do, brother; it's wrong.

"The fact is, I am out of patience with this slow-moving Christianity. The devil can run a mile a minute while we are pulling on our boots, and he gets there and gets the game before we've gotten ready to start. This world has gotten to a point—for instance, in a railroad phrase—this world has come up to a point where it won't put up with those little two-wheeled engines running along at the rate of three miles an hour. What did the world? It said, 'You hasten up that machine; we don't want to ride on that schedule.' What did the railroad do? Why, it just pried up that engine and put eight more wheels under it. Now it goes sixty miles an hour. The world says, 'We like that.'

"These little two-wheeled concerns, that go jigger, jigger all the time, and don't make but three miles an hour, they make schedule time—their schedule time, but it isn't but three miles an hour. Ah me! brother, we have got tired of that sort of thing. The Lord God side-track all such! I don't want you in my way; I can't put up with your schedule of three miles an hour. I want you side-tracked or dumped in the ditch, for you are a nuisance on the main line of the Grand Trunk Railway to Heaven. You are a nuisance; you are in the way.

"The devil don't run after some of you, anyway; he just lies down and goes to sleep and lets you catch up with him. The devil just looks behind him to see how long it will be before we catch up to him. Listen, we want activity; we want movement; we want to get a good start. Are you in earnest? Do you mean it? Are there dangers behind me, and difficulties all around me?

"Is it necessary that I lay aside every weight—anything that will hinder me in running? Running, running. That was St. Paul's word. No crawling in church; no creeping in church, but running, running, running, with all your might."

MISS ELSA BORG'S FAITH WORK.

LAST month Miss Murray, of Bethshan, paid a visit to Sweden, and there saw in operation the grand work, similar in principle to that of George Müller, of Bristol, now being carried on by Miss Elsa Borg, whose portrait appeared in this journal on June 25th, last year. The following is an extract from a letter from her, published in Thy Healer, in which she describes the work:

"Miss Elsa Borg, Tekla Lundin, her helper, and fourteen Biblewomen live in a primitive old house, entered, as most are, by a gateway into a courtyard; no street door. For many years Aunt Elsa kept a school at Gefle. Thirteen years ago her health broke down from congestion of the brain. After two years of rest, her health was so far restored she longed again to be at work. About this time the Christians in Stockholm were much stirred by the accounts of Mrs. Ranyard's Biblewomen and their work, and longed to have some of their own. Aunt Elsa prayed, and felt it laid on her heart to have a little house in Stockholm to train workers.

A house was put, rent free, at her disposal, and five Christian young women came forward to be trained. She began in the autumn, and the next summer her first set of girls were sent out into the work in different towns, and another set took their places. So it has gone on till her Bible-women are scattered all over Sweden.

"As they began to work among the poor who live all around them, they came to know many poor girls who longed to leave a life of shame, but there were none to take them by the hand, or give them a trial or chance to redeem their character. They would come to Aunt Elsa and implore her to take them. For awhile she had two, and even three, sleeping in their sitting-room, but it could not go on so, it was too unwholesome. With much difficulty, a house was secured for this purpose, with a nice large garden. It ought to hold twenty girls, but it has three matrons and twenty-seven girls.

"In working among the people, Aunt Elsa's heart was grieved for the children, often so neglected, so ill, and subject to most corrupting influences. Seeing the need of Preventive work, she took a little house with four rooms, in which she has ten children, a 'mother,' and a 'helper.' No rules are there as to age or circumstances, some are admitted as babes in arms (there are several such now), some at four, six, and seven years old—only they must be girls!

"There are fifty-two children, to be clothed, as well as maintained; twenty-seven women and girls, and twenty-three Biblewomen, in all one hundred and eighteen persons to be fed—and from seventy to eighty to clothe; 6000 Swedish crowns ($1608) annual rent are paid, besides the wages of the gardener. All this is sent by the Lord, without one single appeal being made or one person asked, or told there is a need."

A FOUNDLING CLAIMED.

A SCENE recalling that of Miriam watching the infant Moses in the ark of bulrushes on the Nile was enacted in New York last summer, the facts of which are only just disclosed. They show the depth and intensity of a mother's love, and remind the child of God of the assurance given him that though a woman may forget her suckling child, yet does God never forget His own (Isa. 49 : 15).

The story was told to a reporter by the Inspector, as follows :

"On the 10th of August last a little babe, neatly dressed, was found in a basket deposited in a hallway on Eighth Avenue. A policeman took it to the station, and the following entry was made in the book after citing when it was found: 'Blue eyes, dark hair, white dress, underclothes and cap; red shawl. Time, half-past two P.M.' The infant was sent to the police matron.

"Recently a neatly-dressed woman appeared at the desk. 'I want to know about a baby you found in the hallway at No. — Eighth Avenue on August 10th, at half-past two.'

"'It is all right. Is it yours?'

"'Yes,' she replied, and gave a description of the clothes.

"'How did you know it came here?' asked Sergeant Kass.

"'Because I saw the policeman bring it. I was watching my child when it was found. I had to give it up because I could not support it. I can now, so I have come for it.'

"'Do you know,' said the Sergeant, much moved, 'that you have broken the law in abandoning your child?'

"'Yes; I know it. I am willing to go to jail, but I want my babe.'

"The Sergeant consulted Inspector Steers, and the Inspector went in to see the Superintendent. It had to be done. She had broken the law, and consequently she was arrested. The next morning she was taken before the Justice and told her story, saying that she would willingly go to jail, but she must have back her babe.

"What did the Justice do? Why, he discharged her. And the baby? Bless you, sir, she got it."

EIGHT ASPECTS OF THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. W. Fuller Gooch.

I. Its Certainty as a Revealed Fact—Teaching of the Scriptural Records—II. Its Place in the Divine Economy—Creative Types of Dispensational Days—III. Its Purpose as a Divine Arrangement—IV. Its Blessing to the Heathen World—V. Its Character as a Theocratic Reign—VI. Its Duration as a Dispensational Period—VII. Its End as a Predicted Catastrophe—VIII. Its Practical Value as an Anticipated Event—The Nearness of the Lord's Return.

IN attempting to bring before you the millennial reign of Christ, my purpose is to address those who are inquirers rather than those who already see their way clear to conclusions which many of us regard as beyond question. I shall briefly dwell upon eight main lines of thought, along which a study of the subject in its general aspects must necessarily lead us. Let me ask your attention : I. To its certainty as

A REVEALED FACT.

Only as a fact of revelation can any certainty attach to it. Mere speculation ought to have no place in such inquiries as these. But once see it to be a truth contained in Holy Writ, and it passes out of the region of hypothesis, and becomes a fundamental fact—fundamental, that is, to the integrity of the Inspired Word.

A glance at the first chapter of Genesis, read in the light of Ps. 8, Rom. 8 : 19-22, and Heb. 2 : 5-8, shows that there is a sovereignty over creation through, in, and under Christ, yet to be manifested—a sovereignty such as the Gospel dispensation does not confer, nor, indeed, as to arrangements and conditions, harmonize with. The Prophecies are so full of the King who is to rule in righteousness, and who "shall reign, and prosper, and execute judgment and justice in the earth," that but for the spiritualizing process with which we are so familiar, it is impossible to read them without being assured of millennial truth.

THE NEW TESTAMENT

in no way overturns these uniform teachings of the Old. By parable and prophecy, by precept and by promise, our Lord gave emphasis to all that the prophets of old had said concerning Him. The Apostles in plainest terms assert their expectation of the golden age which should follow the present time of waiting for and working unto the kingdom of God. (Acts 3 : 19-21).

John, in the Revelation, whatever principle of interpretation you may apply to details, assuredly unfolds the fundamental fact of a kingdom yet to come, and a reign of Christ and His saints in connection with earth and earthly scenes, such as our dispensation cannot develop.

II. ITS PLACE IN THE DIVINE ECONOMY.

It is an important truth. We review the history of God's past dealings with men, and we find them displaying an order and precision which fully establishes the belief that the seven creation days of Genesis are but types of as many dispensational days in which the great Framer of all things is bringing to perfection His new creation. Eden answers to the first of these; the antediluvian age, commencing with the fall, is the second; the Noachic, dating from the covenant made with Noah after the deluge, is the third; the Abrahamic, beginning with the call of Abraham, the fourth; the Sinaitic, with Moses at its head, is the fifth; the Gospel, originating in the incarnation of the Son of God, is the sixth; and where shall we look for the seventh—the grand Sabbath rest in which the curse uplifted, creation gladdened, man restored, and God rejoicing in all His works—if not to that millennial reign, which is ushered in by the return of Christ? As each past dispensational era has had its fitting place and special design in the economy of Him who, "through Christ, His Son, hath made (or set) the ages," so the coming closing age is needed to fill up or complete the plan of predestined grace and truth.

III. ITS PURPOSE

as a divine arrangement. Among the special purposes of the millennial reign may be cited : (a) The revelation of the glory of Christ as the exalted and glorified Son of Man. Earth, as yet, has never seen His glory; it has but witnessed His career as "a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." But it shall see "the King in His beauty." (b) The manifestation of the sons of God is a second purpose to be answered. Now they are hidden, not only as to the secret springs at their life, but as to their true character and glorious destiny. As yet sharing the rejection and the sufferings of her Lord, but the time is coming when she shall be exalted to the Bridegroom's throne. (c) The complete fulfilment of the covenants made with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. "God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew." The seed of Abraham His friend (Isa. 61 : 8) are still near His heart, the land promised to be theirs forever, as a peaceable habitation, is still before Him, in due time to be remembered and restored. (d) The victory of Jesus over the devil and all his works shall be revealed. Satan himself bound, and cast into the abyss, his legions driven from the abodes of men, and hell restrained from polluting earth or heaven, the field shall be clear for universal blessing.

THE BRIDE IS IN EXILE,

IV. ITS BLESSING TO THE HEATHEN WORLD.

One of the saddest facts to contemplate is the coldness and neglect with which the Church has treated the divine command to evangelize the world, and failed to respond to the yearning compassion with which the great heart of God has viewed the perishing millions afar. But in the millennial day it will be seen how, under the reign of Christ, the whole earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, for then shall all the kingdoms of the world have become the kingdom of God and of His Christ.

V. A THEOCRATIC REIGN.

The words of the Apostle, in Rom. 14 : 17, used to describe the spiritual aspects or elements of the kingdom of God in mystery, are equally descriptive of the most salient features of that kingdom in manifestation. The kingdom of God is "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." Even in a spiritual sense, under the millennial reign, these things will be wondrously experienced and enjoyed by untold millions of earth's inhabitants; for in that day effusions of the Holy Spirit, such as have never yet been known, shall be poured out upon the world. Righteousness, in its evangelical, personal, social, and political aspects, shall in that day universally prevail; injustice and oppression of every kind shall cease; society shall be associated for the common weal; commerce, science, art, and literature shall be based on principles of truth and moral force. Then shall be seen "a world in principle as chaste as this is gross and selfish." The will of God shall be done on earth as it is in heaven.

VI. ITS DURATION.

Speculation has often been rife upon this point; I will only quote the familiar words of Rev. 20 : 4. There the fact is stated concerning the kingdom of priests who have part in the first resurrection which precedes and ushers in the millennial reign: "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." The definite use of the term "a thousand years" so many times in the summary of millennial truth contained in this book affords a strong argument in favor of its literal significance. But it is not our object to enter now upon points of detail; suffice it to say that this glorious age of ages shall last long enough to display before a wondering universe the exceeding riches of that grace of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord, and the boundlessness of that power which is given into the hands of the Son of Man.

VII. ITS END IN A CATASTROPHE.

It is a fact of solemn and instructive import that each succeeding dispensation of God's regard to man has ended in judgment. Eden ended in the expulsion of the guilty pair; the era of the first promise and of initial faith ended in the Flood; the renewal of divine covenant with man through Noah ended in the Babel strife of tongues; the Abrahamic age of Israel ended in the sore bondage of Egypt, and the judgment of the Red Sea; the Sinaitic, or Levitical, period closes with the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the chosen race; the Gospel day, bright as it has been with the effulgence of the glory of God, beheld in the face of Jesus Christ, is to set amid the darkness of apostasy and the doom of Christendom; and the millennial reign, as to its earthly sphere, will close with the fire of God devouring a revolting host, who, under the lead of Satan, once more allowed to test the heart of man, rebel against the Lord, and seek to overturn the very foundations of His throne. Awful and sublime are the words of the Apostle Peter as he describes the terrors of this scene (II Peter 3).

VIII. ITS PRACTICAL VALUE.

I venture to affirm that whether we look at the essential nature and influence of prophetic truth, or at the lives of most of those who have most thoughtfully and intelligently studied it, the effects of such study, and the deep convictions to which it leads, are in every way of the highest practical value and importance. It is impossible to realize with anything like spiritual perception the shortness of this present time, and the nearness of the Lord's return, and to be idle, cold, or dead. The voice of prophecy rings in the ears of those who prayerfully study its teaching, and in tones which stir us to the depth of our being, calls upon us to let our loins be girt, our lamps trimmed, and our lives ordered as those of men who are watching and waiting for their Lord.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Proposed Amendment to the Constitution. declaring polygamy unlawful, has been reported by the House Committee on Judiciary. Many people will consider such action as unnecessary. There is no doubt about polygamy being already unlawful. But the amendment is likely to become very important. If Utah should be admitted as a State, or should the Mormons settle in some State in such numbers as to be able to capture the government and Legislature, Congress would have no right to interfere in the marriage laws as the Constitution now stands. An amendment classing polygamy with treason would give the Federal Government the required power, and therefore the proposal is an evidence of foresight which ought to be promptly ratified. Otherwise we may some day see among the family of Christian States one member with society of the Asiatic type outraging public decency with impunity.

Among the Various Measures Proposed with the object of giving copyright in the United States to foreign authors, the Senate Committee on Patents has selected that prepared by Mr. Chace as the best. His bill was reported on May 21st. It will probably pass the Senate, but is scarcely likely to reach the House in time for action at this session. It strikes out from the existing copyright law: "Citizen of the United States or resident therein." Thus, if it is enacted, foreign authors will, under its provisions, enjoy the same rights and privileges as American citizens. Precautions are taken, however, in a separate section of the act, to prevent the concession being abused. The name of any book issued in a foreign country must be recorded in the office of the Librarian of Congress on or before the day on which the book is published in the country of origin. And, within three months of the record being made, two copies of an edition printed in the United States must be sent to the Librarian of Congress. Unless these two stipulations are complied with the author cannot secure copyright, and any American publisher may issue the work. The enactment of this law will protect American printers and yet remove from the United States the reproach of dishonesty, which has for so long a time been a favorite theme of foreign speakers and authors.

The Sympathy of the whole Country is Due to the Hon. George H. Pendleton, our Minister to Germany, who by a sudden calamity was last week bereaved of his beloved wife. Mrs. Pendleton returned from Berlin with her daughter about two months ago to nurse her son's wife, who was dangerously ill. They remained after that lady's death to cheer and console the widower. On Thursday last, while taking a drive in Central Park, New York, the two ladies became alarmed by the horse taking fright and running away. They saw the coachman precipitated from his box, and fearing that the vehicle would be overturned, they sprang out. Mrs. Pendleton's head struck the concrete curb, and she was killed instantly. Miss Pendleton fell on the grassy bank, and though much shaken was not fatally injured. The intelligence was delicately broken to Minister Pendleton in Berlin, but it could not be otherwise than a terrible shock to him. He fell fainting on the floor, and remains seriously prostrated.

The Fishery Trouble with Canada was aggravated last week by the seizure of another American vessel. On May 17th the Ella M. Doughty was seized on the charge of buying bait and neglecting to enter or clear at the Custom House at St. Ann's. The captain admitted purchasing bait, but claims that he had a right to do so, as he carried a permit from the collector to trade in foreign ports. The United States Government has now taken the matter in hand, but the character of Mr. Bayard's intervention has not yet been disclosed. While it was still uncertain whether he had taken official action, the Maine Fish Exchange held a meeting to demand the protection of armed ships in the fishing grounds. It was resolved, if the Government did not immediately send such vessels, that the firms interested should arm and equip a vessel themselves. It has since been reported that the Augusta Herrick, a vessel which sailed for the Bay of Fundy last week, is armed with cannon, and the crew have been supplied with small arms. Senator Frye, who is the champion in Congress of the Maine fishermen, contends that, although the treaty of 1818 does not permit the purchase of bait, the right to do so has been recognized by subsequent British legislation. He expresses the belief that the difficulty will be satisfactorily adjusted.

The Sentence on Jaehne, the New York alderman who took a bribe of twenty thousand dollars, has met with hearty approval from the public and the press. There is and ought to be no exultation over the unhappy man who has gone from ease and luxury to wear stripes and starch shirts in the State's prison; but there is very properly a feeling of joy that in spite of money, influence, and forensic skill a guilty man has been sent to undergo his just deserts. After a long trial, in which the accused was defended by some of the ablest lawyers in the State, Jaehne was convicted, and on May 21st Judge Barrett sentenced him to be kept at hard labor in State Prison for nine years and ten months. In passing the sentence the judge uttered words which deserve to be read throughout the land, so truly do they represent the sense of the best portion of the community. In the course of his address he said: "The case is a sad one. It is sad to see a man with the advantages you have occupying your present shameful position. But the saddest thing of all about your case is the doubt which pervades many good and honest minds of your conviction. No doubt was entertained of your guilt. It was universally conceded when the evidence was in that the case against you was clear, convincing, and overwhelming. There was no doubt of your guilt, but there was a doubt concerning the chances of convicting you. The doubt arose because the people have not sufficient faith in their common laws, because they feared that crime would in the end triumph over virtue. Every good citizen should rejoice that all these doubts have been dispelled, and the lesson it teaches is a good one." Talking with his friends afterward about the judge's address, Jaehne said: "I never heard anything so terrible in my life—anything so utterly unnecessary. Why did he not sentence me at once? Why should he have added to the awfulness of my position by delivering such a harsh speech to me?" The answer might have been given him that the judge was availing himself of an excellent opportunity to read a lesson to the public generally, and especially to some whom it concerns. There are many places in the city on the walls of which it would be a good thing to hang up the whole address printed in large type.

The Indictment of Three of the Chicago Anarchists has been decided upon by the Grand Jury. They are Spies, Fielden, and Parsons. There is conflicting evidence as to the man who threw the bomb, but the police do not despair of identifying him. An important arrest was made on May 21st which may help in this matter. The man who is named Lehmann is known to be in the secrets of the anarchists, and it is believed that if he did not throw the bomb himself, that he can tell who did throw it. In his possession and on the premises which he occupied at the time of his arrest were found three round dynamite bombs, exactly similar to that used at the Haymarket riot. Two boxes of dynamite "giant powder" caps, two coils of dynamite fuse, and two boxes of dynamite not made into bombs were also found. The bombs had the fuse attached, and seemed ready for immediate use. The rioters who sacked the drug-store in Chicago and drank poison under the impression that it was brandy cannot recover. Eight of them are already dead.

A Baby King was Born at Madrid on May 17th. The event was the occasion of much excitement. Since the death of King Alfonso, on November 24th, 1885, there has been intense anxiety about his successor. Spain has not been happy under her queens, and the fact that the only child of the deceased king was a girl rendered the people apprehensive of plots and revolution. The birth of this posthumous child last week has therefore been hailed with delight. Elaborate preparations were made for the event, and when its approach was announced, the Premier and the grandees assembled in the palace to await the news. According to the Spanish custom, the new-born babe was solemnly paraded round the antechambers on a cushion for inspection and admiration. The birth was pompously recorded in an official deed drawn up by the Minister of Justice, and the ceremony ended. Meanwhile the news had been conveyed to the crowd in the plaza by hoisting the royal standard. Instantly the church bells rang out, guns were fired, and the air was filled with the sounds of rejoicing.

The Czar of Russia Issued a Manifesto Last week which caused some apprehension. At the conclusion of the Crimean War, thirty years ago, his father agreed to the demand of the allied Powers that he should not have armed vessels afloat on the Black Sea which could menace Constantinople. Recently the present Czar notified the Powers that he considered the time had come for a relaxation of the prohibition. He thereupon commenced the preparation of a fleet which is now ready for service. In his manifesto to the officers and crews of the fleet he uses the following significant words: "My will and thoughts are directed toward the peaceful development of the nation's welfare, but circumstances may render the fulfilment of my wishes difficult and force me to an armed defence in order to preserve the dignity of the empire. If such occasion should arise, I know that you will aid me with the devotion and constancy which your ancestors displayed."

Slight Skirmishes Between the Turks and Greeks occurred last week. It was the natural result of having in close proximity armed men whose passions have been inflamed by prolonged agitation. No very clear account of the fighting has been cabled, but it would appear that the Turks were the aggressors. On Friday they commenced firing on the Greek position, and a prompt reply came from the Greeks. The latter assert that they captured three prisoners and a considerable quantity of ammunition. A conference between the respective commanders was held on the following day with the view of preventing a recurrence of the conflict. A later report states that serious fighting was going on at another part of the frontier.

The Home Rule Question Continued the prominent topic in England throughout the week. The variations in public expectation of the result were remarkable. On the whole, the prospects of the bill passing its second reading were a little brighter at the close of the week; but no one is sanguine. The change in the current is principally due to the pressure outside Parliament. There are many indications that the people are in favor of granting Home Rule, and such indications it is not safe for members who wish to keep their seats to disregard. It seems certain that if Mr. Gladstone is defeated, he will dissolve the Parliament, and every member is therefore brought face to face with the question of the prospect of re-election. Besides this pressure there is another influence at work. The speech of Lord Salisbury, a part of which we quoted here last week, has disgusted sensible men, especially those who follow the lead of the Marquis of Hartington. They recognize in Ireland the presence of misery and discontent, and they know that it will not be remedied by any such prescription as the only one Lord Salisbury offers—that of a firm government and emigration. They are opposed to governing Ireland as a conquered territory; they are anxious to see it pacified, and they are more disposed to accept the one alternative offered by Mr. Gladstone, which has the promise of success in it. Thus the number of waverers has increased, though at present not sufficiently to justify the prediction that the bill will pass.

The American Bible Society Celebrated its seventieth anniversary on May 13th. The Rev. Dr. Wickham, who is now in his ninety-first year, was present, and related reminiscences of the days of the founding of the Society. He was present at its institution in the City Hall seventy years ago. During the past year the Society has expended $499,998, and already has pledged $178,658 for the ensuing year. The number of copies of the Bible published by the Society last year in various languages was 1,274,036. The Foreign Department is displaying remarkable energy, which shows that the missionaries enjoy a lively interest among the directors. Portions of the Old Testament are to be printed at Honolulu for the Gilbert Islanders. Mrs. Robertson's version of the New Testament in Muskogee will soon appear. Rjutei's translation of Luke in Corean and Dr. Macdonald's version of the Proverbs in Siamese are ready for the press. Some portions of the Old Testament have been printed in Shanghai Colloquial and the New Testament in Canton Colloquial. The Old Testament will appear in Modern Syriac this year, and many parts of it in Spanish and Portuguese.

An Appropriate Memorial of the Late Jerry McAuley was unveiled on Saturday last in New York. It is a drinking-fountain erected in the little triangular park at the junction of Broadway and Sixth Avenue at Thirty-second Street, within sight of the scene of his labors at the Cremona Mission. The fountain consists of a single quadrangular shaft ten feet high and three feet wide on each face, and is almost severe in its plainness. At the base, fronting the roadbed, are basins for animals into which the water pours through dolphins' mouths. On the face next to the sidewalk is a cup held between two hands thrust out of a cross above a basin. Touching a spring causes water to flow from this cup.

Over this cup is the following inscription: "I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely." The other faces are inscribed: "Erected by the friends of Jerry McAuley." Inside of the shaft is an ice chest, which will be kept filled during the summer by the friends of Jerry McAuley, so that the water drawn from the cup is iced water. The fountain is of iron bronzed over. Before the unveiling a short preliminary service was held in the Cremona Mission. The Rev. Dr. R. R. Booth presided, and the Rev. Drs. R. S. MacArthur, George Alexander, General Clinton B. Fisk, A. S. Hatch, and Mrs. McAuley made brief addresses.

The Refusal of a Marriage License was Requested by a young lady in Pennsylvania recently. She entered the clerk's office in Potter County, and with many blushes inquired if a certain young man had taken out a license to marry a lady whom she named. She looked much relieved when assured that no such license had been applied for. She left the emphatic injunction with the clerk: "If he does come for that license don't let him have it; I have got the first claim on him." One cannot but feel sorry for the distressed girl; her injunction would have so little influence. First claims do not count for much in love affairs. Neither do they in spiritual matters. Many a child who has been consecrated to God in prayer, and in youth has vowed to give himself to Christ, has in manhood allied himself to the world and forsaken God (Isa. 5: 1-5).

Baron Woerishoffer, the New York Millionaire, who died intestate two weeks ago, had a large number of wills made, but did not execute any of them. During the two years immediately preceding his death his lawyers prepared several of them, but in each case he had a new will made without signing the one previously sent to him. This eccentricity was the subject of conversation among his friends when his intestacy was announced in the press, and an aged lawyer remarked that the deceased millionaire's case was by no means exceptional. Among his own clients, the lawyer said, there are at least a dozen wealthy men and women who order new wills almost monthly, have great care exercised in their preparation, and then, day by day, postpone signing the documents till some new circumstance arises to suggest still further changes and a new form. "I know one man," said this lawyer, "who has spent $20,000 in having wills drawn within the last few years." The results of this form of procrastination are not disastrous, because the law provides for an equitable distribution of the deceased's estate when there is no will; but the same habit, when affecting the soul, involves a lamentable catastrophe. People are continually dying unprepared who fully intended to give themselves to God before death came (Eccles. 5: 4).

The Dreams of the Blind Form the Subject of an interesting communication published in the Philadelphia Record, by Superintendent Hall of the Working Home for Blind Men, in West Philadelphia. He states that the blind who have been so afflicted from birth never dream of seeing anything. The impressions of their dreams are regulated by the sense of touch, of hearing, of taste and smell. One of the most intelligent inmates of the West Philadelphia "Home," who came into the world blind, says that although he has read a great deal he never dreams of the things he has read about, and never dreams of any thing or person with which he has not in some way come in personal contact. He dreams of music, of the voices of persons he knows, but never of the landscape, a picture or a tree. No idea of what they look like is formed in his mind, and none comes to him in the fancies of his sleep. Even in the unrestrained imagination of the sleeping there seems to be no capacity for the use of a sense of which they have had no experience. It is so in spiritual matters. The natural man is incapable of comprehending spiritual things. When his spiritual nature is quickened by the Holy Spirit he sees things that were dark to him before (1 Cor. 2: 14).

An Involuntary Voyage Across the Atlantic was the sequel to a Sunday boating excursion recently. A vessel arrived in St. George's Bay, Newfoundland, on May 19th, having on board a passenger who had been picked up from an open boat adrift off the coast of the Island of Jersey. On Sunday, April 18th, a gentleman and lady went out for a row after attending church at St. Hilaire, in Jersey. The gentleman in rowing let one of his oars slip, and in trying to recover it lost the other. The boat began to drift out to sea, and the gentleman, being an expert swimmer, jumped into the water to get the oars. He was unable to reach the boat again, and at last, to save his life, struck out for the shore, leaving the boat with the lady in it to drift out to sea. After forty hours of anxiety and suspense in the boat the lady saw a ship bound for Newfoundland. She was taken on board and brought to America. She is not the first person who has started out to take what is called "innocent pleasure" on the Lord's day and has brought up where she had no intention of going. Unhappily, young people who so commence the journey of life in the world generally pass through shame and disgrace to a death in which there is no hope (Isa. 58: 13, 14).

A Naive Letter was Addressed by an Office-seeker to a New York journal last week. The writer thus states his case: "I have been appointed to a politic position, and have to pass a Civil Service examination before I can receive any pay, and it is doubtful if I can pass. Now, if I should get another party to pass the examination for me under my name, could anything be done to me, or could I get into any trouble. If so, please state in your next issue and oblige." The young man does not appear to know that the law takes cognizance of just such acts as that he contemplates, and prescribes for any one found guilty of committing them a year in the penitentiary and a fine of five hundred dollars. The examination is not a service to be rendered, as he seems to think, but a test of his fitness for the "politic position," which would not be demonstrated by another person passing the examination for him. He would, therefore, be very likely to get into "trouble," as he could not get a substitute to suffer the penalty as well as pass the examination under his name. It is in that particular that the substitution of Christ for sinners stands unparalleled. He not only rendered a life of perfect obedience and suffered the full penalty, but He gives fitness to all who believe on Him (1 Cor. 6: 11).

A Cunning Criminal was Hanged at Buffalo, N. Y., on May 21st. A year and a half ago, without the slightest provocation, he brutally murdered his wife, an industrious, affectionate woman, who earned a living for her family by washing. Her husband used to take her money from her to spend in liquor, and beat her if she had none to give him. He killed her in November, 1884, and though he was promptly caught, tried, and convicted, he succeeded, by a series of appeals, in deferring his punishment until last week. First he pleaded insanity, but the governor secretly sent two physicians to examine him, and they reported that it was only feigned. Then he announced that he had "got religion," and hoped, by the intercession of Christian people, to obtain mercy from the governor. With unblushing effrontery he declared that the Lord had told him that he would not be hanged. As late as May 18th, when he was told that there was no further hope for him, he said: "Yes, there is further hope; the Lord will not let them hang me." But he was hung, nevertheless. Evidently, therefore, any assurance he may have had that he would escape was not from the Lord. He is not the first scoundrel who has professed to have special communications from God. Like many other people who do not think what God has told them in His Word sufficient for them, he listened to his own imagination, and was deceived (Ezek. 13: 6-8).

MOUTH AND HEART.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."
—ROMANS 10: 9.

Paul's Compact Summaries—A Gospel of Faith—I. Intended for Lost Men—Not a Milder Law—A New Starting-Point—II. Concerned Only About Jesus—Contrast of Faith and Unbelief—The Completed Work—III. Has a Confession to Make—Why Confession is put First—Backstairs Religion—IV. Has a Comfort to Enjoy—The Comfort in the Resurrection—V. A Promise to Rest Upon—The Passiveness of the Promise—The Absolute Certainty.

PAUL's great work was saving souls. Whatever else he might be doing, he never forgot "by all means to save some." Whatever else he aimed at in his epistles, he always took care so to write that men might, by his teaching, be led to the Lord Jesus. He sought so to speak that troubled consciences might come to peace, through Jesus Christ his Lord, whom he loved so well. This is one of the reasons why he so often gives us weighty condensations of the Gospel, packing the truth together very closely. He knew that these are very useful, and so he prepared them for his brethren, as one provides for travellers portable meats or condensed milk. When the reader finds a compact sentence of this sort, he has met with a little Bible, a miniature Body of Divinity.

I wish to preach in the same spirit in which Paul wrote, aiming from my first word to my last at the conversion of any of you who have not yet known the Lord. I pray that we may all mean business at this time, and may get at it in downright earnest. May you be determined to come to the point, and no longer hesitate!

I. I shall want you to notice in our text, first, that the Gospel as Paul here sets it forth is and this Gospel of faith is evidently intended for lost men. Observe, he saith, "If thou shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." When Moses wrote the law, he spake upon obedience to the command as securing life; for he saith, "This do, and thou shalt live." It was presupposed by the law that those to whom the law came already possessed life; and the fulfilling of the law did but preserve them in the life which they already possessed. The Gospel comes to us under quite another aspect; it does not regard us as having life, but as needing that life.

WHAT SALVATION IS.

The Gospel comes to us not as to servants who need to be told how they are to continue to live; but as to dead sinners who need to be made to live, and then to be kept alive and preserved in happy and holy being. The Gospel saith not only that we shall live by it, but that we shall be saved by it, which promise goes much lower and further. When it is said that we shall "be saved," it implies that we have fallen into a lost, ruined, and undone condition, and out of this the Gospel is to rescue us.

Jesus comes to bring salvation. What a great word is that! The text says the believer shall "be saved"; saved is a little word for letters, but it is a great word for meanings. What is it to be saved? It means to be saved from the punishment of all your sins, saved from going down into the pit, saved from the blackness of darkness forever, saved from the everlasting wrath of the Most High, saved from the second death whose terror is the hell of hell. Whosoever confesseth the Lord Jesus and believeth that God hath raised him from the dead, shall be saved from the penal consequences of his guilt.

Better still, you shall be saved from sin itself. The criminality and guilt of it shall be removed; from its stain you shall be washed whiter than snow. The sin itself, that black cloud, as well as the tempest with which it is charged, shall be removed, even as it is written, "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins." We preach not only deliverance from the punishment, but deliverance from the crime itself—deliverance from the charge and accusation which else would lie against the transgressor. The sin shall be blotted out in the case of the believer, and he shall be forgiven and justified—justified from all things from which the law could never clear him.

What is more still, you shall not only be delivered from the punishment of sin and the guilt of sin, but from the power of sin. Oh, to be saved from sinning! This is our chief desire. If the guilt of sin could possible be put away, and we could still be left as much the slaves of sin as before, very little would have been done for us. It would be a doubtful blessing. To be made happy in sin would be dangerous to us and unworthy of God; but the Lord Jesus Christ has come to save His people from their sins, to break the chains of evil habit, to subdue sinful influences which now dominate us, and to put within us a new heart and a right spirit.

EMANCIPATION.

We preach emancipation for the slaves of sin. You that are worried and wearied with temptation shall be saved from yielding to it. You that cry out by reason of indwelling sin shall receive salvation from the power of evil. The living and holy seed within you cannot sin because it is born of God, and its growing force shall at last hold your every thought in captivity to Christ. It is a blessed salvation; an all-round salvation for the past, for the present, and for the future. This is what we are sent to testify; we could not have a more full or a more divine message, we could not have a grander blessing to present to the sons of men than that of being saved.

I begin, then, with the proclamation of salvation for the lost. Hear it, ye unworthy ones! Hear it, ye who cannot say a good word on your own account! Hear it and catch at this hope. If God the Spirit will bless the word, according to His gracious wont, you mourning and heavy-laden ones will joyfully cry, "There is a message for us in this text!"

CONCERNED ABOUT JESUS.

II. I now advance to my second point, which is this, that saving faith concerns itself only about Jesus Himself. True faith, the faith which saves, concerns itself wholly about the glorious person and gracious work of Him whom God raised from the dead. Within the compass of Bethlehem, Gethsemane, and the right hand of the Father lies the sphere of the sinner's faith. Faith is where Jesus is, and she asks no wider range. Unbelief is speculative, but faith deals with facts. Unbelief saith, "Who shall ascend into heaven? Who shall descend into the abyss?" Unbelief is always starting questions; she is so dissatisfied with the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ that she demands another Saviour, or no Saviour, or fifty Saviours. She does not know what she wants; her cry is, "Who will show us any good? Who in the heavens, who in the depths, who anywhere?" Unbelief has a very attentive ear to every new notion. This man has a novel doctrine, another has just ferreted out a fresh idea; and unbelief goes helter-skelter this way and that. She hears voices crying, "Lo here, and lo there!" and like a silly bird she is lured and snared.

Faith is of another mind; she takes her stand where Christ is, and she says, "if Salvation is anywhere it is in Him. Is it not written, 'Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is no one else'?" She bows before Jesus at Bethlehem, and sees hope in His incarnation. She traverses the fields of Judea with Jesus, and sees hope in the holy, tender-hearted lover of souls. She goes with Him to Gethsemane, and views Him covered with the bloody sweat, and begins to read her pardon there. She sees Him die upon the accursed tree, and she says, "My life is here; if ever I am saved, I must be saved here." She sees Jesus in the tomb, she watches and beholds Him rise again; and as He rises she claps her hands with delight, for she sees hope and immortality in Him. She looks up yonder to the throne of the Most High; she sees Jesus inter-ceding for transgressors that the Lord God may dwell among them; she understands that He is carrying on a noble enterprise which will soon be brought forth unto victory, and she glories in her Lord—her all.

THE QUEST OF UNBELIEF.

The faith which saves is not dreamy. Do you not notice how unbelief here dreams of skies and seas, and all immeasurable things? "Who shall ascend into heaven?" What a picture! Imagination is at work; she beholds her mighty merits scaling the everlasting ramparts—she doats upon her dream. If she hears a discourse she only cares for the oratory of it. "What a sermon that man preached! How full of poetry!" She must have something high and lofty; nothing commonplace will suit her. At another time, when she is heavy, her dream is of a wretched diver into the deep seas of anguish, plunging down into the abyss to find the pearl of peace. Imagination raises in the soul despondency, despair, frenzy and madness; and many foolish ones hope in these to find a ransom.

Faith has done with these Arabian nights, for she has done with Sinai. She dreams no more; for perfectly healthy men have done with dreams. With open eye faith reads facts. She dwells on what Jesus did and suffered. She reflects that He died, He rose again, and is gone into the glory. Facts, not fiction, are her solace. She accepts matters of history, not figments of imagination. Something actually done, something really accomplished, faith requires and accepts.

The fact is, all that can be done has been done. Why do you want to do what is already done? All that can be felt has been felt; why do you want to feel it? "It is finished," said Christ; why do you strive to do it over again? You want to feel; are not His feelings enough? You want to work; are not His workings enough? Trust in self is a disloyal attempt upon the crown rights of the Redeemer. All those doings, and willings, and feelings are a setting up of self-salvation. It is all a mistake. Oh that you would give up those mistakes, and hear that your soul may live, believing what you hear, and accepting it in your very soul! I will not, however, stay longer to describe this faith by contrast, but we will penetrate a stage further into the centre of the text.

III. The third point of our discourse is, that saving faith has

A CONFESSION TO MAKE:

"If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Observe here, that this confession is put first. I suppose it is because Paul was quoting from the thirtieth chapter of the Book of Deuteronomy, and he had, of course, to place the words as Moses arranged them in the passage quoted. Yet there must be other reasons. Possibly the confession of the Lord Jesus unto salvation is put first here because it is most likely to be forgotten. We have plenty of preaching of "Believe and live," and I do not condemn it; but still, strictly speaking, it is incomplete. Constantly in Scripture the faith to which salvation is promised is a faith which makes a confession of itself. It is never a dumb faith; it is a faith that speaks, a faith which owns its own existence; ay, a faith which owns the Lord in the teeth of adversaries.

The apostle mentions it first here because it is so often put into the background, and this is a great cause of stumbling. He mentions it first, also, because it is first as far as our fellow-creatures are concerned. How can I know what you believe in your heart? I must first hear what you confess with your mouth. An inquirer comes to me to join the Church, or to be acknowledged as a Christian; I cannot begin with his heart; I have no means of reading his thoughts. I say to him, "Speak, that I may see you." If he confesses with his mouth the Lord Jesus Christ, he has done what, in the order of practical religion, must lead the way toward friend and foe.

Let me add that, in a certain sense, confession with the mouth is actually first in the man. Many persons never receive in their hearts the comfort of Christ's resurrection, because they have never with their mouth confessed the Lord Jesus as their Saviour and Master. The Lord will not give to you the warmth of faith which cheers the heart unless you are willing to yield to Him the obedience of faith by taking up your cross and coming out and confessing Him. There are numbers of Christians—Christians I mean in the judgment of charity—who never enter into the joy of their Lord because they have never obeyed His rule, nor owned His name before men. I dare not preach to you for cowards, a secret green-lane of salvation, which winds about through the woods, so that you can travel it without being seen. No; at my Lord's bidding, I preach to you an open king's highway, along which the fearful and the unbelieving refuse to go. And yet there is only this one way to the kingdom. Let us follow Jesus in broad daylight. Jesus saith, "He that confesseth Me before men, him will I confess before My Father which is in heaven; but he that denieth Me"—which in that connection means, he that does not confess Me—"he that denieth Me before men, him will I deny before My Father which is in heaven." Hear, I pray you, the text: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."

Notice what it is that is to be confessed: "The Lord Jesus!" By which I gather that it is essential to salvation that a man confess the Deity of Christ. I would not be uncharitable to anybody, but I never can, as a believer in the Word of God, expect to see a man saved who denies the Godhead of his Saviour. He puts himself out of court, he rejects that part of the Redeemer's character which is essential to His being a Saviour. If any man would be saved he must believe that Jesus Christ is both Lord and God.

A VOCAL TESTIMONY.

Note how very definite is the confession. Somebody says, "Well, I will believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and I will try and act up to my faith." Do so by all means; but this will not fulfil the demand of the text. It is true your life is a confession, and the more pure it is the more excellent it is as a profession. Still, the doing of one duty does not exempt us from another. The confession required by the text is expressly said to be "with thy mouth." I dare not alter the Scripture. Do not blame me; I did not write the words. There they are: "If thou shalt with thy mouth confess the Lord Jesus." You are vocally to own Jesus; you are definitely and distinctly to say with your tongue, your mouth, your lips, that He is your Lord and Saviour. It is not to be an inference drawn in silence from your life, but a declared statement of the mouth. What other meaning can my text have but that?

Why is this? saith one. Well, first, because I believe that confession with the mouth is a sort of breaking away from the world. When a man says with his mouth, "I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," it is as good as saying to the world, "I have done with you." Those round about will conclude that the man has broken loose from his old habits, and has come right away from the unbelieving world. Dear seeker, you must stand out. You must come away from your old companions and sinful connections, and say, "I am for Christ. He is my Saviour, and I am His follower." He requires this confession of you that you may thus be cut loose from the world which lieth in the wicked one. Ah, my friends! this is a hard saying to some of you. You have good points about you, but you do not let your light shine before men, as your Lord commands you. Your candle is under a bushel; it cannot burn well in so confined a space; it is apt to make smoke and blackness. Bring it out at once!

IV. Time would fail me if I were to dwell longer on this point, important as it is. Let us now notice, in the fourth place, that faith has a great COMFORT TO ENJOY.

She has truth of which she must speak with her mouth; but she has also facts which she ponders in her heart. Why is salvation promised here especially to a belief with the heart that God hath raised Christ from the dead? Is not our faith to be fixed upon the death of Christ rather than upon the resurrection of Christ? I answer, it is probably here stated because in the resurrection of our Lord all the rest of his history is implied and included. If He was raised from the dead, then He must have died. If He died then, He must have been a man, and have been born into the world. In mentioning that God raised our Lord from the dead, the apostle has really mentioned all the great redeeming work of Jesus, since all the other items are involved therein.

Moreover, the resurrection of Christ from the dead is one of the chief of those truths which are to be believed in the heart, because it is the source of the heart's best comfort. "Look," says the believer, "I am by nature a poor lost sinner, but I shall not be destroyed forever, for Jesus my Saviour and Surety has been raised from the dead. My salvation lies in Him. I am delivered from the dead in Him. I see my justification in His resurrection. Because Jesus lives I have an unfailing friend, to whom I fly; because God raised Him from the dead, and so bare witness that He accepted Him, therefore I know that I am accepted in Him. If I lay hold upon that righteousness which God has accepted, I am accepted in it." Oh, dear friends, when a sinner knows that his salvation does not lie in himself at all, but wholly in Christ, then he discovers the great secret.

V. So now I finish with the truth that faith has

A PROMISE TO REST UPON.

"If thou believest in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." "Thou." Who is that? This is thyself. It is the man who with his mouth confesses, and with his heart believes. Dear friend, it means you. Did I hear you cry, "I have no merits of my own; I have no good feelings; I have nothing of my own that I can rejoice in; I feel myself to be utterly lost"? Listen! "If thou shalt with thy mouth confess the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." The singular pronoun, "thou," sets its mark upon you. Put thine ear to this telephone; a voice speaks to thee. God out of heaven is speaking straight down the telephone into thine ear—"thou shalt be saved."

There is a sort of

about the expression "be saved." The text does not speak about what you are going to do, but about something that is to be done for you and done in you: "Thou shalt be saved." "I cannot save myself"—who said you could? Who asked you to do so? Thou canst with thy mouth confess the Lord Jesus—do that straight away. Thou canst believe in thy heart that God hath raised Him from the dead. If thou be the man I am looking after, thou art doing so now. Thou sayest, "Oh, yes, I believe it with all my heart; my hope lies in Jesus." Then thou shalt be saved.

I have the same confidence concerning the poorest old woman in this house as I have about myself; if she confesses and believes, she is saved as I am. The wickedest ruffians and most wanton harlots, if they will do as the text directs, shall also be saved. This Gospel is not denied to the vilest of the vile. Oh, my friend, it is not denied to you. This is the ship which has carried thousands to heaven. We who go on board shall get to heaven by it. If it could go down, we should all sink together; but as it floats safely, we will all sail together to the Fair Havens. There is no second vessel on this line; and there is no other line. This one chartered barque of salvation by a confessing faith now lies at the quay. Come on board! Come on board at once! God help you to come on board at this very moment, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE INQUISITION IN MEXICO.*

THE chronicler, Ventancurt, writes with pious joy: "The Tribunal of the Inquisition, the strong fort and mount of Zion, was founded in the city of Mexico in the year 1571," and later, he adds: "They have celebrated general and particular autos de la fé with great concourse of dignitaries, and in all cases the Catholic faith and its truth have remained victorious". . . . The brasero, brazier, or burning place whereon the decrees were executed, was a short distance eastward of the Church of San Diego. It was a square platform with wall and terrace arranged for the erection of stakes to which the condemned living or dead were fastened to be burned. Being raised in a large open space, the spectacle could be witnessed by the entire population of the city. When the ceremony was ended, the ashes were thrown into the marsh that then was in the rear of the Church of San Diego. . . . The first auto da fé in New Spain was celebrated in the year 1574; as its result, as is mentioned with much satisfaction by the chronicler, there perished "twenty-one pestilent Lutherans." From this time onward until the Inquisition was suppressed these ceremonies were of very frequent occurrence, taking place annually for several years in succession. Frequent though they certainly were, and large though the number of those who perished in them undoubtedly was, the number of those actually burned to death was comparatively small. In the majority of cases, even when the body of the offender was burned, grace was shown in first granting death by strangulation. Thus, in the memorable auto da fé of April 10th, 1649, when fifteen persons perished, only one who had cursed the "holy office" and the Pope, was burned alive. The remaining fourteen were burned after strangulation. When the Liberal Constitution of 1812 was adopted in Spain, the end of the Inquisition began. One of the first reforms introduced by the Cortes was the decree by which the "holy office" was suppressed throughout Spain and the Spanish dependencies. This decree was promulgated in Mexico on the eighth of the ensuing June, and by proclamation of the viceroy the property of the Inquisition was declared forfeited to the Royal treasury. But with the overthrow of the Liberal Constitution in Spain, and the return to the throne of Ferdinand VII., the decree of suppression was rescinded, and the "holy office" once more possessed its property and resumed its work. This re-erection was only for a short time. In 1820 a decree was promulgated in Mexico, by which the Inquisition was suppressed forever. There is a sort of poetic fitness in the fact that the last years of the Inquisition in Mexico were spent in combating strenuously the spread of Liberalism; that the last notable auto da fé, November 26th, 1815, was that at which the accused was the patriot, Morelos. The finding against him was a foregone conclusion. The Inquisitors declared him "an unconfessed heretic, an abettor of heretics, and a disturber of the ecclesiastical hierarchy"; a profaner of the holy sacraments; a traitor to God, to the King, and to the Pope." For which sins he was condemned to do penance in a penitent's dress, and was surrendered to the tender mercies of the secular arm. He was shot, December 22d, 1815. But it was the Inquisition that died.

PRAISE ON THE BATTLEFIELD.*

A Western captain, as he lay on the battlefield of Shiloh, suffered greatly from a gun-shot wound through both thighs, and from thirst. He said: "The stars shone out clear and beautiful above the dark field, and I began to think of that great God who had given His Son to die a death of agony for me, and that He was up there—up above the field of suffering and those glorious stars; and I felt that I was going to meet Him and praise Him there; and I felt that I ought to praise Him now, even wounded on the battlefield. I could not help singing that beautiful hymn, 'When I can read my title clear.' There was a Christian brother wounded in the brush near me. I could not see him, but I could hear him. He took up the strain, and beyond him another and another caught it up all over the terrible field of Shiloh. That night the echo was resounding, and we made the battlefield ring with the hymns of praise to God." Sing in your families, and other hearts and other households will catch the song, and be cheered by it, and the praise of God shall resound over all earth's battlefield.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT EDINBURGH.

THE International Industrial Exhibition in Edinburgh, a picture of which is given above, was opened on May 6th by Prince Albert Victor, son of the Prince of Wales. The building contains one hundred and twelve thousand feet of space, and the total cost is $150,000. The exhibition consists of permanent and temporary buildings, and the former will be presented to the town at the close of the exhibition for use as a museum. The entrance is embellished with groups of statuary illustrative of Industry, those on the right representing Science, and on the left Art. The dome, which is one hundred feet in height, is surmounted by a statue of Minerva. In the centre of the grand hall is a colossal statue of the Scottish hero Wallace, nineteen feet high. The Art galleries occupy ten courts, five on each side of the great hall.

There are altogether over two thousand exhibitors, and the total sum realized as rent for space is $60,000.

One side of the Court is devoted to a splendid exhibit got up by Lady Aberdeen to show Irish lace and various other Irish manufactures, such as poplin, and a number of Irish peasant girls are to be employed in the manufacture of lace during the exhibition.

CELIA OWEN'S PLEDGE.

"To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some" (1 Cor. 9: 22). The passage came in the ordinary course of Bible reading that Celia Owen was pursuing in her morning devotions. To "save some"—that was her own earnest desire. She had not dared to call herself a Christian more than a few weeks, but the intense happiness that filled her heart made her yearn for service. If she might only be the means of leading some into the light, she could conceive of no greater joy than that. At the moment she did not see any special connection between weakness and the achievement, but the spirit of the apostle and his all-absorbing desire for the rescue of the perishing awoke an echo in her soul.

"What a roaring, ranting demagogue that fellow is that they have got to speak down at the mission chapel!" said Celia's father at the breakfast-table an hour afterward. "I went to David's house last night to give him some instructions about the work, and they told me he had gone to the temperance meeting at the Mission; so I followed him and heard the tail-end of the oration. I think he noticed me, for he was very severe on rich people who drink wine. His remarks would not apply to any one else in the room. He evidently thought I was a most abandoned fellow, in danger of dying drunk in a ditch. It was kind of him to warn me, but as I have lived fifty years without ever being intoxicated, I think there will be no danger in my continuing my modest glass of wine to the end of the chapter."

Mrs. Owen smiled affectionately at her husband. "No, dear," she said, "you are in no danger. Very likely the man is a low fellow, who never drank a glass of wine in his life. Did David seem impressed? Teetotalism would be a good thing for him, and you would be relieved if you knew that you had a sober and reliable foreman."

"Yes; I wish he would become an abstainer," said Mr. Owen. "He is the best foreman I ever had—a thoroughly smart man; but when he goes on a drunk he is of no use for a week, and he always does it just when he can be least spared. He is an extraordinary fellow—strong, robust, common-sense, and as firm as a rock in other things; but a glass of lager makes him as silly and foolish as a child."

"I should like to go to the Mission to-night, papa," said Celia, "if you have no objection."

"No, I have no objection, Celia. I do not think you will feel comfortable, though. They are rather a rough lot down there. Do you feel afraid of falling under 'the drink curse,' as the orator calls it? Do not let him scare you."

It was not a Christian home. Mr. Owen was a successful man—self-made, not refined, but shrewd and practical, a good husband and a good father, but without any sympathy for Celia's newly-found joy, which seemed to him mere fanaticism.

As Celia walked down to the Mission that night the passage she had read in the morning recurred to her. She knew perfectly that there was no danger of her ever becoming a drunkard; but did not the spirit of the Apostle suggest that in taking upon herself the restraint that was a necessary safeguard to others she would be becoming as weak that she might save the weak?

Her entrance caused some remark from the villagers, all of whom knew her, and many of whom were in her father's employ. Her presence was accepted as a mark of friendliness, and Celia was more popular than before, if that were possible. She listened attentively to the speech of the orator, and though there were many things said which grated on her refined taste, she prayed silently that his words might be blessed to his hearers.

"Now," said the lecturer in conclusion, "we will sing the doxology, and then I want you to come and sign the pledge."

All rose to sing, but Celia's attention was distracted by a conversation going on behind her. Two brothers were standing there, and the younger was pleading with his brother to go up with him and sign. Celia turned, and as she knew Tom Hargood, she added her persuasion to his brother's.

"I guess I can take care of myself without the pledge," he said. "You ain't a teetotaler, are you, miss?"

"No," said Celia, "but I will sign now, if you will. Come, we will all go up together."

Tom was not proof against the offer of walking up the room with Miss Owen and signing with her, and he politely accompanied her. There was a cheer as the people saw who it was that was stooping over the pledge-book, and David, her father's foreman, who was leaving the Mission, turned to see what it was about. He looked on in amazement, and stood wonderingly fixed to the spot when Celia passed near him on her way out.

"O David, is that you?" she said, offering her hand. "Have you signed?"

"No, miss; I don't feel like it. I hear you have signed. What did you do it for?"

"Oh, it is not much for me to give up! I thought I would do it to encourage some to whom it would be more difficult."

"Well, Miss Owen, if a lady like you takes that much interest in us poor fellows, it's some encouragement. I'll sign."

"Will you? I am glad of that, David. I will go with you," and Celia placed her hand on the rough coat-sleeve and walked by his side with the grace of a lady entering a ball-room leaning on the arm of some dashing cavalier. The signature was affixed, and Celia gave him a hearty shake of the hand that made David feel a proud man.

"I'll keep it, miss," he said. "It ought to ha' been done long ago. It wouldn't ha' been done now, though, but for you; I believe you've made a man of me."

Celia Owen's Proposal.

"That is good to hear, David; I will come and see you in a day or two, and you will tell me how you are getting on."

"Thank you, miss; I expect it'll be rather a hard fight."

The reformation of the foreman was not the only gratifying result of Celia's visit to the Mission. A few days afterward Mrs. Hargood came to the house to inquire for her.

"I've called to thank you, Miss Owen," she said, "for getting my Tom to sign the pledge. You didn't know his father, but Tom is the very image of him—just his ways, and all. He was a good husband in everything but the drink, and that ruined him first and killed him afterward. Tom was just beginning to take a glass, like his father did at first, just to be sociable, and I was dreadful scared for him, for it's in his blood. You've done more for me than if you'd given me all your father's fortune; God in heaven bless you for it!"

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Dreaded Separation.

FRITZ was not the only member of the little mission party who disliked any allusion to the expected arrival of the bride. Juliet made no mention in her diary of any struggle with her own heart, but that there had been one it was easy to perceive. Years ago the suggestion that she should marry a Moravian missionary would have excited something not unlike scorn in the gay, worldly girl. But circumstances had changed as she had changed. The life of a Christian teacher, noble in its self-denying service, appeared to her now the highest type of life; and apart from that, for Fritz personally she had come to entertain a warm affection—how warm she did not know until Sister Anna's news had been imparted to her, that a request had been sent home to the Moravian community for a lady to be sent out who would be willing to become a wife to Fritz. Then Juliet realized what her own heart had not revealed to her before, and she suffered in silence. Still she went on with her new duties with apparent cheerfulness, as her diary showed.

"January 2d.—Fritz has not resumed giving me lessons in the Esquimaux language. This is to me a little disappointment, for I enjoyed them so much. The pastor asked Fritz to-day if I continued to be a good pupil; 'Miss Erle learned a great deal during my absence,' was Fritz's reply; 'her lessons are taken now in Esquimaux huts.' I took this as a hint that I need not regard him any longer as my teacher.

"When the bride comes I must go; there is no room here for us both. I must embark in the Harmony at once, and visit the other stations at which the vessel will touch, ere she steers her course homeward. How foolish it is to feel a little disheartened at writing down these words 'no room'! I have perhaps been beginning to feel myself necessary, and all the time I have been putting Fritz to great inconvenience; I have not only deprived him of a room, but I have quietly taken possession of all his little treasures, bookcase, pictures, thermometer, table and chair; he has no place in which to put them; he has actually to sleep in the kitchen!

"I felt gratified to-day by Anna's saying, 'I never looked forward with so little delight to the arrival of the Harmony as I do this year; for it will take my dear daughter Juliet from me.'

"You will have another daughter—I hope a better one," said I.

"Ah! new friends will never make me forget the old," said dear kind Anna. "How often I shall think of you in your own homes! I ought not to regret your going, for you will have more to make you happy there."

"I am not sure of that," I replied, and I meant what I said; yet I spoke in the depth of a Labrador winter, fed and clothed by charity, with nothing that could be called amusement, and not a relative near! What a mystery happiness is! I think that it is like the rainbow in this, that it does not rest upon earth.

"February 1st.—I have been ill and have suffered much. I returned one day from the Esquimaux huts, not aware that I had sustained any harm from going out in the cold, though I had forgotten to lower my veil. On entering the house, I was instinctively hurrying toward the fire. Fritz caught me by the arm. I was startled by the distressed, alarmed expression on his face.

"Miss Erle, do not go near the fire; you are frost-bitten!" he exclaimed. He darted out, without waiting to put on cap or thick gloves, and returned with his hands full of snow. This was to rub on my frost-bitten face. But for the prompt measures taken I might have returned home a disfigured, pitiable object indeed, if I had returned at all. As it was, much inflammation and consequent fever ensued. Now, thank God! I am perfectly well; no trace remains of the frost-bite.

"I have been thinking of the parallel between Fritz's warning and that given to me by Maria. She saw—what I felt not at the time—the effect of the deadly atmosphere of selfishness, worldliness, utter forgetfulness of God which I was then breathing. She spoke to me tenderly, guardedly, not abruptly like Fritz. And her words, though all too little heeded at the time, have sunk deeply—oh, how deeply into my heart! Would it not have been cruel in Fritz, if from a mere shrinking from giving me pain, or seeming discourteous, he had not almost thrust me back from the fire which would have inflamed the frost-bite? Oh, our selfishness, our cruelty, in seeing the peril of souls, and giving no warning! Yet how I would shrink from speaking to Dora, Cecilia, or even Gertie! God give me courage to be faithful; I have no courage of my own.

"March 1st.—Fritz called me out to-day to see a pretty sight, such as perhaps never before met the eye of a city girl.

"'You must see a family party,' he cried, 'a spectacle worth beholding. Labrador has its exhibitions as well as other places.'

"'Certainly a curious exhibition it was! Five families of seals, fathers, mothers, fat, oily little babies, most sociably basking together on the shore, yet not exactly together, for each family was a little apart. Fritz told me that the juvenile seals had never yet tried the water.

"'It would be rare fun to see them all take their first swimming-lesson!' I cried.

"'I suspect that not all will ever enjoy their icy plunge,' observed Fritz; 'the helpless creatures have too watchful enemies in the wolf and the bear.'

"'I have never seen Bruin yet,' I observed. 'How odd to live all these months in the White Bear's Den, without once catching a glimpse of my host!'

"'I have no wish that you should see him,' said Fritz, 'unless it were at safe distance, he sailing on a raft of drift ice, with a mile of water between you and him.'

"Spring, delicious spring, has returned; the icy fetters are breaking, the world is rejoicing; birds, beasts, flowers, all revive! The sun has melted the snow, and where a dead shroud wrapped nature, waters sing their murmuring song as they glance in the sunlight. 'The larch hangs its tassels forth;' the willow-bush is 'gosling clad.' How green are the mosses, how bright the flowers! I never thought that Labrador could look so gay. Each day I carry to Anna some new floral treasure, though she now can seek them herself. There is the scarlet poppy, gay as in our fields, potentillas, and gentians. I am delighted to welcome even dandelions and chickweed, familiar to us from childhood; but the richest vegetable treasures here are the endless varieties of mosses, lichens, and grasses.

"But oh, the birds, the birds! what multitudes are arriving from the south! The air seems full of the whirring of countless wings. Welcome to the doves, welcome to the auks! I have seen a regular stream of these, hundreds, thousands, skimming a little way above the green earth. One cannot help laughing at the puffins that burrow under earth, for at the entrance of each hole stands a plump little sentinel on guard, whilst one can hear the funny voices of the family rising from the subterranean nursery under one's feet. The sea is swarming both with birds and with fish; I shall never remember the names of them all.

"Our Esquimaux friends have been having a regular harvest-time lately. Some time ago the women put out in their oomiak, a boat for fishing, belted and booted, with close-fitting dresses, more suited for convenience than grace. I saw Lena plying her oar with as much vigor as any; she left her little puffin under my charge. The men go fishing in kayaks, boats very long and light; each fisher goes alone, with no companion in the boat but his harpoon and spear. The Esquimaux pushes on in his light craft where the shoal of dolphins tumble and leap, where the porpoise shows its back above the briny waves, and the seals bask on floes of unmelted ice. The sea-harvest has been uncommonly good this year; plenty prevails; a good store of oil and abundance of skins are laid up, some for winter consumption, and some for barter.

"May 11th.—I am afraid that I let out a secret to-day; yet it could not long have remained a secret, as the missionary ship is expected to arrive in July. The Esquimaux women have lately had a way of looking at me and smiling at each other, which, I scarcely know why, gives me a little feeling of embarrassment. Lena this morning, caressing my hand, said half playfully and half shyly, 'And when is the wedding to be?' 'Do you mean the Missionary Fritz's?' I said. The women around glanced at each other, and began to laugh; so I said quickly, 'The wedding will be when his bride arrives in the ship.' The laughter instantly ceased, and an expression of blank surprise was on every face. Somehow I felt uncomfortable, and left the igloo at once."

Juliet's news had indeed been like a touch to a house built of cards, destroying an edifice of pleasant speculations which the good people in the igloes had been amusing themselves by raising during the winter. The kindly, pretty young lady had become highly popular with the natives, and when they thought that she would remain among them as the wife of their much-loved and honored missionary, their wish had been father to the thought. Public opinion (such public opinion as existed at Eschol) had settled that the two favorites of the little population were exactly suited for each other. Fritz's unknown, and therefore unwelcomed bride, would come at some disadvantage among a people who had been for months calculating on an arrangement which in their eyes was most satisfactory. But let us now return to Juliet's journal.

"The people bring in quantities of feathers of various kinds, and we have more eggs than we can possibly eat. Of the feathers Sister Anna is beginning to construct two couvre-pieds, which are to be wonderful specimens of Labrador art. I believe that they are destined as wedding presents for Fritz's bride. The making of these is to the dear Moravian a very important affair, and will, I believe, occupy all her leisure hours, for every individual feather must be carefully fastened down. The sewing Anna can almost do by feeling, but for the selecting of shades and colors my eyes and taste are in requisition. One piece of work is to have a border of diamonds of silvery down, the other one of stars of variegated hue. The work is very amusing, and the couvre-pieds will be deliciously soft and warm. Moss baskets are also to be made to hold our flowers; the house will look quite gay.

"We can do but little mission-work when the majority of our people are afloat on the sunny waters, but still we keep up our little school. We often sing hymns of praise as we work. Fritz has prepared a tiny garden, but only the seeds of such plants can be sown as will rapidly spring up, for the Labrador summer, though bright and warm, is very short. We hope to have the rare treat of cabbages for the wedding.

"May 12th.—To-day Anna and I were amongst our feathers, and Fritz on the floor a little behind us, dividing packets of seeds, for the Esquimaux are to have some. Good Pastor Wilhelm came in and sat down, with that twinkling expression in his gray eyes which, with him, always precedes some harmless jest.

"Samson offered me a grand present to-day," he said, addressing himself to me: "you know Samson, Sister Juliet, the strong, big fellow with broad shoulders and a scar across his nose. That man is a Labrador hero; his harpoon was the death of a whale, and had Samson not been a Christian, this feat would have procured for him the doubtful privilege of taking a second wife."

"What was his present?" I asked.

"Why, the horn of a narwhal, a most splendid bit of sea-ivory, nearly six feet long, spirally striated from base to point, an ornament for a museum. I really could not accept a thing of such value. Samson looked disappointed, poor fellow, at my not taking his gift. "Well," said I, "you know we're going to be having a wedding when the Harmony comes, suppose that you present your ivory walking-stick to the bride." Samson looked at me with a satirical expression in his slits of eyes. "Is she lame, or so old that she needs a stick?" said he. Pastor Wilhelm leant back on his chair and laughed; but Fritz, whose presence he had not noticed, rose abruptly and left the house. I had to gather up a good many of the seeds which he had dropped on the floor.

"Wilhelm," said Sister Anna to her good-man, "I wish that you would not repeat such things when Fritz is in the room."

"I never saw him," said the kind-hearted Pastor.

"It must be rather an anxious matter to him, this marriage," observed Sister Anna, "as he knows nothing of his future partner."

"I am certain that God will give Fritz a good wife!" I exclaimed. I was on my knees, picking up the seeds.

"Yes, I do believe it—I must believe it—so good, so noble as he is, thinking of every one but himself. But why is there a secret misgiving in my heart; why do I almost dread the first sight of her in whose hands will lie the earthly happiness of one who is to me as a brother? If Fritz Edelstein were indeed my brother, I could not take a keener interest in his welfare. His wife will not be worldly, no, for she is a Moravian. Brave she must be, and strong in faith, or she would hardly venture here. But she may be unattractive—vulgar. But why should I feel a care? I can make the matter a subject of prayer—prayer how constant, how earnest!

"The Pastor will not hear of my going away before the wedding. 'The Harmony,' he says, 'will assuredly anchor for twenty-four hours off Eschol; she has to land stores, and make barters, and we always expect a visit from the captain. Fritz will sleep in her cabin, and his betrothed will share Sister Juliet's room. The wedding will be on the following day, when the captain and crew will be present. We'll have a right joyful wedding.' Heaven grant that it may be joyful, even though the day be to me one of parting.

"Sister Anna and I are to deck the chapel with flowers and moss, the Esquimaux women helping. I must have some present for the bride. I have rings and chains, but of what use would they be to a Moravian! Fritz has a talent for mechanics, and has put my little gold watch to rights; it is not much the worse for its plunge into the sea. Yes, his wife shall wear it.

"Time seems now to speed fast! Perhaps in two months the Harmony will be here; she has to call at other places on the way. The Esquimaux can hardly talk or think of anything but their fisheries, and the expected arrival of the missionary ship. Even the children begin to scan the horizon, and mistake distant icebergs for sails. Fritz is the only person who never alludes to the expected arrival; perhaps he thinks of it all the more."

Juliet Erle awoke on the morning after the day on which the last entry was written, peaceful and cheerful. She threw open her little window to let in the beams of the sun; there was sunshine, too, in her round of daily duties, which were more and more becoming pleasures. How sweet sounded Juliet's voice in the morning service in the little chapel! how well she played the tiny harmonium! how gentle and kindly was her manner to the children who pressed around her, eager to attract her attention!

Sister Anna had resumed her place at the head of the breakfast-table, but it was Juliet who filled the cups. Conversation flowed more pleasantly than usual. The Pastor had a fund of anecdotes, and if he did not always produce fresh ones, no one gave the good man a hint that his story had been heard before. A few little household duties followed, in which Juliet bore her part; then came school teaching, followed by reading and working at home. The dinner hour was early, and left a wide margin for a nice saunter before the sun should set.

JESUS, THE BREAD OF LIFE.

S. S. Lesson for June 6, John 6:22-40. Golden Text, verse 34. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Wrong Motives in Seeking—Expecting Temporal Benefits—Material Conception of Christ's Kingdom—Asking Bread from Heaven—The Universal Craving—Satisfied in Christ—The Two Sides of God's Dealing—The Bread that Gives Immortality—The Incorruptible Seed—The Spiritual Flesh and Blood.

JESUS was not left long in quiet. The multitude which had been miraculously fed, had witnessed the departure of the disciples by ship across the lake, and they had seen that Jesus was not with them. Yet He was not on their side the lake, and, rightly judging that where His disciples were, there was the likeliest place to find Him, they took ship to seek Him. Their first question was, "Rabbi, when comest thou hither?" Nothing was to be gained by satisfying their curiosity, and He, yearning for their souls, said, "Ye seek Me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled. Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for Him hath God the Father sealed." "Because ye did eat of the loaves!" Poor human nature; how it jumps at an easy way of getting rid of the curse! It would be most convenient to have Jesus serve their purpose and minister to their temporal wants! Many who hear of divine healing think, "What a convenient thing it would be to be healed in a moment of any and every kind of suffering, and no doctor's bill to pay!" Their real conception is to make use of God for their personal convenience, and to have His almighty power at their disposal. And they are sorely disappointed when they find that in order to a life of continuously answered prayer, they must be given up to God, not God given up to them; they must serve His purpose, not He theirs.

He had already taught His disciples that His meat was to do the will of Him that sent Him. The people saw that they were on a wrong tack, and asked Him, "What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" Jesus answered and said unto them, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." Why did they not? Who but God could have furnished the provision on the mountain-side? What room had they for doubt? But their hearts were set on a reigning Messiah. The same spirit which, in their forefathers, had said to Samuel, "Now make us a king to judge us like all the nations" (1 Sam. 8:5), was now in them, longing for earthly power and prestige. Jesus would not be made a king, how, then, could He be the One who should reign over the house of Jacob forever (Luke 1:33)? They had their own ideas of an earthly kingdom, prophecy was on their side, but they did not see that Christ's was to be also a spiritual kingdom, and that He was to be a suffering Messiah. For want of knowing both sides of Scripture, instead of believing in Him, they doubted. It is from narrow, partial views of God, and partial knowledge of His Word that unbelief often arises in our day.

"They said, therefore, unto Him, What sign shonest Thou then that we may see and believe Thee? what dost Thou work?" What a question! Had He not been healing the sick, and furnishing food for five thousand men? Did this go for nothing? Was not His teaching something beyond that of all the teachers of the day? How came it that when such signs were before their very eyes, they were like men whose eyes were blinded? They could not quite get over the miracle of the loaves; they said, "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them to eat." And whence came the bread which they had eaten yesterday at His hand, if it was not also bread from heaven? But Jesus sought to lead them beyond external things. He said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world." Truly "the bread of God," Christ in us, satisfies God. "In whom I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17). In the sweet savor offerings Jesus is typified as the Bread of God" (Lev. 3:11, 16; Revised Version, margin 21:6, 8, 17, 21, 22). Not know the force of what they said, they replied, "Lord, ever more give us this bread." To the Samaritan woman He had said, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst," and now He says, "I am the Bread of Life; he that cometh to Me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst." God has so ordered it that He Himself should be the Complement of man, and that man without Him should be always unfilled, unsatisfied. A man's life without God is always on the stretch after an impossible something. Whether this hunger is the vain desire to know the future, like the ancient astrologers; whether it is the wild idea of turning everything into gold, like the old alchemists; whether it is the equally wild idea of an elysium by dividing up capital, there is a hunger, a need, a craving for something beyond, which God alone can satisfy.

In the Church of God itself, how much there is of hunger which is unsatisfied—hunger for spiritual self-satisfaction, thirst for a conscious, felt holiness, for a power which can be gloried in, and which will carry all before it—but nothing of all this is Jesus Himself. When, however, we have taken Him as our All in All, our Life, and our Bread to sustain that life, the Source of all blessing, all power, all wisdom, all joy, the one Resting-place of our hearts, when we cease to expect from ourselves or from others what only He can give, and what only He can be, then everything is changed. The old wretched hunger, the dissatisfaction with ourselves, with others, and with everything, gives way to an intense, quiet, deep

SATISFACTION IN HIM.

The circumstances may be all wrong, but He controls them; we ourselves may be all wrong, but He who is with us, and within us, is at hand to put all right; we may be perplexed, and, like Jehoshaphat, may know not what to do (11 Chron. 20:12), but perfect Wisdom is Master of the situation, and we cannot have the old despair while we are believing in Him for all. The people said to Jesus, "Give us this Bread." He answered, "I am the Bread of life," but must needs add, "But I said unto you that ye also have seen Me, and believe not. All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me, and him that cometh to Me, I will in nowise cast out."

Here are the two sides; the secret of His own, whom the Father, has given to Him, known only to Him and to His Father, but also the open declaration, "Him that cometh to Me I will in nowise cast out." We have only to do with the latter, and to rejoice and praise Him that none who come to Him, whatever the errand on which they come, will be cast out. And this is His Father's will as much as His, "For I came down from heaven," he says, in reference to this very thing, "not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me." There are many who will come to a meeting, or come to talk with Christian friends, or come to read a religious book, who yet do not come face to face with God. But the promise is "Him that cometh to Me, I will in nowise cast out," and "He shall never hunger." Our blessed Lord goes on to show how the bread which God sent from heaven to His people in the desert only sustained natural life—"Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead;" but there is a life which the death of the body cannot touch, which is eternal as God's own life. "He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life. . . . This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. . . . If any man eat of this bread he shall live forever." Thank God, eternal life bridges the grave. He that hath everlasting life may be severed from the body, but that life which bridges the grave lives on and is unaffected by the change.

When Jesus said, "The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world," the Jews, instead of coming to Him for an explanation, did just what men do nowadays—they held a debate over it, and tried to explain a spiritual phenomenon according to natural law: "How can this man give us His flesh to eat?" Had they been filled with the Spirit, His explanation would have been vividly clear to them, "As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me." How did Jesus live by His Father? When he had fasted forty days and forty nights, He declared, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4); "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me" (John 4:34); "The Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works" (John 14:10).

By these words we see how Jesus depended upon His Father who dwelt in Him, for strength of body and of soul. He was always drawing life from Him, and never for an instant depended upon Himself. And just as we take in food for the nourishment of our bodies, so, in our every need, we may take in Jesus. The flesh, the carnal principle in us, must die (our old man is crucified with Christ), all other flesh but His must die, and His nature must supersede ours: all other blood but His must be poured out ("the life of the flesh is in the blood," Lev. 17:11), that His blood which is His life, and His flesh which is His nature, may take the place of ours. The soul which is transformed by the life of Jesus lives through death, the body which has been transfigured by Christ's life coming into it, must be raised again at the last day; an has been sown there which must fructify and which cannot cease to be. This is why Jesus so insists here on the resurrection. He says, "This is the Father's will which hath sent Me, that of all which He hath given Me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. And this is the will of Him that sent Me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day. . . . No man can come to Me, except the Father which hath sent Me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day. . . . Whoso eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." His flesh could not see corruption, and all which is of Christ within us is immortal. When, at the Lord's table, we do spiritually eat the flesh of Christ, and spiritually drink His blood, we are outwardly acknowledging our faith in this blessed truth that Jesus is indeed the life of our life. "Many of His disciples went back (from Jesus), and walked no more with Him" when they heard these truths. And it is so even now. How many are willing to accept Jesus as far as it suits them, who yet have never learned to lose their own lives, their own self, that He may take the place.

"I AM WITH YOU ALWAYS."

'Tis sweet to read the promise He hath given
To cheer our hearts along the pilgrim way,
But sweeter far to know His blest fulfillment,
And humbly walk with Jesus day by day.

To walk with Jesus! who shall tell the gladness
Of those whose daily life the Master shares?
Who hear His voice, so full of love and pity,
And rest on Him their burdens and their cares.

And this is mine—the joy of knowing Jesus,
And walking in the sunlight of His smile;
Mine is the peace that floweth like a river,
Deeper and broader growing all the while.

No more a transient guest my Saviour cometh,
To bless me but awhile and then depart;
But with me now He evermore abideth,
And with His own glad presence fills my heart.

Sometimes, when busy with my daily labor,
Yet thinking of the mighty love He bore,
Some precious promise unto me He giveth,
Oft-read, perhaps, but never mine before.

I know not why He gives His choicest blessings
To one so undeserving of His love;
But, since He calls, with willing feet I hasten,
Content and glad to hear Him say, "Well done."

Content to walk in paths of His own choosing,
Since He will hold my hand along the way;
Content to know that I am journeying homeward,
And brighter grows the pilgrim's path each day.

How to See Jesus with Fulness of Joy and Peace.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

This precious book has been the means of comfort to many a weary soul, and hoping that many more may be led to read its sweet exhortations, we give a few out of the many commendations we have received. A new edition has just been printed, and we send it forth earnestly hoping that it may be even more blessed in its ministrations than the former ones.

"I have been fifty years a member of the Presbyterian Church. Your 'How to See Jesus' has helped me to a better understanding of some things, and to a deeper interest in the Scriptures. Your words are so plain and simple that they come at once to the heart as food in season."—E. T., Utica, N. Y.

"I have read 'How to See Jesus' with much joy; it brings so much help to me."—Oakland, California.

"I find in 'How to See Jesus' just the reading we invalids need."—M. M., Earlville, N. Y.

"How to See Jesus" is such a good book I want it to be comforting many who need it."—Holyoke, Mass.

"While in Des Moines, Iowa, I found your book 'How to See Jesus.' I have thought many times since the good Lord must have led me to it, as I found in it just the comfort I needed. It will be a benefit to many of my friends; have decided to make them a present of it; so please send me twelve."

"Thanks for the precious book 'How to See Jesus.' I have never read a book that has done me any more good."—S. A., Colorado.

"Many thanks for calling my attention to 'How to See Jesus.' I find it grandly helpful."—W. J., South Pueblo, Col.

"Next to the Bible, the best book I ever saw."—W. E., Maine.

"I cannot tell you how pleased I am with 'How to See Jesus.' It seems written for me, and I take great comfort from it."—Newfoundland.

"I find 'How to See Jesus' very instructive. As I read I personate the person spoken to. My trouble is not worldliness, but a fearful heart. This suits my case exactly."—L. G., N. Salem, N. Y.

"Words seem inadequate to express my deep sense of obligation to you for your precious book."—F. I., New York.

"I think I will get more real help, just the kind I need, from 'How to See Jesus.'"—Mrs. J. L., Indianapolis, Ind.

"I am much pleased with 'How to See Jesus,' and instructed. Your style holds attention without weariness—good for invalids."—C. W., Mass.

"If you were to get all the words of thanks and combine them together, you would not then get half the true feelings of my heart for that precious book, 'How to See Jesus.' I feel that you have been to me what Great Heart was to the Pilgrims, cheering and showing them the way to the Celestial City."—E. A., Abbeville, S. C.

Heaven: My Father's House.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

It is often said we know nothing of heaven, but Jesus says, "All things that the Father hath are mine: the Comforter shall take of mine and show it unto you." True to his promise, from the day I knew the Lord, the Comforter began to show me heavenly things. What I freely received, He bade me freely give. The kind approvals here recorded increased my obligation, and not less my delight to share these joy-inspiring things with as many as I may. I pray God that each reader may find them his Lord's own revelations to himself.—Preface.

"I can surely say that, excepting my Bible, no book has ever done me so much good as 'Heaven: My Father's House.' After a day spent in the sick room trying to calm the fevered brain and ease the aching limbs, you cannot imagine with what eagerness I turn to that book for rest, and it never fails to bring it, and with it the prayer, 'Not as I will, O Father.'"—E. E., Iowa.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K's point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. Instead of recoiling from the inevitable destiny, we are led by this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—Rev. Dr. B. B. Hackett, Newton Theological Seminary.

"Full of pointed illustrations, fresh, vigorous writing; nothing dull; short, crisp sentences; the reader is borne on rapidly; the writer speaks as though his thoughts rushed upon him. A fulness of nature, and joy in life runs through it."—S. K. B.

"It is one of the most interesting books I have ever perused. I purpose that many of my friends and neighbors shall read it. No one can read it, certainly no Christian without profit."—Rev. E. Bridgman, Shanghai, China.

"I have read Mr. K's book with no small pleasure. It is full of thought, and there is much beauty both of sentiment and words; and no one will be weary of its chapters nor think them too many, nor too long."—Rev. Dr. Horatio Bonar, Edinburgh, Scotland.

"Pray accept my heartiest thanks for your sound common sense book on 'Heaven.' I seldom read any purely religious book except the Bible, but have read and re-read yours with growing satisfaction. It is the only book upon the subject I would recommend a friend to buy, after a good Bible. I wish every church member would read your 'Heaven,' for it would free his brain from so much popular nonsense."—Antioch, Syria.

THE "MANHATTAN" OF NEW YORK, 156 & 158 BROADWAY, Was organized in 1850, and has accumulated assets of nearly $11,000,000, with surplus of $2,250,000.

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."
This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary life plan. "It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win."

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.
This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN'S" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

For an example of the operation of this plan address the Company, giving your nearest age, and a statement will be sent to you.

PROMINENT among the noble band of self-sacrificing men who are laboring for Christ among the heathen is George Grenfell, whose portrait appears on the preceding page; one of the heroic crusaders of this nineteenth century, a man to do and dare anything in Christ's service; one of those examples of consecrated devotion which the world has seen and wondered at in every stage of its history. He is an earnest man for whom wealth and worldly honor have no charms, who has given himself, as hundreds of others are doing, unreservedly to the grand work of preaching the Gospel to the heathen. Leaving ease and comfort, and the prospect of riches and honor, he has abandoned the abodes of civilization to labor in the fatal climate of Africa, that he may preach the everlasting Gospel to savages as fierce and ruthless as the beasts that haunt their domains. All honor to the noble band among whom he has taken his stand; their glory will shine through all eternity ages after this world, and all its glory has passed away.

George Grenfell is now only thirty-seven years old, having been born in the little Cornish village of Sancreed, August 21st, 1849. His parents removed during his childhood to the manufacturing town of Birmingham, and there the boy was educated at King Edward's Grammar School. He was blessed with a godly father and mother, who were members of a Baptist church. It was at that church that George was converted in his boyhood and made a profession of his faith. He at once began work for Christ in the Sunday-school (see Illustration No. 1 on first page). After leaving school a situation was procured for him in a house in London engaged in the export trade. There for a brief period he worked among the boxes and bales of the firm (see Illustration No. 2), "diligent in business, serving the Lord." He did not neglect mental culture, exhausting as were his business duties, but was in the habit of rising at an early hour, and walking three or four miles every day in all weathers to the house of a friend with whom he had entered on the study of chemistry (see Illustration No. 3).

Business, however, conscientiously as he pursued it, was subordinate in his heart to Christian service. From the hour of his conversion the all-absorbing desire to consecrate himself wholly to labor for Christ had been growing within him. Gradually it assumed definite form and shape, and he offered himself to the Baptist Missionary Society for service in Africa. The courage and devotion of the man were proved by the fact that though sad evidences were continually being received of the fatal character of the climate on the western shores of the Dark Continent, he expressed his preference for that field of labor. During his preparatory course of training in college he was untiring in zeal and unremitting in his efforts to gain the knowledge that would fit him for efficient service. In the class-room (see Illustration No. 4), and in his private apartment, he was constantly at work, and his tutors recognized in him the true spirit of the successful missionary.

THE CONGO.

At the conclusion of his studies he was commissioned, as he had desired, to labor at Cameroons. His colleague was Mr. Comber. Not long afterward the munificence of Mr. Robert Arthington, of Leeds, opened the way for Christian operations on the Congo, and Mr. Grenfell and Mr. Comber volunteered to proceed thither from Cameroons immediately. Their experience at Cameroons, their proved capacity to endure the hardships and dangers of the climate, and their proximity to the field of labor, all prompted the acceptance of their offer, and in the spring of 1877 they received instructions to proceed. Anticipating the action of the Society they had already taken preparatory steps for their enterprise, so that when their commission arrived no time might be lost. They visited Banana at the entrance to the Congo, established friendly relations with the Dutch trading firm there settled, went up more than seventy miles by the company's steamer to Mboma, and proceeded thence to Mbanza-Noki, from which place they sent a letter to Pedro, the King of Congo, telling him of their projected visit to San Salvador, having done which, and obtained valuable information, they returned to Cameroons.

In the month of June, 1877, having been furnished with instructions and necessary stores, Mr. Grenfell, and his colleague, Mr. Comber, again set forth, and travelled to San Salvador. Their party numbered sixteen at starting: the two missionaries, two native preachers, and twelve carriers, two of whom after a short experience of the perils of the journey turned back. The party was favorably received by the king, and with his consent established the headquarters of the Mission at San Salvador.

"THE PEACE,"

by which name the Mission steamer now used by Mr. Grenfell is called, was the object of the next effort. It was clear to the missionaries that without a steamer their work would be one of unnecessary labor and peril. A statement of the circumstances was sent home, and Mr. Arthington, the munificent benefactor of the Mission, at once placed a sum of money at the Society's service which justified it in contracting for a steamer. Mr. Grenfell was requested to return that his experience might guide the Society in securing a vessel fit for the service. He complied, taking with him drawings and plans of the kind of boat required. The ship was built, and, in December, 1882, Mr. Grenfell had the satisfaction of returning to the Congo, carrying with him the new steamer in sections, which were easily joined on the banks of the Congo, and formed a ship admirably adapted to the navigation of the river. Distressing are given by Mr. Grenfell in the letters he has sent home since his return with increased facilities for seeing what heathenism is in all its naked barbarity. In one of his letters, he says, "On our arrival at Bolobo we found that it was a great day, a gala day, indeed. The wife of one of the chiefs had died somewhere away, and, of course, there must be four or five days and nights of orgies; any amount of dirty sugar-cane-beer swilling, unbridled license in every species of sensuality, and a grand finale of fair human sacrifices, each victim being a slave bought for the purpose! Drums beating briskly, circles of women wearing a great heavy brass collar (twenty-five to thirty pounds), dancing and clapping rhythmically, and plenty of people about. The victims were tied up, and stolidly awaited the bowstring or knife. Remonstrances and pleadings by us on the behalf of these poor victims were all in vain. Another cruel tragedy was also shortly to take place. Prices of certain food were to be arranged, and, as a sign or seal of such arrangement, a slave was to be killed thus: a hole was to be dug between the two adjacent towns, and the victim's arms and legs broken, and he thrown into the hole to die no one being allowed to give him food or drink.

PICTURES OF HEATHEN LIFE

"Verily, as God's Book says, 'the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.'"

A STRUGGLE WITH A CROCODILE

(Illustration No. 5), which occurred under his own observation, he thus describes, "After a busy day's work on board the steamer, James Showers, Shaw, and 'Bob' the fireman, were enjoying the luxury of a swim. The two former, having finished their bath, entered the small boat, and were being followed by Bob, who was just reaching forward to grasp the gunwale, when he cried out, 'Hold me; a crocodile has got my hand.' James immediately caught hold of him, and together with Shaw, tried to pull him on board. But the crocodile would not let go, and dragged his intended prey under, and the would-be rescuers nearly into, the water. James and Shaw then sat down in the boat with their feet firmly planted against the gunwale, keeping a firm grip of poor Bob's free hand and arm, and shouted for further help. Then commenced a struggle as to who could pull the harder—those in the boat, or the crocodile in the water. The advantage was sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other; but, after about five minutes' struggle and a final unavailing effort, accompanied with a lot of swishing of the tail, the crocodile gave it up, and went away disappointed, leaving Bob sadly exhausted from loss of blood, with a terribly lacerated hand, and with wounds on the face and leg."

GETTING FUEL

for the steamer is a work of difficulty and danger, and Mr. Grenfell mentions incidentally the narrow escape from death by a native's spear which Dr. Sims, of the American Mission, had, during one of these expeditions. He went ashore with the other members of the wooding party, and was surprised by hostile natives armed with guns and spears. The Mission party beat a retreat, providentially without loss of life, but Dr. Sims barely missed the spear thrown at him by one of the chiefs of the attacking party. In such circumstances when fuel must be had, the missionaries look out for "dry branches, the offshoots of stems surrounded by water, and, after making a rope fast to these, we have them lopped off with axe or saw, and then drag them on board. 'Coaling' under such circumstances is very costly in the matter of time, and furnishes lots of excitement; for climbing trees, even to those accustomed to it, is no trifle when encumbered by rope and tool, and on some occasions subjected to attacks from huge mosquitoes." (See Illustration No. 6).

NATIVES ON BOARD

the boat have sometimes strange experiences. At Mosaku and Mambuta it was market day when the Peace arrived, and a hundred canoes were collected on the beach. "The chief was very friendly to us," says the missionary, "and made us a small present, venturing on board to do so. He was evidently greatly impressed by the white man's fine canoe, and when one of our number, not thinking what the result would be, suddenly opened one of the steam-valves, this impression was so profoundly deepened, that his kingship and all his satellites jumped overboard, as well as the occupants of some twenty or thirty canoes alongside, and swam ashore. Such a scramble, such a splashing, and, happily, such universal good-humor, when they found there was no danger! Their equanimity was soon restored, and all went well again, and we were able to lay in a stock of the market produce, which was very acceptable to us." (See Illustration No. 7).

AN ARAB RAID

occurred last year while Mr. Grenfell was near Bosoko. The details he gives of it show how horrible are the cruelties practised on the natives, as well as the constant watchfulness which is engendered in the missionary's life by the consciousness of danger which may rise unexpectedly at any moment. The Peace was in the region occupied by the ferocious Arnwimi tribe which eight years before made the desperate onslaught on Mr. Henry M. Stanley. Signs of hostility were noticed from the deck of the Peace as the steamer proceeded. Mr. Grenfell says, "It was not with very pleasant feelings that we camped that evening about four miles away, as we were compelled to do to cut firewood, especially as we were followed by a couple of canoes which kept up constant communications with their base by means of the big drums they carried; and in the morning we were glad to be off betimes. During that day we saw no towns; we therefore promised ourselves a quiet night; and, as late in the afternoon we saw what we took to be the light of saltmakers' fires ahead, we anchored rather earlier than usual. Our hopes of a quiet night, however, were in vain, for it was not yet midnight when the watch on board reported a small canoe close by, and in a minute or two another came in sight, then a large one, evidently freighted with some forty or fifty people.

COULD IT BE A NIGHT ATTACK?

More canoes came by, and after a while we heard a sick man cough, then a child cry, and then we felt sure they must be for some reason or other fugitives in full flight. Shortly afterward we managed to learn that what we had taken to be the light of the saltmakers' fires had been the flames of a burning town, and that the canoes which had passed were running away from a band of Arab raiders in pursuit of slaves and ivory. While talking with these poor people, wreckage of all kinds commenced floating by, and for nearly three hours afterward a continuous stream of house roofs, beds, stools, calabashes, fishing-nets, ropes, and all the floatable gear that had been thrown into the river partly from the town and partly out of the canoes by those runaways who found themselves hardly pressed, or out of the captured ones by the Arabs, who would not be hampered with such plunder. In the morning, after a short run of eight or ten miles, we reached the smoking ruins of Yambuli, a place which must have had at least three or four thousand inhabitants.

"A little farther on we came to a small town which had been quite destroyed, but from among the still smoking ruins one of the men who had ventured back, hailed us, and holding out his open hands before him, said, 'See, we have nothing left, nothing;' then pointing to the charred post, he exclaimed, 'See what has happened; our houses burned, plantations destroyed, our wives and children all gone.' The utterly woe-begone appearance the poor fellow presented, surrounded as he was with such unmistakable evidences of ruin, made up a picture of desolation, which once seen is never forgotten." (See Illustration No. 8).

While Christianity is assailed and denounced on all hands, it may safely submit to be judged by its record. Its missionaries go with their lives in their hands to carry its blessings to the miserable and the oppressed. They find darkness, moral and spiritual, misery, cruelty, wretchedness, and barbarity. They labor for years unrewarded, sometimes they die before seeing any result from their labors, but time passes and the harvest comes. Light, peace, happiness and civilization are witnessed, and the people, rejoicing in the better day, thank God that His devoted servants brought the precious seed among them.

Bishop Littlejohn, of Long Island, Uttered a timely warning at the Diocesan Convention on May 18th, on the dangers of an education from which religion was eliminated. Referring to the system now in vogue in our universities as well as our common schools, he said: "Among all thoughtful people there is no question that civil government and social order, if they are to be beneficent and enduring, must rest upon conscience as well as intelligence; upon a disciplined sense of right and wrong as well as upon a trained faculty of acquiring and using knowledge, and, further, that the morality of the people cannot be vital and healthy unless its roots are planted in the soil of religion. So far as this church is concerned, the educational systems of the day raise an issue which, unless it proves false to its history and mission, it must meet. Its very life is jeopardized by a passive attitude toward this issue. It is part of its task to produce character, and through character to leaven all life with the spirit of Gospel faith and morality. Religion cannot grow unless it be intelligent, and intelligence cannot be a safe guide to duty unless it be religious. The same God is the source of both." This warning ought to be heeded. The facts the Bishop emphasizes are just now forgotten by Christians equally with the world.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Motto Above the Mantelpiece.—At a recent meeting Mr. Stewart said: "On one occasion I was asked by a friend to call upon a lady in the neighborhood of Carlisle. When I entered the dining-room, there was no one there, but the first thing that caught my eye, hanging right above the mantelpiece, were these words: 'God first.' I became very curious to see the person who lived in this house. In a few moments she came in, and it was not difficult to see by her face that God was first in her life, for she was just full of the joy of the Lord; and before I was long in her presence she was telling me of her work for the Master."

A Very Welcome Letter.—"A Man Lately came into our evangelistic meeting, and at the close I spoke to him, and found him to be a very unlearned and ignorant man. I repeated to him the verse, 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, etc.,' and asked: 'Do you not remember when Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness?' 'No,' he replied, 'I know nothing of it.' As far as I thought I could not get him even to comprehend the very simplicity of the Gospel. But I was mistaken. To my great joy I received shortly afterward a very small note, which I first thought was a piece of money, but when unfolded it proved to be something far better. It was a few words from a friend of the poor fellow, telling me that he to whom I had spoken of the serpent as the picture of Jesus the Saviour was saved."

A Race in the Snow.—Mr. Ferrie remarked: "Two boys were running races in the snow. When they reached their destination, one boy said to the other: 'I say, Harry, how is it that your foot-marks are so uneven while mine make one straight line to the mark?' 'I will tell you how it is,' answered Harry. 'In the middle of our race, I noticed a bird, and was trying to keep my eye on it to watch where it would go, instead of keeping my eyes directly on the goal.' Is that not what so many Christians are doing to-day? Instead of keeping their eyes fixed on the end to which we are hastening, we are taken up with the trifling things around us, and consequently our race is not a straight one. Let us, like Paul, say, 'One thing I do; forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ.'"

Miriam, the Nurse-Girl.—The Rev. Mr. Gault observed: "An interesting incident occurred lately in Germany. A young girl named Miriam, eldest of a large family, sought employment in a gentleman's household as nurse, to help to maintain her younger brothers and sisters, who were dependent upon her. She was engaged by the gentleman, and shortly after her entrance into the family diphtheria spread among the children. At that time her increasing care and deep devotion were conspicuous until she herself was seized by the disease, and laid on a hospital bed. When there, she met with some Christian ladies, and she was not long in their company before she found that they had something worth having, that she had not. They spoke to her of Christ, and told her that through Him alone she would find the rest for which she longed. She soon learned to know the blessed Saviour through these ladies. She recovered rapidly, and now I am glad to say she is installed as teacher in a large orphanage, and is trying to lead the little ones to Jesus."

A Doctor's Inability to Pray.—Dr. Cameron said: "A physician in Wales was overwhelmed with work during an epidemic. One night a man came to his door, and asked if he would come and see his daughter, who was asking for him. He at first refused to go, saying that he had been to see her three times that day already; but so urgent was the request that he at last reluctantly consented to go, for he knew very well that the girl was dying. When he entered the chamber of the sick girl the mother met him and said, 'Oh, pray for her, sir; she is dying!'

'Send for the minister,' he answered; for he himself dared not pray. The mother and father urged him to say but a few words of prayer, for their child would be gone ere they could bring a minister. The girl herself gave him an imploring look, for she could not speak; but he stood by her bedside for full half an hour without uttering one word, and it was doubtful which of those four were most utterly wretched. The girl passed away, and he turned from the house of death bewailing his awful condition."

A Soldier's Punishment.—Sergeant Major Mathers remarked: "On one occasion when I was in India, a wagon was brought into the square. There was going to be a regimental punishment. The commanding officer read out the trial and sentence—fifty lashes—which the officer commanded to be given to the offender. When the man had received twenty-five of the fifty lashes, a young man stepped out from the ranks, and said: 'Please, sir, I will take the other twenty-five; he is a comrade of mine.' I can see General Lockhart yet, as he turned to the young man who had so generously offered to share the punishment, and said: 'Go to your place, sir; your own turn will probably come soon enough.' He could not share his friend's punishment, for the military law would not admit of one man bearing, or even sharing, another's punishment; each man had to stand for his own. But, dear friends, God devised a plan whereby Jesus, the innocent one, should take the place of the guilty and suffer for them. God commended His love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us."

A Run in the Wrong Direction.—The Rev. Mr. Daly observed: "A minister was walking through one of our streets when he met a little girl running as quickly as she could and crying bitterly. The minister stopped her, and asked: 'What is the matter, my little girl? Where are you running to in such a hurry?' 'I have lost my way,' said the little one, as she stopped to gain breath, and answer the kind question put by the minister. 'Where do you live?' he then inquired. She told him, and he said: 'You are just going in the opposite direction. Can you trust me to take you home?' Without a word she placed her little hand in his, and let him take her where he would. He led her safely to her home, where she was received with joy by her anxious parent. Dear friends, how many are anxiously seeking the way of salvation, but, like this child, are running right in the opposite direction. If such would stop a minute and listen to the voice of the Friend of sinners, who is offering to lead them safely home! To do so they need not only the sweet confidence, but the simple faith of this little child, for 'Without faith it is impossible to please God.' 'Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die.'"

Christ in a Lady's Kitchen.—The Rev. Mr. Andrews said: "A few weeks ago I was returning from preaching one Sabbath evening, when I heard some one close behind me in earnest conversation with a child. The little fellow was talking very rapidly, when the young woman gently remonstrated with him, telling him that it was the Lord's day, and therefore he must be good and quiet. By a few persuasive words she succeeded in quieting her little charge; he was being gently drawn by the cords of love which is always the way to win a child to do what is right. I turned round, and recognized a nurse in one of the families of my church. I asked her if she herself knew that Jesus, of whom she had been speaking to the child? 'Oh, yes, sir,' she replied, with a happy look, 'I do know Him.' 'How long is it since you and He became friends?' I asked, deeply interested. 'Last Sunday night,' she replied. 'My mistress came to the kitchen and told me all about the way of salvation, and told me also how I was just simply to receive God's gift. Yes, sir; and it was just there, sitting in the kitchen, that I, by the grace of God, was led to give myself to Jesus.' What a wonderful power for good a mistress has upon all around her if she is a real Christian."

THE HARDSHIPS OF WORKINGMEN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 30, 1886.

"So the carpenter encouraged the goldsmith and he that smootheth with the hammer him that smiteth the anvil.—Isa. 41 : 7.

YOU have seen in factories a piece of mechanism passing from hand to hand, and from room to room, and one mechanic will smite it, and another will flatten it, and another will chisel it, and another will polish it, until the work be done. And so the prophet describes the idols of olden times as being made, part of them by one hand, part of them by another hand. Carpentry comes in, gold-beating comes in, smithery comes in, and three or four styles of mechanism are employed. "So the carpenter encouraged the goldsmith, and he that smootheth with the hammer him that smote the anvil." When they met, they talked over their work, and they helped each other on with it. It was a very bad kind of business; it was making idols which were an insult to the Lord of heaven. I have thought if men in bad work can ought not men engaged in honest artisanship and mechanism speak words of good cheer?

Men see in their own work hardships and trials, while they recognize no hardships or trials in anybody else's occupation. Every man's burden is the heaviest, and every woman's task is the hardest. We find people wanting to get other occupations and professions. I suppose, when the merchant comes home at night, his brain hot with the anxieties of commercial toil, disappointed and vexed, agitated about the excitements in the money markets, he says, "Oh, I wish I were a mechanic! When his day's work is done, the mechanic lies down; he is healthy in body, healthy in mind, and healthy in soul, but I can't sleep;" while, at that very moment, the mechanic is wishing he were a banker or a merchant. He says, "Then I could always have on beautiful apparel; then I could move in the choicest circles; then I could bring up my children in a very different sphere from that in which I am compelled to bring them up." Now, the beauty of our holy religion is that the occupations and professions, and while I cannot understand your annoyances and you cannot understand mine, God understands them all. He knows all about the troubles of these men mentioned in my text—the carpenter who encouraged the goldsmith, and he that smootheth with the hammer, and the gold-beaters.

GOD LOOKS DOWN UPON ALL

I will speak this morning of the general hardships of the working-classes. You may not belong to this class, but you are bound as Christian men and women to know their sorrows and sympathize with them, and as political economists to come to their rescue. There is great danger that the prosperous classes, because of the bad things that have been said by the false friends of labor, shall conclude that all this labor trouble is a "hullabaloo" about nothing. Do not go off on that tangent. You would not, neither would I, submit without protest to the oppressions to which many of our laborers are subjected.

ANARCHISTS REPUDIATED.

You do a great wrong to the laboring classes if you hold them responsible for the work of the scoundrelly Anarchists. You cannot hate their deeds more thoroughly than do all the industrial classes. At the head of the chief organ of the Knights of Labor, in big letters, I find the following vigorous disclaimer:

"Let it be understood by all the world that the Knights of Labor have no affiliation, association, sympathy or respect for the band of cowardly murderers, cut-throats and robbers, known as Anarchists, who sneak through the country like midnight assassins, stirring up the passions of ignorant foreigners, unfurling the red flag of anarchy and causing riot and bloodshed. Parsons, Spies, Fielding, Most and all their followers, sympathizers, aiders and abettors should be summarily dealt with. They are entitled to no more consideration than wild beasts. The leaders are cowards and their followers are fools."

You may do your duty toward your employes, but many do not, and the biggest business firm in America to-day is Grip, Gouge, GRIND AND COMPANY.

Look, for instance, at the woes of the womanly toilers, who have not made any strike and who are dying by the thousands, and dying by inches. I read a few lines from the last Labor Report, just out, as specimens of what female employes endure. "Poisoned hands and cannot work. Had to sue the man for fifty cents!" Another: "About four months of the year can, by hard work, earn a little more than three dollars per week." Another: "She now makes wrappers at one dollar per dozen; can make eight wrappers per day." Another: "We girls in our establishment have the following fines imposed: for washing your hands, twenty-five cents; eating a piece of bread at your loom, one dollar; also for sitting on a stool, taking a drink of water, and many trifling things too numerous to mention." "Some of the worst villains of our cities are the employers of these women. They beat them down to the last penny, and try to cheat them out of that. The woman must deposit a dollar or two before she gets the garments to work on. When the work is done it is sharply inspected, the most insignificant flaw is picked out, and the wages refused and sometimes the dollar deposited not given back. The Woman's Protective Union reports a case where one of the poor souls, finding a place where she could get more wages, resolved to change employers, and went to get her pay for work done. The employer says, 'I hear you are going to leave me.' 'Yes,' she said, 'and I have come to get what you owe me.' He made no answer. She said: 'Are you not going to pay me?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I will pay you,' and he kicked her down-stairs." I never swore a word in all my life, but I confess that when I read that I felt a stirring within me that was not at all devotional.

UNDERPAID WOMEN.

"By what principle of justice is it that women in many of our cities get only two-thirds as much as men, and in many cases only half? Here is the gigantic injustice, that for work equally well, if not better done, woman receives far less compensation than man. Start with the National Government. Women clerks in Washington get nine hundred dollars for doing that for which men receive eighteen hundred dollars. The wheel of oppression is rolling over the necks of thousands of women who are at this moment in despair about what they are to do. Many of the largest mercantile establishments of our cities are accessory to these abominations, and from their large establishments there are scores of souls being pitched off into death, and their employers know it. Is there a God? Will there be a judgment? I tell you, if God rises up to redress woman's wrongs, many of our large establishments will be swallowed up quicker than a South American earthquake ever took down a city. God will catch these oppressors between the two mill-stones of His wrath, and grind them to powder.

"Why is it that a female principal in a school gets only eight hundred and twenty-five dollars for doing work for which a male principal gets sixteen hundred and fifty dollars? I hear from all this land the wail of womanhood. Man has nothing to answer to that wail but flatteries. He says she is an angel. She is not. She knows she is not. She is a human being who gets hungry when she has no food, and cold when she has no fire. Give her no more flatteries; give her justice! There are sixty-five thousand sewing-girls in New York and Brooklyn. Across the sunlight comes their death groan. It is not such a cry as comes from those who are suddenly hurled out of life, but a slow, grinding, horrible wasting away. At a large meeting of these women held in a hall in Philadelphia, grand speeches were delivered, but a needlewoman took the stand, threw aside her faded shawl, and with her shrivelled arm hurled a very thunderbolt of eloquence, speaking out the horrors of her own experience. Stand at the corner of a street at six or seven o'clock in the morning, as the women go to work. Many of them had no breakfast except the crumbs that were left over from the night before, or the crumbs they chew on their way through the street. Here they come!

THE WORKING-GIRLS OF NEW YORK and Brooklyn. These engaged in head work, these in flower-making, in millinery, paper-box making; but, most overworked of all and least compensated, the sewing-women. Why do they not take the city cars on their way up? They cannot afford the five cents. If, concluding to deny herself something else, she gets into the car, give her a seat. You want to see how Lattimer and Ridley appeared in the fire. Look at that woman and behold a more horrible martyrdom, a hotter fire, a more agonizing death. Ask that woman how much she gets for her work, and she will tell you six cents for making coarse shirts and finds her own thread."

I speak more fitly of woman's wrongs because she has not been heard in the present agitation. You know more of what men have suffered. I said to a colored man who, in Missouri, last March, came into my room in the morning to build my fire: "Sam, how much wages do you people get around here?" He replied: "Ten dollars a month, sir!" I asked: "Have you a family?" "Yes," said he, "wife and children." Think of it—a hundred and twenty dollars a year to support a family on! My friends, there is in this world

SOMETHING AWFULLY ATWIST.

When I think of these things I am not bothered as some of my brethren with the abstract questions as to why God let sin come into the world. The only wonder with me is that God don't smash this world up and start another in place of it.

One great trial that the working-classes feel is PHYSICAL EXHAUSTION.

There are athletes who go out to their work at six or seven o'clock in the morning, and come back at night as fresh as when they started. They turn their back upon the shuttle or the forge or the rising wall, and they come away elastic and whistling. That is the exception. I have noticed that when the factory bell taps for six o'clock, the hard-working man wearily puts his arm into his coat-sleeve and starts for home. He sits down in the family circle, resolved to make himself agreeable, to be the means of culture and education to his children, but in five minutes he is sound asleep. He is fagged out—strength of body, mind and soul utterly exhausted. He rises in the morning only half rested from the toil. Indeed, he will never have any perfect rest in this world until he gets into one narrow spot which is the only perfect rest for the human body in this world. I think they call it a grave!

Has toil frosted the color of your cheeks? Has it taken all spontaneity from your laughter? Has it subtracted the spring from your step and the lustre from your eye until it has left you only half the man you were when you first put your hand on the hammer and your foot on the wheel? To-morrow, in your place of toil, listen, and you will hear a voice above the hiss of the furnace and the groan of the foundry and the clatter of the shuttle—a voice not of machinery, nor of the task-master, but the voice of an all-sympathetic God, as He says, "Come unto Me all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Let all men and women of toil remember that this work will soon be over. Have they not heard that there is a great holiday coming? Oh, that home, and no long walk to get to it! Oh, that bread, and no sweating toil necessary to earn it! Oh, these deep wells of eternal rapture, and no heavy buckets to draw up! I wish they would put their head on this pillow stuffed with the down from the wing of all God's promises. There remains a rest for the people of God.

Do you say, "We have sewing-machines now in our great cities, and the trouble is gone?" No; it is not. I see a great many women wearing themselves out amid the hardships of the sewing-machine. A Christian man went into a house of a good deal of destitution in New York, and he saw a poor woman there with a sick child and he was telling the woman how good a Christian she ought to be, and how she ought to put her trust in God. "Oh," she said, "I have no God; I work from Monday morning until Saturday night and I get no rest, and I never hear anything that does my soul any good; and, when Sunday comes, I haven't any bonnet that I can wear to church, and I have sometimes got down to pray and then I got up, saying to my husband, 'My dear, there's no use of my praying; I am so distracted I can't pray; it don't do any good!'" Oh, sir, it is very hard to work on as we people do from year to year, and to see nothing bright ahead, and to see the poor little child getting thinner and thinner, and my man almost broken down, and to be getting no nearer to God, but to be getting farther away from Him! Oh, if I were only ready to die!" May God comfort all who toil with the needle and the sewing-machine, and have compassion on those borne down under the fatigues of life.

Another great trial is

and sentiment. I do not know of anything much more painful than to have a fine taste for painting and sculpture and music and glorious sunsets and the expanse of the blue sky, and yet not to be able to get the dollar for the oratorio, or to get a picture, or to buy one's way into the country to look at the setting sun and at the bright heavens. While there are men in great affluence, who have around them all kinds of luxuries in art, themselves entirely unable to appreciate these luxuries—buying their books by the square foot, their pictures sent to them by some artist who is glad to get the miserable daubs out of the studio—there are multitudes of refined, delicate women who are born artists, and shall reign in the kingdom of heaven as artists, who are denied every picture and every sweet song and every musical instrument. Oh, let me cheer such persons by telling them to look up and behold the inheritance that God has reserved for them!

A HEART-BREAKING PICTURE.

Then there are a great many who suffer not only in the privation of their taste, but in the apprehensions and the oppressive surroundings of life that were well described by an English writer. He said: "To be a poor man's child, and look through the rails of the playground, and envy richer boys for the sake of their many books, and yet to be doomed to ignorance. To be apprenticed to some harsh stranger, and feel forever banished from a mother's tenderness and a sister's love. To work when very weary, and work when the heart is sick and the head is sore. To see a wife or a darling child wasting away, and not to be able to get the best advice. To think that the better food or purer air might set her up again, but that food you cannot buy, that air you must never hope to breathe. To be obliged to let her die. To come home from the daily task some evening, and see her sinking. To sit up all night in hope to catch again those precious words you might have heard could you have afforded to stay at home all day, but never hear them. To have no mourners at the funeral, and even to have to carry on your own shoulder through the merry streets the light deal coffin,

To see huddled into a promiscuous hole the dust which is so dear to you, and not venture to mark the spot by planted flower or lowliest stone."

But I have no time this morning longer to dwell upon the hardships and the trials of those who toil with hand and foot, for I must go on to offer some grand and for such; and the first encouragement is, that one of the greatest safeguards against evil is plenty to do. When men sin against the law of their country, where do the police detectives go to find them? Not amid the dust of factories, not among those who have on their "overalls," but among those who stand with their hands in their pockets around the doors of saloons and restaurants and taverns. Active employment is one of the greatest sureties for a pure and upright life. There are but very few men with character stalwart enough to endure consecutive idleness.

I see a pool of water in the country, and I say, "Thou slimy, fetid thing, what does all this mean? Didn't I see you playing with those shuttles and turning that grist-mill?" "Oh, yes," says the water, "I used to earn my living." I say again, "Then what makes you look so sick? Why are you covered with this green scum? Why is your breath so vile?" "Oh," says the water, "I have nothing to do. I am disgusted with shuttles and wheels. I am going to spend my whole lifetime here, and while yonder stream sings on its way down the mountain side, here I am left to fester and die accursed of God because I have nothing to do!" Sin is that bears down on vessels whose sails are flapping idly in the wind. The arrow of sin has hard work to puncture the leather of an old working-apron. Be encouraged by the fact that your shops, your rising walls, your anvils are fortresses in which you may hide, and from which you may fight against the temptations of your life. Morning, noon and night, Sundays and week-days, thank God for plenty to do.

Another encouragement is the fact that their families are going to have the very best opportunity for development and usefulness. That may sound strange to you, but are very apt to turn out poorly. In nine cases out of ten the lad finds out if a fortune is coming, by twelve years of age; he finds out there is no necessity of toil, and he makes no struggle, and a life without struggle goes into dissipation or stupidity. You see the sons of wealthy parents going out into the world, inane, nerveless, dyspeptic, or they are incorrigible and reckless, while the son of the porter that kept the gate learns his trade, gets a robust physical constitution, achieves high moral culture, and stands in the front rank of Church and State.

Who are the men mightiest in our Legislatures and Congress and Cabinets? Did they walk up the steep of life in silver slippers? Oh, no. The mother put him down under the tree in the shade, while she spread the hay. Many of these mighty men ate out of an iron spoon and drank out of the roughest earthenware—their whole life a forced march. They never had any luxuries until, after awhile, God gave them affluence and usefulness and renown as a reward for their persistence. Remember, then, that though you may have poor surroundings and small means for the education of your children, they are actually starting under better advantages than though you had a fortune to give them. Hardship and privation are not a damage to them, but an advantage. Akenside rose to his eminent sphere from his father's butcher-shop. Robert Burns started as a shepherd. Prideau used to sweep Exeter College. Gifford was a shoemaker, and the son of every man of toil may rise to heights of intellectual and moral power if he will only trust God and keep busy.

Again, I offer as encouragement that you have so many opportunities of gaining information. Plato gave thirteen hundred dollars for two books. The Countess of Anjou gave two hundred sheep for one volume. Jerome ruined himself financially by buying one copy of Origen. Oh, the contrast! Now there are tens of thousands of pens gathering up information. Type-setters are calling for "copy." All our cities quake with the rolling cylinders of the Harpers and the Appletons and the Lippincotts and the Petersons and the Ticknors, and you now buy more than Benjamin Franklin ever knew for fifty cents! There are people who toil from seven o'clock in the morning until six o'clock at night who know more about anatomy than the old physiologists, and who know more about astronomy than the old philosophers. If you should take the learned men of two hundred years ago and put them on one bench, and take twenty children from the common schools in Brooklyn and put them down on the other bench, the children could examine the philosophers, and the philosophers could not examine the children. "Ah!" says Isaac Newton, coming up and talking to some intelligent lad of seven years, "What is that?" "Oh, that is a rail-train!" "What is that?" "That is a telegraph." "What is that?" "It is a telephone." "Dear me! I think I shall go back to my bed in the dust, for I am bewildered and my head turns." Oh, rejoice that you have all these opportunities of information spread out before you, and that, seated in your chair at home, by the evening light, you can look over all nations and see the ascending morn of a universal day.

TOIL A DISCIPLINE.

One more encouragement: Your toils in this world are only intended to be a discipline by which you shall be prepared for heaven. "Behold, I bring you glad tidings of great joy," and tell you that Christ, the carpenter of Nazareth, is the workingman's Christ. You get His love once in your heart, O workingman! and you can sing on the wall in the midst of the storm, and in the shop amid the shoving of the plane, and down in the mine amid the plunge of the crowbar, and on shipboard while climbing ratlines. If you belong to the Lord Jesus Christ, He will count the drops of sweat on your brow. He knows every ache and every pain you have ever suffered in your worldly occupation. Are you weary? He will give you rest. Are you sick? He will give you health. Are you cold? He will wrap around you the warm mantle of His eternal love.

And besides that, my friends, you must remember, that all this is a prefatory and introductory. I see a great multitude before the throne of God. Who are they? "Oh," you say, "those are princes; they must have always been in a royal family; they dress like princes, they walk like princes, they are princes; there are none of the common people there; none of the people that ever toiled with hand and foot!" Ah! you are mistaken. Who is that bright spirit before the throne? Why, that was a sewing-girl who, work as she could, could make but two shillings the day. What are those kings and queens before the throne? Many of them went up from Birmingham mills and from Lowell carpet factories.

THE SONG OF THE REDEEMED.

And now I hear a sound like the rustling of robes, and now I see a taking up of harps as though they were going to strike a thanksgiving anthem, and all the children of the saw, and the disciples of the shuttle are in glorious array, and they lift a song so clear and sweet I wish you could hear it. It would make the pilgrim's burden very light, and the pilgrim's journey very short. Not one weak voice or hoarse throat in that great assemblage. The accord is as perfect as though they had been all eternity practising, and I ask them what is the name of that song they sing before the throne, and they tell me it is the song of the redeemed working-people. And the angel cries out: "Who are these so near the throne?" and the answer comes back: "These are they who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

A NAVAL CADET IN JAPAN.

THE Rev. Henry D. Page, writing from Tokio to the Spirit of Missions, narrates an incident which shows the kind of difficulties experienced by the missionary. He says:

"My wife's earliest pupil is now in the senior class of one of the Government naval schools, and is a youth of much promise and attractiveness, both mentally and morally; one to whom we have felt drawn from the first. Mrs. Page had partly prepared him for Baptism, and he had also begun to attend one of the Bishop's classes in preparation for it, but at this time we had a great disappointment. Instead of being earnest and diligent in his studies, he began to be irregular in attendance upon his instruction. He would never admit that he had relinquished his purpose of being baptized, but urgent matters of business had prevented him from coming to his class, he would say, and thus for some time he kept up the appearance of continuing his preparation until at last even the semblance was given up, and we mourned over him as one who had gone back to his first estate.

"Some months ago I had an opportunity for a personal conversation with him, and I found that he was still calling himself a Christian, though he shrank from making his faith known in the school, where as yet no one had acknowledged himself a follower of Christ. I expostulated with him on the want of manly courage exhibited in his vain attempt to serve Christ in secret, and set before him the Saviour's own words as to the supreme importance of our confessing Him before men. He listened with a flustered and troubled countenance, and after some further conversation we parted.

"Some months elapsed, and I supposed that my words had been without effect, but it was not so. A short time ago he came to me of his own motion, and telling me of his past mistake, asked to be baptized. He is now under my instruction, and I have a good hope that his courage will not fail again. My wife has rejoiced particularly over his return, for it was under her teaching that he was first brought to a knowledge of the truth."

MR. ARNOT'S WORK IN AFRICA.

INTELLIGENCE of Mr. Arnot's progress will be welcome to our readers, to some of whom he is well known. The following is an extract from a letter recently written by him:

"Nasoma, who has been for six months in my employment, is a most steady, careful, sober man, and one whom I can trust with everything. I have just arranged with him that if the door be opened at Garenganje for work, he and I shall set to, build a house, and lay out a bit of garden. Native huts, or native building on a scale according to a white man's ideas, will not do, for natives have no idea of making houses water-proof. Besides a few tools, I carry a six-pane window-frame and glass, a comfort indispensable to health, for I have suffered much from being compelled, for the sake of light, to sit at open doors or at a hole in the wall. The frame, when taken to pieces, goes into a very small space and is quite light, while the glass takes very little room at the foot of the box. I find that I cannot take the same liberties in this country as at home; to sit outside, however warm, to let the wind blow upon me for any time, or to wash in water below a certain temperature, will knock me up for days.

"My ox is in splendid condition, and so quiet and tractable; indeed, to sum up, everything is supplied to me of the best, and every one seems to be with me, and willing to help. Even my little cook makes better soup and sweeter bread than I ever gave him credit for before. My visitors are the sick and lame; each evening I walk over to a village close by, where I meet with six or eight half-castes and Portuguese-speaking blacks, and we converse together until dusk. And so my short waiting-time has gone by. The Lord compels me to praise Him; He fills my mouth with thanksgiving.

"A report reached me of the death of Cocashia, the little boy whom I had left at Bihé unable to proceed further, but I now find that he was enticed by one of Señor Porto's slaves into the woods and there handed over to some traders and sold by them at the coast. I loved the boy as my own child, and grieved over his death; but this news is much worse than the former. I at once sent off to the coast for particulars about him, as slaves are shipped from Benguela every month, in large companies, to Portuguese colonies elsewhere. To redeem him, I offered $100, besides paying the expenses of an agent at Benguela to hunt him up, and though, humanly speaking, the chances of ever seeing my boy again are few, yet prayer avails with God. I have often heard the groan of this country's sorrow, but now I feel it."

AN ASTROLOGER'S VICTIM.

A CREDULOUS old lady's fortune was lost in Wall Street recently. It is less than a year ago that she paid her first visit to a well-known broker and requested him to purchase five hundred shares of a certain stock. The shares in question were then at a high figure, and they had been rising for some time. The broker, however, believed that they would soon fall heavily, and as the old lady was buying them not as an investment, but as a speculation, intending to sell them again when they reached a higher figure, the broker strongly advised her against the purchase. She was, however, determined, and said she had information on the best authority that the price would advance. She left $5000 on margin and departed, confident that she would realize a large profit. But the broker was right; the stock fell. He again advised the lady to sell, but she told him she was sure her informant would prove right, and she handed him $4000 more, to avoid parting with the shares. The price continued to fall steadily. Another and a fourth call had to be made upon her, as time went on, but the old lady was still confident. At last, in response to the broker's demand, she gave him every dollar she had left of the fortune of $18,000 which she owned a few months before. Another fall of price occurred, and she was penniless. "Would you mind telling me," asked the broker, "who the man is who has been advising you?" "An astrologer," said the lady. The broker was too gallant to express his thoughts then, but he used strong language in relating the incident afterward. It appears that many of the losing speculations in Wall Street are made on the advice of astrologers. The fact is an evidence of the perversity of human nature: it will believe implicitly in charlatans of all kinds, while it refuses to believe in the Son of God (Isa. 8: 19).

MISSIONARIES AMONG RIOTERS.

A REMINISCENCE of a crisis in mission work in China was narrated recently by the Rev. Ebenezer Jenkins, who is enjoying a brief respite from his labors in that land. He said: "I shall never forget the few days I spent in the notorious city of Fatsan. It has a population of nearly half a million. Its industries would dispose me to call it the workshop of the province. During my visit the temper of the people was not unlike the swell of the Bay of Biscay after a heavy gale. The fierce excitements of the war in Tonquin and the proclamations which had been issued by the Chinese mandarins offering rewards for the heads of French officers and soldiers, had aroused into fatal activity the rowdy spirits of the town, and a riot broke out in the previous September. Our mission chapel was robbed and nearly destroyed. The hospital was expected to fall. Bands of rioters assembled day by day before the building. But they seemed to want resolution to begin the assault. When they saw terrified patients not too ill to be removed leaving the place, and remembered that there were others lying in the wards, women and men, who must perish with the buildings, when they saw Dr. Wenyon with sublime indifference to their menace, going in and out and attending to his hospital duties as if nothing particular were happening, the riot devil was cowed within them. They might not understand the preaching of Christianity in the chapel, but they could understand Christianity in the hospital, where suffering and helplessness all the world over make us brothers and sisters in wretchedness and in prayers for relief. There was a cordon of charities round the hospital which these men could not pass; they feared to touch a building whose walls were salvation and whose gates praise."

A WORD FOR CRITICS.

AMONG the press criticisms on the preaching of Sam Jones, those which deal with his grammar and rhetoric have been the most severe. While in Chicago they were so frequent and so stinging that the impetuous evangelist lost patience. He bore it silently for some time, but at last he replied to them. He said:

"I can get along with a critic's criticisms as to my doctrine and teachings, but I have the profoundest contempt for those little nibblers who are always asking, 'Did you notice how he butchered the English grammar?' 'Did you observe how he annihilated rhetoric?' Now when a whale comes along and swallows me up, I can sort of stand it, but this way of being nibbled to death by minnows I have no patience with. I had just as soon be beaten on the head with a rubber balloon; it don't hurt any; it's just an annoyance. I would a great deal rather that a police-officer should knock me on the head with his club and be done with it at once than to be pounded by these rubber balloons. That just annoys me, and a decent man does hate to be annoyed."

HINTS TO STUDENTS OF PROPHECY.

By the Rev. Canon Stewart.

Peter's Injunction—Riveted Attention—The Diverted Pursuit—Two Remarkable Patterns—Prophets and Angels—The Prophetic Key Phrases—Sometimes Given to Obscure Men—Watch against Error—Direct Prayer—Paul's Pattern.

THE Apostle Peter has given us, as a master in the school of Christ, a guiding principle which ought to be our rule in this important department of study. He says (II Peter 1: 16-19): "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His majesty. For He received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to Him from the excellent glory, This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with Him in the holy mount. We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts."

It should be with earnest diligence—"riveted attention," for that is the meaning of the expression. To this he says we do well to take heed. It is the same word in the original, where it is said of the enlightened Lydia, when she was under the power and Spirit of Christ. It is there said that the Lord opened the heart of Lydia, that she "attended unto" the things spoken by Paul. With similar rapt attention the apostle says we do well to give "earnest heed" to this "More sure word of prophecy" concerning the Coming of our glorious Lord and Saviour.

This is in precise contrast, however, to the attitude and conduct of very many—the majority—of professing Christians. Many are —their chief attention—to money getting, family, home, fame, politics, or some one or other phase of the fleeting things of this age, whose fashion is quickly passing away. Many, too, who perceive the error of setting their affections on the things of this earth, are yet not so thoroughly awake as to perceive the importance of things to come that they keep their heart steadily fixed with riveted attention on the inspired prediction of them, and on what God has said as to the Second Coming of Christ. It may be they even regard it as a useless waste of time to allow their thoughts to rest again and again on this subject, to spend weeks and months in the study of what God has revealed about the coming future. But Peter's earnest exhortation to all who have the like "precious faith" is to give riveted attention to this grand, single "word of prophecy," as to the events soon to take place, when believing men and believing men's homes shall be redeemed out of all the evil into everlasting blessedness.

GIVING HEED

TWO REMARKABLE PATTERNS of such close attention to divine prediction are elsewhere mentioned by Peter, in order that he may give encouragement to his contemporaries in the practice of that diligence to which he exhorts them. He speaks of these holy men of old as having utterances given them by the power of the Spirit of God, which they could not themselves understand, but he describes them as "searching diligently what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."

Two main topics were running through their whole testimony about Jesus, both, at that time, being still future—Christ's sufferings and Christ's glory. How wondrous it is to think of Isaiah, or of Ezekiel, or of other prophets endeavoring to search into the meaning of the words that were coming from their own lips! Think of Isaiah as he wrote: "Thou shalt not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea;" think how Ezekiel would ponder as he gave his description of a wonderful polity hereafter, and added: "the name of the city from that day shall be Jehovah is there," or think of a whole chorus of prophetic Psalmists digesting their own sentences, when they sang: "Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof: let the field be joyful, and all that is therein; then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord: for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth." "Thou hast put all things under His feet, all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea." "The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice." "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth!" Think, I say, of these holy men of old digesting all these mysterious sentences, for mysterious they were to them.

And think also of the holy angels who serve God in the whole universe, longingly stooping down, and lovingly desiring to look into these things upon which the ancient prophets pondered. For surely, brethren, if those of like passions with ourselves who lived centuries ago, when the purposes of God were only partly wrought out were so sacredly inquisitive; and if the very angels of God, who had no need to be redeemed, have delighted to pause and meditate upon such inspired predictions; much more should we give these things our riveted attention now that the night is far spent, and the day is at hand. There can be but a very short time now before the Redeemer shall be here to bring in all the blessing, and all the eternal peace of the promised salvation.

I may be permitted to give a few hints as to some of

to be employed, in order that our meditation upon the prophetic pages of Scripture may be in accordance with the expressed language of this inspired epistle, "Take heed." First, it seems of great importance that constant attention should be paid to what Bishop Wordsworth called "the catch words"—or key phrases, in the various prophets, in which the Holy Spirit is pleased again and again to repeat Himself. He puts the same remarkable word or phrase into the midst of a new context, so that the second context can help one who studies and compares Scripture with Scripture, to understand both.

Then, secondly, as it pleases the Holy Spirit to give the key-word sometimes to a humble but devout brother, and sometimes to one in a higher place, the student of prophecy should be

by every devout neighbor. Any one who is dogmatic, as if he and he alone had wisdom given to him, may be certain by that very dogmatism that he is on the wrong tack. There will always be a loving readiness to be taught by our brethren, and to profit by their discoveries of truth, wherever there is a real fellowship with the Holy Spirit.

There is a third thing that may appear in contrast to the second: That no man should be called "Rabbi," or Master, upon the earth, inasmuch as all being human, are liable to err, and inasmuch as those who might be exalted by reason of the greatness of the revelation made to them, like Paul, are troubled by some thorn in the flesh, some infirmity of their mind or spirit, so that a certain measure of error creeps in even in the midst of their understanding of what has been written. Therefore, with a disciple's readiness to be taught, there should be a constant watchfulness against error.

The fourth, and main consideration is: Let there be direct prayer to the Giver of prophecy to cause His presence to be felt in every mind whenever that word of prophecy has diligent heed given to it. I suppose very few of us have ever acted fully according to in the First Epistle to the Ephesians without finding profit. He put up the direct prayer that he might know the meaning of prophecy, as follows: "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of Glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him; the eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of His calling (whatever that hope may be), and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints." Let us also be diligent in prayer, that we may not merely be ready to accept what this system or that system, however excellent, may suggest to us among our human neighbors, but may understand and constantly recollect and love the hope to which God Himself is calling us by His written Word.

A fifth thought is this: Watch the times as they pass in order that the earliest sign of His redemption, which is quickly drawing nigh, may be discovered.

OUR AMERICAN HEATHEN.

By Rev. W. F. Re Qua.

MISSIONARY work among the Indians is of first importance; I mean Gospel evangelism ought to precede strictly educational work. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," but much of modern missionary enterprise looks as though it were pushed upon the principle that wisdom is the beginning of the fear of the Lord, and that the order of the divine commission insisted on the culture of the intellect, appeal to the head, after this appeal to the heart—a mistake, I believe, that ought to be rectified for the sake of the grave though thoughtless reflection it casts on God's wisdom in directing His work, and the possible greater advancement of it, it may have stayed.

As an instance in point, a missionary to Greenland spent several years in educating the inhabitants, yet no conversions; finally, one day he was reading about Christ from John's record, when one of his pupils came to his room, heard the plain story, was touched by it, accepted the Saviour, and was happy in His favor. The missionary afterward sought their conversion first.

The unparalleled success of the Salvation Army in practical evangelization of the civilized and heathen masses is well worth careful study in the interests of a more rapid gospelization of the heathen. With a thorough appreciation of all that has been wrought in missionism, I am of the persuasion that more by half might have been achieved by an observance of the order of the Gospel rule for Christian work.

A little personal observation justifies my saying that the true way of access to the Indian is through the heart; not that I would have education delayed among them until they are first brought to Christ, but I would urge that a greater prominence be given to a plain, spirited preaching of Christ. At a grove meeting which I attended there were present a few Indians. I spoke in the evening, or, rather, "the Spirit of the Lord spake by me." After the service a fine-looking Indian young man came to me, motioned to me to come with him. He not able to speak English, nor I to understand Indian, I went out a little way into the grove with him, and there by signs unmistakable I could see God was talking with him. I talked in my own tongue and by signs to him of Christ, and motioned to him to kneel down. We both prayed God for His forgiveness. Of course the Father answered. With one hand on his breast and the other raised to heaven, tears running over his bronzed cheek glistening in the moonshine, he "made a loud noise unto the Lord," a "joyful noise," and I knew pardon had come to his soul.

Now, dear reader, would you like to have an interest in saving the poor Indians? I want to tell you I've been waiting for some way to open so I might throw my life into Indian missionary work; my soul is full of it; I am saying to the Lord: "Here am I, send me." I am willing to forego my present pleasant surroundings, with as good an outlook for the future as God often gives a young man of thirty years of age; settled as pastor over a church of nearly four hundred members, with a correspondingly large salary, and a larger place in the hearts of the people in the church and city the Lord has given me. Still, I have felt for some time moved to lay this whole matter before the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, asking for God how many would like to have fifty cents a year interest in the work, and more if you like, holding myself in readiness to take Christ to our American heathen, if God shall put it in your heart to further the cause. I want to take a good tent and a portable organ, as God has given me ability to play and sing.

It is by the kindness of the editor that I am permitted to lay this matter between you and the Lord, for you to say whether I shall go, by writing me at 84½ Main Street, Aurora, Ill.

For references, if you desire, you may write to Rev. Thomas Galt, Presbyterian pastor; Rev. T. R. Strobbridge, Methodist pastor; Rev. Scudder, Congregational pastor, of this city.

[Our friend Mr. Re Qua has now told his own story to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is fair to them and him that we add a few words of explanation. It is now some months since Mr. Re Qua first broached the subject of an appeal to our readers for funds to enable him to go on a missionary expedition to the Indians. It seemed to us at the time a serious matter for a young man, with a delicate wife, to leave his home, give up an assured income, and resign a pastorate, in which God is blessing him, for this object. We admired the spirit of self-sacrifice which animated him, but it seemed to us that the work was rather for a man who had not formed any ties, pastoral or domestic. But Mr. Re Qua was led to the belief that he was called to the work, and that it would be through the readers of this journal that he would be sent. The conviction grew upon him, and some of his friends at Aurora who wrote us confirmed him in the belief. There were other indications that God was leading him which we could not disregard. We have therefore allowed him to make his own appeal, which he has done in the above article, and the one published on March 25th (p. 182). There is no need for us to advocate the project or to urge our readers to respond. The matter is committed to the Lord's hand, and He will open the way for Mr. Re Qua to go if that is His will.—ED.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

Owing to Decoration Day Being this Year observed on Monday, May 31st, that day was a legal holiday. It was therefore necessary for the CHRISTIAN HERALD to go to press a day earlier than usual.

The President's Marriage, About Which there has been so much mystery, was on Friday last definitely announced by Mr. Cleveland to his Cabinet. The Secretaries and their wives were formally invited to attend the ceremony in the White House, on June 2d. Since the first rumors were set afloat some months ago there have been numerous reports circulated denying it, and the President, according to his usual habit, has remained silent. There was therefore no absolute certainty until Mr. Cleveland made his announcement to the Cabinet on Friday. Miss Folsom arrived in New York on Thursday, from Europe, by the steamer Noordland. She is described as tall, handsome, and in complexion a light brunette. Her eyes, which are blue, are large and beautiful, with long black lashes. Her complexion is very clear. Her manner is frank and winning, and is remarkably free from affectation of any description. President Cleveland has not led a particularly peaceful or happy life since his inauguration, as he has had to encounter the opposition of his political opponents, and has not received a cordial support from his own party. It may therefore be hoped that the change he is now making will not add to his worries, but conduce to his domestic felicity, and that he will, from his personal experience, be able to indorse the words of the wise king, "Whose findeth a wife findeth a good thing."

Congress has Now Given the President Authority to deny to the vessels of any foreign country commercial privileges in our ports when the same privileges are denied to American vessels in the ports of that country. While it applies equally to all foreign vessels and grants a power to which there is no valid objection, it is intended as a retaliation upon Canada for excluding our fishing vessels from the privilege of buying bait and other supplies in her ports. It does not appear that this action will do much toward the settlement of the pending trouble between the United States and Canada. The Canadians do not want to come to us to buy bait, and on all other matters there is no reason for retaliation.

The Senate Committee on Commerce has given its endorsement to the Eads scheme of solving the Panama problem. It favorably reported last week the Ship Railroad bill which Eads advocates. This report seems to ignore the statements made by the expeditions which have been sent from time to time to the isthmus to examine routes, with the view of deciding on the best way of making a transit across the isthmus. It does not appear that the Eads scheme finds favor among engineers and experts whose opinions are entitled to respect. The testimony of Eads and his colleagues has, however, been sufficient to convince the committee that the scheme is a practicable one and that the proposed railway would be successful and very profitable. A Government guarantee is therefore sought to encourage the capitalists and "to give them the assurance that the Government will not embark in a competing enterprise."

One More Attempt to Control the Mississippi River is proposed in a report from the Senate Committee, to which the problem was referred. There is a hopelessness about the report that is not a gratifying sign. In reviewing the history of the various efforts that have been made, the committee note that after engaging the attention of the people for one hundred and fifty years, the problem is still unsolved. In 1858 the river was reported to be leveed from Cape Girardeau to New Orleans on both sides, yet the overflows were more destructive than ever before. The revetment and abutment systems cost eight millions, but did not cure the evil. Six millions were spent on the Eads jetties, yet the overflows continued and increased. At this time there seems, the report says, only one more experiment left to be tried—that is, open and deepen the Lake Borgne outlet. By this outlet the water of the river will reach the same ocean level by a run of ten miles which it now attains after coursing one hundred and ten miles.

Herr Most, the German Anarchist, was on Friday found guilty by a jury of misdemeanor, the charge on which he was tried. He made a speech at his trial in his own defence, in which he admitted that he had advised the workmen to arm themselves, and that he told them they might have cannon, rifles, or bombs if they pleased. In conclusion he told the jury that if they thought a man should be put in prison for having advised the people to defend themselves against unlawful acts, they would find him guilty. Apparently they did think so, and very justly, because there are proper ways of finding out whether an act is lawful, and means are provided for defence by the law much more in harmony with civilization than dynamite bombs. The penalty for the offence of which Most was found guilty, is one year's imprisonment and a fine of $500. Herr Most will have an opportunity in prison of learning that though American institutions permit free speech, they are able to prevent that liberty being abused.

The Prohibitionists of New Jersey Held a State Convention at Newark on Friday. Much interest was attached to their proceedings because temperance has made rapid strides in that State during the past two years, and earnest efforts have been made to arrange a union between the Prohibition and the Republican parties. Many of the converts to Prohibition were Republicans, who were naturally reluctant to sever their political connection with the party, while the Republicans, on their side, were reluctant to lose the support of the men who have become Prohibitionists. A conference of Republicans was therefore held at Trenton, on Wednesday, May 26th, to see what concessions could be made to Prohibitionists, so as to keep them within the party. The result is seen in a resolution passed by the Prohibition Convention, which shows that the Prohibitionists of New Jersey are fully determined not to yield any point of their platform. It declared emphatically for "both State and national constitutional prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of all alcoholic beverages, and the enforcement thereof by appropriate legislation administered by officials thoroughly in sympathy with the same." Evidently in New Jersey there is to be no deal, and whether Republicans or Democrats carry the State the Prohibitionists will stand apart.

Mr. Gladstone has Evidently Abandoned the hope of passing his bill for Home Rule in Ireland in its present shape. He is anxious, however, to have the House of Commons indorse the principle of the bill, and leave the details of the scheme to give effect to the principle, to future consideration. To secure this indorsement he summoned a meeting of "all members of the party who, while retaining full freedom in all particulars respecting the Irish Government bill, are desirous to vote to establish a legislative body in Dublin to manage affairs specifically and exclusively Irish." At the meeting which was held on Thursday last Mr. Gladstone promised that if the party would vote for the second reading of the bill, which is regarded always as an approval of the object contemplated by a measure, he would not proceed further with this measure, but would prepare a new one in which the features which were objectionable to a large number of his supporters would be modified or eliminated. He particularly referred to the clause which here, as well as in England, is regarded as a fatal defect—the clause which excludes Irish representatives from the British Parliament. It is wrong in principle because it involves the taxation of a people who are not represented in the Legislature imposing taxation. There is but one solution of that difficulty, and that is the Federal principle of our Constitution, by which, though every State governs itself, it has a share in the Federal Government. Mr. Gladstone proposed a clumsy modification of his original scheme to avoid the difficulty, but it is little likely to be adopted. If England were not so fearful of imitating America, she need not be puzzled long by the problem.

Mr. C. H. Spurgeon has Caused General Surprise by placing himself on record on the Irish question. He seldom meddles in politics, but has apparently been carried away on this question by the strong public feeling. In a letter he has published he asks: "What has Ulster done to be cast off?" And adds: "The whole scheme is full of dangers and absurdities, as if conceived by a madman. Yet I am sure that Mr. Gladstone believes he is only doing justice and acting for the good of all. I consider that he is making one of those mistakes only made by great and well-meaning men." It will be seen that Mr. Spurgeon's objections are based on the religious aspect of the question. He is afraid that without the protection of England the Protestants of Ulster would be crushed.

The Progress of Mormonism in Switzerland is causing public alarm. The European correspondent of the New York Herald in a cablegram to that journal says: "The Mormon missionaries have already pitched their tents in twenty or thirty places, notably Berne, Bale, Geneva, Zurich and Schaffhausen, where they muster several hundred strong and have led astray many maidens. Public attention was some time ago vainly directed to this new and obnoxious crusade. The increase of the nuisance has now grown alarming, and the Swiss are beginning to clamor for the ejection of the invaders. The headquarters of the Mormon army at present seems to be at Berne, whence the movement is gradually spreading to the rest of Switzerland and Germany." The victims are chiefly the uneducated people who have a claim on the protection of their Government.

A Remarkable Revival, Extending Through-out the town, is reported from Sardis, Miss. It commenced in the Presbyterian Church, was followed by an awakening in the Baptist Church, and finally the Methodist Church was thronged by anxious inquirers. About two hundred persons have made a profession of faith, and all the saloons in the town have been closed.

Open-Air Services in the Battery Park of New York will be held again this summer on Sunday afternoons. During the services of last year much good was done. The singing attracted large crowds who attend no place of worship, and opportunities were afforded for personal work. Rev. C. C. Goss has applied for and received the permission of the Park Commissioners to use the music-stand in the Park. Mr. C. M. Fisher has taken charge of the musical arrangements.

The Imprisonment of Rev. H. L. Hastings of Boston, for non-payment of the fine imposed upon him for preaching on the city common has drawn from him a trenchant letter from his cell to the members of the Massachusetts Legislature. He makes a comparison between the severity with which his offence has been punished, and the lenity shown to those who sell liquor without a license. That he should be in jail while only nineteen verdicts of guilty were finally obtained in nine hundred and seventy-one cases of illegal liquor-selling is a disgrace to the commonwealth.

A Temperance Hospital has been Opened in Chicago under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Frances E. Willard is taking the lead in the movement. The cardinal principle of the hospital will be the treatment of all diseases without the use of alcoholic stimulants. A special provision, however, is made that in certain cases alcohol may be administered if, in the opinion of all the physicians in the council, that drug will save a life in danger. Both allopathic and homoeopathic physicians are connected with the hospital. The present capacity of the institution is thirty beds, of which sixteen are free.

The Annual Picnic of Dr. Talmage's Church will this year be a more extensive affair than that of last year. The Thousand Islands is to be its destination. The party will leave Brooklyn June 26th, and will travel over the West Shore Railroad. Dr. Talmage and all the trustees of the Tabernacle will be of the company. Some of the party propose continuing the journey from the Thousand Islands to Montreal, where they will remain two days. The excursion is open only to members of the congregation and their personal friends. Steamers and yachts have been engaged at Alexandria Bay to take the party through the Thousand Islands, some distance down the St. Lawrence, and over to the Canadian side. The Crossman House and the Thousand Islands at Alexandria Bay have been engaged for the accommodation of the party from June 27th to 29th.

The Hebrew-Christian Church at 17 St. Mark's Place, New York, celebrated the Lord's Supper on Sunday evening, May 6th. The pastor, Rev. Jacob Freshman, preached from Isaiah 53 : 6. Two converted Hebrews and one Hebrew lady then united with the church. They answered all the questions according to the Manual of the First Hebrew-Christian Church in America.

The National Temperance Society is Able to issue a very gratifying report this year both of its work and its finances. It is a cheering indication of the progress of temperance principles. Mr. J. N. Stearns, the excellent secretary of the Society, says : "We come to the close of our fiscal year with a better financial exhibit than ever before in the history of the Society. No only have the receipts been greater in the Publication Department, but the donations for the Missionary Fund have been greater than for many years past, and our indebtedness less than any preceding anniversary day." The total receipts were as follows : Memberships and donations, $9336.61 ; legacies, $500 ; interest on invested funds, $723.04 ; for publications, $52,953.76. Total receipts, $63,513.41 ; total expenses, $63,550.05.

The Complaint of a Husband Came Before the Supreme Court of New York last week. He testified that a year ago, while living with his wife and family in Harlem, a fire broke out in their house. He succeeded, at imminent peril to himself, in getting his wife and two of his children to the roof, and then descended to rescue his youngest boy. He was exhausted with his exertions, and fell insensible while carrying the child up the ladder. The child died, and the man was so badly burned that, though rescued by the firemen, his life was despaired of for some time. He remained several months in the hospital, and when discharged he immediately sought his wife. To his astonishment he discovered that she had calculated upon his death, and his appearance was an embarrassment to her. She firmly refused to receive him into the house she was living in, or to live with him anywhere else. If the husband's statement of his experience is true, he has reason to complain of the ingratitude of the woman for whom he risked his life. Her conduct will doubtless be condemned by many who are themselves guilty of similar ingratitude. They know that the Saviour voluntarily died to save them, yet by their actions they repudiate His claims upon them (Rom. 14 : 9).

An Old Bachelor's Gratitude has been Mani-fested in an unexpected way at Pittstown, N. Y. Some years ago an old man who had been a teacher of penmanship was wandering about Rensselaer County, apparently without a home or a friend. He made overtures to several families with the view of becoming a member of their households, but no one seemed disposed to take him in. At length he became acquainted with a gentleman of Pittstown who has four children. The old bachelor was kind to the children, and they conceived a great affection for him. Their father was sorry for the lonely old man, and gave him a general invitation to come to his house as often as he would, and stay as long as he pleased. The old bachelor was delighted, and availed himself freely of the offer. He was made welcome, and continued to spend a considerable part of his time there until his death, which occurred recently. To the surprise of all who knew him, it was then found that the old man possessed considerable personal property. It was all bequeathed to the family of the friend who had made his declining years cheerful. A legacy was left to each relative of the hospitable man. Each of his children receives three thousand dollars, his mother a similar sum, and his wife gets the residue. The will was probated at Troy, N. Y., on May 25th. Obedience to the Apostolic injunction has brought a large return (Heb. 13 : 2).

A Soldier's Respect for his General was Un-expectedly manifested in an incident which is related in some recently published reminiscences published in the Chicago Inter-Ocean. During the war General Buell's troops were on one occasion encamped near Cave Springs. The general issued an order that the men were to be kept from polluting one fine spring, but they were very thirsty, and crowded each other into the water in spite of the guard. General Buell, hearing of it, went in his stern, official dignity to the spring to stand guard himself. He wore at the time a little straw hat and his fatigue uniform. A large, energetic six-footer came up very thirsty and impatient to fill his canteen. He rubbed against Buell as he passed, and stepped with one foot in the water to fill his cup. Buell said quietly but decidedly : "Take your foot out, sir." Still stooping, the six-footer looked up and said : "You go to Greenland's icy mountains. I don't want any quartermaster's clerk ordering me around." For an instant the commander was stunned by the unexpected reply. Then he said quietly, but emphatically : "General Buell orders you to take your foot—out—of—that—water." The man looked up quickly and said : "I'll do it, sir. If General Buell would order me to jump head first into a cannon I would do it. Out comes the foot. Why didn't you say so before?" The commander of the Army of the Ohio could not have received more gratifying homage. That is the spirit of the follower of Christ. He does not hesitate about any action after he learns that it is commanded by his Lord (Acts 21 : 13).

An Effectual Preventive of Apache Raids is suggested by Senator Fair, of Nevada. He advocates the Indians being placed on the Island of Santa Catalina. He says : "It is isolated and too far from the shore for any ordinary boat to reach it. My idea is that if the Apaches were put on this island they would require no guards, and all that would be needed would be a small steam tender and crew to run between the island and the port of Wilmington, for the purposes of communication and supply. This would, in my opinion, set the Apache question at rest forever ; would save the country many valuable lives, and the Government millions of money." Whether the Apaches, being thus precluded from murdering the whites, would take to killing each other, the Senator does not predict ; but it does not seem improbable, judging by the ferocity for which they are notorious. Unless their passions were restrained under the new circumstances, Santa Catalina would be an awful place, even for the Indians themselves, though the United States did not administer any punishment. The most horrible idea of hell is that produced by the same conception of devilish natures in full development and without restraint (Ps. 9 : 17).

A Senator's Forgetfulness of the Golden Rule caused him to appear in a ridiculous position during the sitting of a committee recently. The question under debate in the Senate Committee on Agriculture was whether a tax of ten cents a pound should be imposed on oleomargarine. Certain members of the Committee advocated it on the ground that it would discourage butter merchants from selling the article as butter. Their leader was Senator Warner Miller, of New York, who has become rich by the manufacture of wood pulp. He urged that so much stuff was sold as butter which was nothing but oleomargarine that it would be a good thing if the latter could be taxed out of existence. An opponent then observed that there were other imitations to which the principle would apply, and said : "In all our Government contracts for paper, our greatest trouble is to see that the contractors do not cheat by putting in wood pulp. What is bought for all rag linen paper is often half wood pulp. Don't you think we had better tax wood pulp on the ground that it is an imitation?" The Senator did not encourage the idea. He could not be charged with disobeying the Apostolic injunction, but he obeyed it in a sense opposite to that intended by the Apostle (Phil. 2 : 4).

The Value of a Dog's Coat, it Appears, De-pends on where the animal has passed his life. The Miner, of Bodie, Cal., states that for several months a mongrel dog has spent his time in wandering about the Mono mine. He rides up and down on the cages, runs through drifts and cross-cuts, and goes all over and through the mine perhaps oftener than any miner on the place. He is on friendly terms with every man connected with the mine, and is regarded as a regular member of the fraternity. It occurred to some of the men that if Towser was washed he would do more credit to himself and them at a certain public appearance when he would be sure to show himself. They therefore subjected him to a thorough ablution, and as they were at work upon him they noticed on his coat some glistening specks, the value of which they understood. This prompted them to cleanse thoroughly every hair on the dog's body and to pan the water afterward. The total proceeds of Towser's coat were twenty-three dollars in pure gold. If his antecedents had not been known it would not have been difficult to guess where he had been. So it is with moral character ; no man can habitually frequent any place, good or bad, without traces of its influence remaining upon him (Prov. 22 : 24, 25).

ZEALOUS, BUT WRONG.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved. For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God."—ROMANS 10: 1, 2, 3.

Paul Praying for His Enemies—People in Need of Prayer—The Self-Righteous—I. Reasons for Concern—They are Zealous—Rarity of Religious Zeal—The Mischief a Zealous Man May Do—The Good He Might Do—II. What they Really are—Their Extensive Ignorance—III. What they Do—The Inevitable Failure—IV. What they Will Not Do—Will Not Submit.

WE ought to have an intense longing for the salvation of all sorts of men, and especially for those, if there are any, that treat us badly. We should never wish them ill, not for a moment; but in proportion to their malice should be our intense desire for their good. Israel had persecuted Paul everywhere with the bitterest imaginable hate. When he addressed them in their synagogues, they rushed upon him in their fury. When he let them alone, and preached quietly to the Gentiles, they made a mob, dragged him before the magistrates, charged him with causing a tumult, and either stoned him, or beat him with rods. He was "an Israelite indeed," but his people regarded him as a turncoat indeed, because he had become a Christian. Mad as they were against all Christians, they had a special spite and fury against the apostate Pharisee. Paul's only reply to all their infuriated malice is this gentle assertion: "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved."

I would bring before you one peculiar class of persons whose conversion some of us should very earnestly pray for. They are the kind of people who are here described by the apostle: Israelites, religious people, intensely religious in their way, although that way is not the way of truth. They have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. They are righteous people, self-righteous people, people that have done no ill, but, on the contrary, have labored to do a great deal of good. They are running, and running well, but they are not running in the right road. They are laboring, and laboring hard, but they are not laboring in the right style; and so they will miss their reward. Many of these people are around us, and very admirable people they are in many ways; but their condition causes us the utmost anxiety.

I. And first, why are we

for these people? Because they are so zealous. They have a zeal of God. I feel right glad to meet with a zealous man nowadays, for zeal for God has become a rare quality in the land. You see plenty of zeal where politics are concerned. Fashion and art and society and literature, each one evokes zeal of a certain kind; but we are not overdone with those who are zealous in the matter of religion. We seem to be pretty nearly gone to sleep as to essentials of creed and worship. Who is zealous? Who burns with holy ardor? Who is consumed with sacred enthusiasm? If anybody comes to be a little zealous above others, he is straightway condemned. The man of fervent spirit is laughed at as "a hot gospeller:" he is called fanatical, and great efforts are made to put him down. I fear that both the wise and the foolish virgins are going to sleep at this present time. There is a dullness in the religious world, as if we had passed into a dull, thick, autumn fog. We want a great and general revival.

Meanwhile, when we do meet with people who are zealous, we take an interest in them. I love to meet with those who believe in something, and who work under the pressure of their belief, and give their strength to the carrying out of what they believe to be the will of God. It does seem a very great pity that any zeal should be wasted, and that any one full of zeal should yet miss his way. We fear that there are some who will do so. It is of no use to be zealous if you are zealous in a wrong cause; but when we meet with any who are such, I say that they become peculiarly the object of a Christian's prayers. Pray for the zealous with all your hearts, for it is such a pity that one of them should go astray.

Again, they should be specially the subject of our prayers, because they may go so very wrong, and may do so much mischief to others. Those who have no life nor energy may easily ruin themselves, but they are not likely to harm others; whereas a mistaken zealot is like in his hand. Persons who are zealous, and are under a mistake, may do such a deal of mischief! I do not doubt that many who burned the martyrs were quite as sincere in their faith as those whom they burned. In fact, it must have taken an awful amount of sincerity in the case of some to have been able to believe that the cruelties which they practised were really pleasing to God. We cannot doubt that they had such sincerity. Documents, written by men who stained their hands with the blood of Protestants, prove that some of them had a right heart toward God. In their mistaken zeal for God, and truth, and Church unity, they believed that they were crushing out a very deadly error, and that the persons whom they sent to prison and to death were criminals that ought to be exterminated, because they were destroyers of the souls of men.

Take heed that none of you fall into a persecuting spirit through your zeal for the Gospel. A good woman may be intensely zealous, and for that reason she may say, "I will not have a servant in my house who does not go to my place of worship." I have known landlords, wonderfully zealous for the faith, who have therefore turned every Dissenter out of their cottages, and have refused to let one of their farms to a Nonconformist. I do not wonder at their conduct; if they are zealous, and at the same time blind, they will naturally take to exterminating the children of God. They say strong things and bitter things, and then proceed to do cruel things—very cruel things—verily believing that, in all that they do, they are doing God service, not thinking that they are violating who is Lord of the consciences of men. They would not oppose the will of God if they knew it; and yet they are doing so. Another reason why we long to see the zealous converted is this—because they would be so useful. The man that is desperately earnest in a wrong way, if you can but show him his wrong, and teach him what is right, will be just as earnest in the right way. Oh, what splendid Christians some would make who are now such devotees of superstition! Despite their superstition, I look upon many High Churchmen with admiration. Up in the morning early, or at night late, ready to practise all kinds of mortifications, to give their very bodies to be burned, and all their substance in alms, ready to offer prayers without number, and to be obedient to rites without end—what more could external religion demand of mortal men? Oh, if we could get these to sit at Jesus' feet, and leave the phylacteries and the broad-bordered garments, and worship God in spirit, and have no confidence in the flesh, what grand people they would make!

Once more, we are bound to make these people the subject of specially earnest prayer because it is so difficult to convert them. It requires the power of God to convert anybody really; but there seems to be a double manifestation of power in the conversion of a down-right bigot when his bigotry is associated with dense ignorance and gross error. "Oh," says he, "I do that which is right. I am strict in my religion. My righteousness will save me." You cannot get him out of that. It is easier to get a sinner out of his sin than a self-righteous man out of his self-righteousness. Conceit of our own righteousness sticks to us as the skin to the flesh. O God! who but Thou canst draw a man out of this miry clay of self-righteousness? Therefore do we cry to Thee, of Thy great grace, to do it. For these and many other reasons those who have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge, must have a chief place in our importunate prayers.

II. And secondly, about these people,

WHAT IS IT THAT THEY ARE

according to our text? These people will not like the text, nor yet like me for honestly explaining it. According to our text, it is very clear that these good people are ignorant. "For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, go about to establish their own righteousness." Listen! There are many who are quite ignorant as to the natural righteousness of God's character. They do not know how intensely He hates sin, how His anger burns against injustice and untruth. Again, they are ignorant of the righteousness of the law. Indeed, there is awful ignorance about that. You may hear the ten commandments read every Sabbath-day, and I think that it is a good thing to have them read, and a good thing to have them posted up where they can be read, but you will not know anything about them by merely reading them. There is a depth of meaning in those commandments, of which self-righteous persons are ignorant. For instance, when they read, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," does it strike most men's minds that even a lascivious look breaks that commandment? Do they reflect that not only acts of fornication and uncleanness, but indecent words, thoughts, and looks are forbidden by that command? Could we behold the law in all its full-orbed majesty, we should as soon expect to hold the sun in the hollow of our right hand as to fulfil the law in all its length and breadth.

A HIGH STANDARD.

Further than this, dear friends, a man that is self-righteous, and hopes to get to heaven by his works and his religion, is ignorant of God's righteous requirements with regard to his own heart. God requires not only that thou shouldst do that which is right, but that thou shouldst think that which is right, that thou shouldst love that which is right, ay, and that thou shouldst be that which is right. If it were possible to keep the hands right in all things, yet the heart might all the while be willing and anxious to move the hands amiss, and after all it is the way of the heart which is the true gauge of the man's life. What sayest thou to this? Are not many grossly ignorant of this?

And then, again, all persons who are self-righteous must surely be ignorant of God's righteousness in another sense—namely, they are ignorant that God has prepared a better righteousness for us. The Lord God has prepared for man a perfect and divine righteousness, by which He justifieth the ungodly. He has sent His own Son into the world, pure in heart and pure in life, to work out that righteousness. The death of Christ upon the tree was an extravagance—a needless extravagance, if men can be saved without it; and if any man can be saved without Christ, saved by his own works, and saved by the principle of the law, then for him is Christ dead in vain.

III. That brings me to my third point, which is this: I have shown you why they should be prayed for. I have shown you that they are ignorant. Now I am going to show you

WHAT THEY DO.

According to the text they are going about to establish their own righteousness. I do not know whether I can give you the idea which this language suggests to my mind, but it is this: they have bad foundations for a house, and bad materials, and bad mortar, and they themselves are by no means good workmen. They have built up quite a height of wall to make a shelter for themselves, but it tumbles down. Never mind; they are very industrious, and so they set to work to put it up again. They are perseveringly determined, somehow or other, to build up a righteousness of their own. That is the meaning of this text. They go about to set up, to establish—to make to stand—their own righteousness, and it is such that it falls down of its own weight, and whenever it tumbles down they set it up again. They go about to do it; that is, they invent all sorts of ways; they go to the ends of the earth to find another bit of stone that will just wedge in and help to settle the corner-stone. All their industry is spent in trying to set up this thing, which is not worth a button when it is set up. Alas, that folly should be so desperately entrenched in the heart of man, that he will spend his whole life in a persevering attempt to insult his Maker by preparing a righteousness of his own, when his Maker has already wrought out, and brought in, a righteousness perfect in every respect!

While I am preaching about this I am thinking of myself, and smiling and yet mourning to think how, in the days of my ignorance, I myself tried this ridiculous pastime. The pictures which I shall paint will be drawn from my own personal experience. At first the man says: "I shall be saved, for I have kept the law. What lack I yet?" Now, a very small hole will let enough light into the man's heart to force him to see that this pretence will not answer. When driven from this foolish hope, the man readily sets up another. If he cannot work, then a man tries to feel—and I know

I TRIED TO FEEL.

Or else he cries: "I must join a bit of religion to my pure morals. I do not quite understand how the combination is to be made; but we have to maintain a reputation for righteousness, and we must do it by hook or by crook. It is true that I have not kept the law. Well, then, I will pray every morning and pray every night very regularly, and take a good long time over it, too, when I do not go to sleep, or when I do not wake up too late! And I will read so much of the Bible every day; a grand thing that! And if I can get through the Bible in a certain time that will score one, will it not? Then I shall attend regularly a place of worship; and then, I think—well, I must be baptized, perhaps, or at any rate confirmed, or I must go to the sacrament; and when I have done all this, do you not think it will come pretty square?" If a man's conscience is awake, it will not come square. The man says: "No, I do not feel righteous after all! There is SOMETHING AMISS."

Conscience begins to call out: "It will not do." Peradventure, the man is taken ill. He thinks that he is going to die, and he says: "Alas, I could not die with so poor a hope as this! This boat would never carry me across the river Jordan. I can see that it leaks very terribly. There are a hundred points in which my hope utterly fails me. What shall I do?" Well, then, he must keep his wretched pretence afloat somehow; and so he cries: "At length I must go in for something thunderingly good. I will give a lot of money away." If he is a rich man, he says: "I will endow an almshouse. You see I need not give the money till I die. That will do very well. I had better keep it while I am alive, and then leave it when I cannot keep it. Won't it be a splendid thing? And if I put a painted window in a church, surely that will go a long way; or I will give a lump sum to a hospital."

But, oh, men will go about to set up their own righteousness; and I will tell you what some of them will do to-night! "Ah!" they will say, "quite right, Mr. Spurgeon. Quite right. I cannot bear that work-mongering and self-justification; but I hope that I shall be saved because I feel so deeply my sinfulness, and I groan so heavily under a sense of guilt." You trust to that, do you? It is only another form of trusting to your own works. I must rout you out of your feelings, as well as out of your works. You may just as well trust in the one thing that comes of you, as in the other thing that comes of you. Your salvation lies absolutely outside of yourself, in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, and not in what you do, but in what He is. If you add to that foundation stick or stone of your own—thought, feeling, or work of your own—by way of trusting in it, you have spoiled the salvation of Christ. It shall never be

"CHRIST AND COMPANY."

Hence, be sure that if Jesus is to save you, you must let Him do it, and you yourself must stand out of the way. "What! am I not to work?" Oh, yes! Work as hard as ever you like if He has saved you; but as to the salvation itself, that is with Him. Our Lord is not going to have any discord in heaven; you shall all sing His praises there, or never sing at all. There will be no divided praise; but the strain shall be set to the tune of Salvation all of grace. "Salvation to our God that sits upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever."

IV. The fourth thing is,

WHAT THEY WILL NOT DO.

"Going about to establish their own righteousness, they have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." "They have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." Why, there are some that have not submitted even to hear it! If you speak to them about it, they are wrapped up in an idea of their own righteous perfectness, and they really cannot endure to hear themselves talked to as if they were common sinners. Are they not good enough of themselves? "Sinners saved by grace!" they say, "Salvation by faith! It is all very well for the commonalty; but it does not do for ladies and gentlemen like us. We were always so good." Very well, then; if that really is the case, you know there is a heaven for the commonalty, and it is highly probable that you ladies and gentlemen are too good to go there. Where will you go? There is but one way to heaven, and that way is closed against the proud; and if you choose to be so proud, you will close it against yourself, and we cannot help you.

And then there are others who, when they hear it, will not admit that they need it. "What, sir! Must I go down on my knees? Must I confess that I am a sinner, a real sinner? Must I come before God as if I had been a criminal? Must I stand in the dock, and plead guilty?" Yes, you must, or else you will never be saved. "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick." Off with that helmet of obstinacy! Down with the plumes of pride! Thou must come to God on thy bended knees, with as one who is only fit to die, and to be cast into hell, for He will never save thee on any other terms. Dost thou reply, "I will never submit to such a humiliation?" God will never alter His terms to please you.

Again, there are others who will not submit to the spirit of it—to the influence of it, for you must know that the spirit of free grace is this—if God saves me for nothing, then I belong to Him forever and ever. If He forgives me every sin simply because I believe in Jesus, then I will hate every sin, and flee from it. The virtue I aimed at before, in my own strength, I will now ask for from His Holy Spirit. The goodness that I thought I had, but never had, I will seek to have as a gift of His grace wrought in me; and I, because of His great goodness to me, will live to Him, and will not henceforth serve myself or serve sin, but will serve Him who has bought me with His precious blood. Many will not submit to that; yet they can never be saved from sin unless they yield themselves as the blood-bought servants of Christ. I must earnestly pray that many of you may submit to the righteousness of Christ. Yield yourselves up; trust in Christ; believe in Him who died for sinners; take Him to be your Saviour to-night.

With my whole soul I offer the prayer of my text this night; and do you also, dear friends, keep on praying. I ask all of you Christian people to insert a special petition into all your prayers, and to keep it there—"O Lord, save by Thy grace those who have a zeal for Thee, which is not according to knowledge! Grant that they may not go about to establish their own righteousness, but may submit themselves unto the righteousness of God!" Amen and Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

TEN HOURS IN THE MAMMOTH CAVE.*

WE came to the fissure which is the entrance to the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, the largest natural cavern on the crust of the earth ever explored by man. In front of the peristyle, the dimensions and form of which are far from indicating the wonders to which they lead, negroes furnished with miners' lamps are generally found waiting; these are the authorized guides to the twenty or twenty-five miles of underground passages already explored in this dark labyrinth. One of these negroes, named Mat, had been recommended to me. I did not bargain with him, but followed him lamp in hand down the fifty or sixty damp steps which led to a gallery twenty yards in height, which has been baptized with the name of the great naturalist, Audubon. It is fully one thousand yards in length, and terminates in a large room called the Rotunda, from which radiate a great number of corridors. One of them, called the Great Vestibule, leads by a pretty rapid descent into a hall nearly one hundred yards in circumference, and whose arched roof rises in an immense nave. On account of its form and magnificence, and the grand stalactites with which it is decorated, it has been called the Gothic church.

In fact, between the alabaster pillars, raised by the infiltrations of water, saturated with lime and silica, can be seen the stalls and even the pulpit, from which more than one Protestant minister has preached the Gospel. The audience with their torches must have recalled the gatherings of the early Christians in the Roman catacombs.

Thanks to the effect of the light, aided by the imagination, the altar, candelabras, and fantastic sculptures which mark the church of the Middle Ages, all were reproduced before our fascinated gaze. We even fancied we could see a magnificent organ above the altar flanked by draped statues in various attitudes on their broad pedestals.

On leaving the temple we entered the Gothic avenue, which is no less rich in ornament or in illusory appearances. From this hall we reached after numerous turnings and windings the Haunted Chamber, so-called, probably from the Indian mummies, found there by the first explorers of the cavern, which were doubtless placed there by one of the primitive tribes whose bones are the only vestige of their existence on the earth. Strange as it may seem, this cemetery of an extinct race is the most cheerful and best-lighted of all these subterranean passages. The wives of the guides have established inns where one finds refreshments and newspapers. It is the resort of the Cenobites, who inhabit the cells in the vicinity; for the Mammoth Cave has its permanent guests, valetudinarians, invalids, especially consumptives, upon whom the atmosphere of the cave, impregnated as it is with saltpetre, has a beneficial influence, according to the local Æsculapiuses.

After leaving this point, Mat took me down several ladders, and over a wooden bridge, of an age not particularly reassuring. After crossing this bridge we entered the Labyrinth, a very narrow passage winding several times upon itself; here the roof was so low we were obliged to crawl on hands and knees. This is called the Path of Humiliation. We could not raise our heads without hitting the rock, so the proudest of us were compelled to bear ourselves as lowly as possible. On leaving this defile we reached the Devil's Chair, a sort of balcony attached to a perpendicular wall—the side of the Bottomless Pit. The guide made me look through an opening, cut in the rock like a window, and by thrusting our lamps forward we were able to see a black precipice yawning beneath our feet, but that was all.

In order to give me an idea of its depth, Mat dipped wisps of paper in oil, and lighting them let them fall. I could see them whirling around in the void, and their red blaze lighted up its diameter, but before they reached the bottom they burned out or were extinguished. We raised our torches above our heads in order to ascertain the height of the dome, but its arch was lost in the darkness.

Very soon we came to a large stream which obstructed our way. This subterranean river is called the Styx. I went aboard Charon's rough boat, and my black conductor shouted several times, when the echoes which came back might have been taken for the wails of souls condemned to eternal darkness. Our lamps threw a reddish light over the rocky walls, bringing out their profile in a most fantastic manner, while on the Styx, all sparkling as it was with the shining reflections from the roof, appeared the vigorously drawn shadow of the negro. . . . After rowing for half an hour we stepped ashore upon a fine sand which forms the bottom of the river in high water.

MR. TERENCE V. POWDERLY.

THE powerful Order of the Knights of Labor, of which Mr. Powderly is the head, is said at the present time to number half a million members. This is merely an estimate, for not even the secretary of the Order knows exactly how many members there are. He receives the returns once a year, but before they are examined and added up three months elapse, during which the number is growing. He is thus able to answer, as he always does, that he does not know how many Knights of Labor there are. The Order, however, has district assemblies throughout the continent from Maine to California, and from Hudson's Bay to Mexico, and half a million is probably below rather than above the number of its members. The Order was organized in 1869 by Uriah S. Stevens, a clothing cutter of Philadelphia. It was at first a secret organization, every member being strictly forbidden to speak of it, to admit his membership of it, or even to mention its name. All public communications from it were signed with five asterisks only, from which it came to be known as "the society of the five stars." A summons to a meeting was given by a few cabalistic signs in chalk on a boarding or on the pavement, and it was noticed that such signs would at any time bring four thousand men together in a few hours. Latterly, however, this mystery and secrecy have been dispensed with, and recently Mr. Powderly told the Committee of the House that he had no objection to make public the signs and pass-words of the Order.

The Order admits every form of labor, and excludes no one from membership on account of sex, color, or religious belief. The only people it does exclude are lawyers, stock-brokers, bankers, gamblers, and liquor dealers. Its motto is: "An injury to one is the concern of all." Among its aims are the promotion of education, the making of honesty fashionable, the prevention by law of the employment of children under fourteen in factories and workshops, and the payment of fair wages, without regard to sex, country, color, or creed. The payments of members are light individually. They vary in different States, but beside the local payment, which may be as little as twenty-five cents a month, every member has to pay two cents a month for the expenses of general management. The supreme control of the Order is vested in an Executive Board consisting of the President, who is called the Grand Master Workman, the Secretary, and three advisory members.

The present President is Terence V. Powderly, who has been elected to the office six times. He was born at Carbondale, Pa., on January 24th, 1849. He is therefore thirty-seven years old. He learned the machinists' trade, and being studious, he acquired a knowledge of mechanical engineering. He joined the Machinists' and Blacksmiths' Union at the age of nineteen, and became its presiding officer. In 1876 he joined the Knights of Labor. His energy, devotion to the Order, his tact and skill soon brought him to the front and carried him to the supreme power. His powers of labor and endurance are prodigious, and he ascribes them largely to the fact that he never drank liquor nor used tobacco. His correspondence is larger than that of any other man in the United States, and it is mentioned of him that he is one of the very few men who can accomplish the difficult feat of writing one letter while dictating another to a type-writer. He has been twice elected Mayor of Scranton, Pa.

PENN'S CONFERENCE WITH INDIANS.

THE memorable scene depicted in our illustration cannot be too prominently kept in our recollection as a nation. The principles which guided the great founder of Pennsylvania were living principles which will serve us in our national policy now as they benefited Penn.

Thomas Wentworth Higginson, in his "Larger History of the United States,"* thus alludes to the settlement of Pennsylvania under William Penn: "Another grant by Charles the Second was more wisely planned, when, in 1681, William Penn sent out some emigrants, guided by no philosopher except Penn himself, who came the following year. A great tract of country was granted him as a sort of equivalent for a debt owed by the king to his father, Admiral Penn; the rent was to be two beaver skins. Everything seemed to throw around the coming of William Penn the aspect of a lofty enterprise. His ship was named the Welcome; his new city was to be called 'Brotherly Love,' or Philadelphia. His harmonious relations with the Indians have been the wonder of later times. There is no such scene of contentment in our pioneer history as that which the early annals of 'Penn's woods' (Pennsylvania) record.

"Penn had proclaimed his intentions of being bound by the law of kindness in his treatment of the Indians. By his direction his agent, William Markham, had opened a friendly correspondence with them, and Penn himself addressed a letter to the Indians assuring them of his love and brotherly feeling toward them. When he came he proceeded to lay the foundation of his new State upon truth and justice. Where the Kensington portion of the city of Philadelphia now stands he met the Delaware chiefs in council under the leafless branches of a wide-spreading elm on November 4th, 1682, and there made with them a solemn covenant of peace and friendship, and paid them the stipulated price for their lands. 'We meet,' said Penn, 'on the broad pathway of good faith and good-will; no advantage shall be taken on either side; but all shall be openness and love.' And so it was. The Indians were delighted, and their hearts melted with good feeling. Such treatment was an anomaly in the history of the intercourse of their race with the white people. It was wonderful how the savage heart, so lately the dwelling of the deepest hatred toward the white man, became the shrine of the holiest attribute of our nature. 'We will live in love with William Penn and his children,' they said, 'as long as the sun and moon endure.' They were true to their promise; not a drop of Quaker blood was ever shed by an Indian. The Penn Society of Philadelphia erected a monument upon the spot where the venerable elm stood, near the intersection of Hanover and Beach streets, Kensington District. The tree was blown down in 1810, and was found to be two hundred and eighty-three years old."

Still later, when there was a further purchase of land, Penn's Christian spirit was displayed in honorable magnanimity. The Indians agreed to sell for a certain quantity of cloth, tools, and fishing-hooks as much land as a young man could travel around in a day. The young man, however, covered a larger tract of ground than the Indians had expected, and they complained that they had been over-reached.

Some of Penn's advisers urged that the Indians should be held to their bargain; but Penn met them, and declared that he wanted only what was fair, and that he would pay for the land walked off such a further amount as the Indians deemed the excess was worth. The Indians were satisfied, and not only lived in peace with Penn, but when the colony was afterward straitened for provisions they came to its relief with the fruits of the chase.

THE NATION'S HONORED DEAD.

LAST Monday throughout the Northern States we laid aside our ordinary occupations and devoted the day to the memory of the men who fought for their country and their flag, and to laying upon the places where their mortal bodies sleep the floral tributes of our regard. As the years roll by the number of the tombs to be so decorated increases. The veterans whom we honor are passing, one by one, from the ranks of the living to those who have gone before. This year there are conspicuous examples. During the year 1885 four illustrious generals were taken away. They are the four whose medallion portraits surround the picture of the temporary resting-place in which we have laid the body of General Grant. They are Hancock, Grant, McDowell, and McClellan, all of them living and moving among us in 1884, but now numbered with the dead.

It is said that Republics are always ungrateful, and sometimes in our free speech and free criticism of public men it has seemed that our own land was no exception to the rule. But the ingratitude was only on the surface. None could witness the processions of last Monday, as they wended their way to the cemeteries and laid the memorials on the honored graves, without feeling assured that in the people's hearts there is a very warm feeling of gratitude to the brave men who fought to keep the family of States united in one grand and glorious nation. The Christian, as he witnessed such a spectacle, cannot but have wished that all the thousands who marched to the cemeteries could realize the love and reverence due to the Great Captain of Salvation, who fought alone the battle for humanity, and won for sinful man eternal life and an entrance into the everlasting kingdom.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

In the Grasp of a Bear.

JULIET eagerly availed herself of the interval in the day's duties for an excursion. Though she had passed so many months in Labrador she had of necessity spent much of the time within doors. The intense cold rendered a journey on foot disagreeable and at times perilous to a girl nurtured as she had been. But the spring had come, and long walks became possible.

To Juliet the afternoon hour or two spent in the open air was the most delightful part of the day. She watched the growth of the plants in the little garden, or strolled along the beach, looking at the birds in the air and the fish in the sea, thinking over the past, or making little plans for the future, and with Juliet this was now a time for special communion with God. The shore was her wide oratory, the beauties of nature around her, raised her heart toward the Source of all beauty and blessing.

Sometimes the maiden sang aloud, more often she prayed in silence. She now never felt less alone than when she realized in solitude an invisible Presence. Oh! how altered was the once thoughtless child of the world! Greater the change than that of the creeping thing which cannot rise from the perishing plant on which it feeds, when—receiving a new nature—it spreads its wings to the sun and soars aloft.

New flowers seemed to spring up beneath the feet of Juliet. Curious to collect specimens of Labrador flora to dry in a book, she unconsciously wandered farther than usual from her home. The sun was sinking toward the horizon behind her, the shadows were growing long; Juliet had stooped to gather a curious moss, singing as she did so, when she was startled by seeing a broader shadow moving forward beside her own, as if some large object was coming up behind. In an instant Juliet's song was stopped; she glanced backward, and beheld with horror the form of a huge white bear! It was so close that she could hear its snuffing breath, see the savage gleam of its pinkish eyes; in another minute she would have had its stifling paws around her!

Juliet darted forward almost with the speed of a bird; she dared not attempt to retrace her way, she dared not turn again to look back. She ran—she flew for her life! But Juliet felt that the terrible race could not last, the enemy was behind her, his snorting was audible, the strength of the Arctic bear would far outlast her own. Juliet was going farther and farther away from the settlement, farther and farther from possible aid. The terrible beast was on her track, and she could not hope long to outstrip him! But while reason and strength remained she must fly from such a death.

Straight before Juliet was a little inlet of the sea, such as every here and there indented the coast, where a stream from inland mountains mixed its fresh waters with the salt. A month before the mouth of this stream had been almost entirely blocked up with heaps of ice, rising almost to the height of a berg. This ice was now partially melted; some water trickled down from the height, some forced its way between broken blocks, but enough remained to form a crystalline irregular mound, which must either be climbed over or gone round. Juliet, afraid to climb the slippery, glassy ascent, where a false step might make her slide back into the very jaws of the bear, took the longer but safer course.

Springing from block to block, she circumvented the obstacle which she could not hope to climb. But the bear, well accustomed to scramble on bergs, went straight at the irregular mound, and began its ascent. When the fugitive had gained the farther side of the icy pile, she paused to take breath, and glanced back, hoping that she had outstripped her pursuer, for she did not see him on the track which she had taken. Raising her eyes, however, to her unspeakable terror she beheld his uncouth, unwieldy mass of shaggy white fur, shuffling down straight upon her!

On such slippery ground as that over which Juliet had been speeding, it was perilous for one instant to neglect looking to her footing, that backward, upward look had not only almost paralyzed her with terror, but was the cause of a slip. Juliet fell on the ice, and gave herself up as lost; escape from a frightful death she felt to be hopeless. Then again she looked up and saw the bear, but not the bear alone.

Close behind it, on the berg above her, was Fritz, pale and gasping from the speed at which he had pursued the pursuer, with stern resolution expressed on his face, as though he would have said, had he had breath to speak, "I will die instead of her—or with her!" Fritz had a large clasp-knife open in his hand, with which he had been lopping some boughs, when he had seen from some distance the terrible chase, and without giving one thought to personal peril, had followed in pursuit.

To a strong man, armed even with an axe, the Arctic bear is a formidable foe, with which it were rashness to close in single combat, but in Juliet's danger the Moravian had entirely lost sight of his own. They came half rolling down the slippery mount together, the man and the bear, the latter uttering fearful growls, both of fury and pain, for the knife has descended again and again, and, dripping with blood, is flashing no more. Ha! it has been struck from the hand that wielded it so well—Fritz is down and utterly defenceless!

The weapon, streaming with gore, has fallen close to Juliet! In her agony of terror, she has enough presence of mind to grasp it, spring to her feet, and replace the handle in Fritz's outstretched, quivering hand. He is just able to gasp out, "Fly for help!" and in that word expresses but care for Juliet's safety, for he feels his own strength outmatched in the awful struggle between manly courage and brute force, and is assured that help for him will come too late. Juliet obeys; once more agonizing terror—but not for herself—lends her wings; she retraces her steps, springs—bounds over the broken ice, then runs along the more level, mossy ground; she dare not—she will not stop!

Oh, the fearful sounds—the frightful scene which she has left behind her! It seems as if Juliet's heart would burst from the prolonged effort of running; weights of lead appear to be fastened to her feet, but repeating to herself, "Fly for help!" she speeds on—on—on! The mission house is before her—but she will not be able to reach it; happily, assistance is nearer. A party of Esquimaux, Samson among them, are returning from fishing—could she but overtake them—or call out! Oh, for but three minutes more of power to run, or strength to utter one word! Happily, Samson looks back, and sees Juliet feebly running and waving her arms.

"Something is the matter!" cried the fisherman, turning and hastening toward the lady. Ere he reached her, Juliet had sunk on the ground utterly exhausted. She gasps forth the word "Nannock—bear!" motions in the direction where the struggle took place, then her senses fail her, her brain turns round, she sees nothing, hears nothing, knows nothing, but lies like a lifeless corpse on the sod!

Samson gave her one pitying look, and then bidding the strongest of his companions follow him, he ran in the direction to which Juliet pointed before she fell fainting. He had conceived a deep respect for this strange young lady, who had grown so popular at Eschol; he would have gladly carried her himself to the mission, and his muscular frame could easily have borne the burden, but he rightly judged that there was danger imminent, so he left her motionless form where it lay, and two of the Esquimaux took it up and carried it to the mission where Sister Anna tenderly cared for her.

It was long before Juliet recovered her senses. For weeks it seemed doubtful whether she would ever recover from the terrible shock to her nerves, and the overstrain of her powers. Night and day the faithful Anna watched beside her, praying with tears that, if it were the Lord's will, life and reason might be spared. How thankful was Anna that the trial had not come in the winter, when she herself had been helpless! Lena was permitted to take her turn of watching when the Moravian friend's strength gave way, and lovingly did the grateful Esquimaux fulfil her charge, and prove her love, Lena's faith was as strong, her prayers as fervent, as those of Anna herself.

It was a painful watch, for Juliet had fits of delirium; she would start up in bed—an expression of insanity in her blue eyes, her voice in its anguish ringing through the house. The horrible struggle with the bear seemed to be still before her. Juliet, clenching her hands and tearing her hair, would shriek out aloud! "Oh! save him—save him!—Fritz! my Fritz! See—he struggles; see—he is down!—Oh! am I to cause the deaths of all those whom I love?" Then her cries would soften down into a piteous wail, like that from a broken heart.

But Juliet was young, and she struggled through that terrible illness, though it was not till the beginning of June that reason returned. It was at the still hour of dawn, very early indeed, for the days had become very long, that, as Anna sat mournfully watching the form so wasted, the face so ghastly pale, Juliet's large eyes slowly opened, and she gazed around.

"I think that I have had a dreadful dream!" she said.

"You have been ill, dear Juliet," said Anna, deeply thankful to see that her sense was restored, yet dreading her questions.

But memory revived, and with memory anguish.

"Where is Fritz?" asked Juliet, abruptly, fixing on Anna a look which went to her heart.

"Not here," was the trembling reply.

"I know—he is in heaven. God's will be done!" faltered Juliet.

"No, dear one, no!" cried Anna, eagerly; "God preserved His servant. Fritz was hurt, but he killed the bear."

"You would not deceive me!" cried Juliet, her white lips quivering with intense emotion.

"I never deceive," said the Moravian.

"You said he is not here—where is he?—Tell all, I can bear to hear all."

"The Esquimaux found Fritz and the bear lying close to each other. The creature was dying, and Fritz very sorely hurt. Samson and the others carried him here. While I nursed you in this room, my dear husband and the men took care of Fritz in the next one. He never, except for the first half-hour, lost his senses; he was quite aware of everything passing around. Fritz's state was not so alarming as your own, though his flesh had been sadly torn; most of his clothes were clawed to strips. As soon as Fritz could possibly be moved, that was three days ago, he insisted on being taken away in a sledge to Bethabara. Happily we were able to borrow reindeer."

"Was Brother Fritz well enough to travel?" asked Juliet, with a little sigh of relief, and a silent thanksgiving.

"Hardly well enough," was the truthful reply; "but he was determined to go; so we bandaged him, and wrapt him up in his plaid, and propped him with cushions. Samson drove the reindeer, and on his return told us that they had reached Bethabara safely. Our missionary brother there will watch over Fritz as tenderly as he last winter watched over the sick."

The tidings did more to effect Juliet's restoration than any medicine could have done, though for some days longer she was too weak to quit the room. Anna would throw open the window, and the invalid with pleasure breathed the soft air, and looked forth on the verdant landscape. Juliet was specially pleased when the Esquimaux women came to the window to look on their friend; the little Puffin was admitted by special invitation, and would climb on the bed for a kiss.

"Is there not something written in the Bible about the Lord making our bed in our sickness?" she said to Anna, one day. "It seems just like that with me. I lie like a feeble child in a parent's arms, quite peaceful and happy. But I hope that I shall soon be able to rise and help you in preparations for the grand event—the wedding. Perhaps the Harmony has before this started from England, 's she was to call at other places on her way.' Juliet was happily unaware of anything that she had spoken in her delirium, and was a little surprised at Anna's now never uttering a word about the expected arrival.

"Perhaps the ship has started," said Anna, briefly.

"How do you get on with your beautiful couvre-pieds? have you finished them?" inquired Juliet Erle.

"Finished them, my child! I have not had the heart to touch them, or as much as look at them," was the reply.

"Oh, you lazy one!" exclaimed Juliet, playfully, for she wanted to chase away the sadness from the face of her friend. "They will not be ready for the wedding. You must finish at least one—the prettiest, that with the tinted stars. Do bring it here, and let me help you; it would be an amusement to me. And now, please hand me my little watch—I see that you have kept it going. I hope that Fritz's bride will like it. I will tell her that I owe my life to her husband."

Ten days after this Juliet had so far recovered as to be able, leaning on the pastor's arm, to attend morning service in church. A simple, earnest thanksgiving for her and Fritz's preservation from imminent danger was uttered by Brother Wilhelm, with a trembling voice, and Juliet's were by no means the only eyes that were wet with grateful tears.

As Juliet was quitting the chapel, the squat powerful form of Samson was seen approaching her; he had the splendid narwhal's horn in his hand; that spiral horn which Pastor Wilhelm had recommended him to give to Fritz's bride. Samson was a bold and skilful harpooner, but not much of an orator, and the following speech, the first which the honest Esquimaux had ever made to a lady, was uttered with some stammering and hesitation:

"We all bless God for sending you among us again. We were afraid you were shipped right for heaven. You be weak, and you want a helping stick a deal more than she" (Samson pointed with his thick thumb toward the ocean to indicate the expected bride), "and may be we'll not like her just as well—and—and you're going to a poor sort of a country where, as I've heard, there ain't so much as a whale, or a walrus, or even a seal to be seen from the shore, and the folk might starve in darkness if we did not send them some blubber!"

"Maybe as you'll like to show 'em what like fish we have in our seas, and—and"—(Samson almost thrust the horn into the hand of his smiling auditor, who only understood part of the speech), "maybe it will mind you to think of your Esquimaux, and put up a bit of a prayer for the folk in the igloes when you be far, far away."

Juliet could not refuse what was so affectionately proffered. "I should like you also to have a remembrance of me, Samson," she said, in the best Esquimaux at her command. "Shall I send you from home cloth for a jacket?"

"No—thin stuff that tears," said Samson, who was no courtier, "I like a good stout bearskin—and may be there's none in your country."

Do you send me a hatchet—a strong one, that's always handy whether with wolf or walrus—I broke mine over the head of one o' the last." Juliet, smiling, promised that a hatchet should not be forgotten.

Samson's parting present was followed by many others. Seal-skin boots, sewn with sinews and trimmed with red, bracelets of horn and strings of teeth, odd constructions of moss and beads, the use of which it would need an Esquimaux brain to divine. The smaller children gathered shells; even Ruth, crawling on the sea-beach, had contrived to pick up a feather, which she brought in her chubby little hand. Juliet was much touched by these tokens of affection. She remembered with remorse and disgust the contempt with which she had once regarded the Esquimaux race. Now she recognized in these simple people her brothers and sisters in Christ. None of the poor in England had ever loved Juliet so well; and why? be cause the selfish, frivolous young lady of fashion had never even thought of loving them.

JESUS, THE CHRIST.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for June 13, John 7: 37-52. Golden Text, John 4: 32.

The Backsliders—Peter's Assurance—The Persecutors Active—Christ's Withdrawal Criticized by His Brethren—Not Bound by System—The Testimonies at the Feast—Christ's Sudden Appearance there—His Presentation as a Messenger—Who will Know the Doctrine—An Unanswerable Argument—The Declaration on the Great Day of the Feast—The Appeal of Nicodemus.

WHILE many of the disciples of Jesus, unprepared for the deeply spiritual teaching which He gave them, and for the reception of a spiritual kingdom of God, "went back, and walked no more with Him" (ch. 6: 66), His true disciples, who were learning to lose their own self-life for His sake, were becoming confirmed in faith. He said to them: "Will ye also go away?" and Peter, ever ready to be first among them, said: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." But was abroad. The Jews of Jerusalem had never forgiven Jesus for healing the impotent man at Bethesda on the Sabbath day. Jesus knew that they sought to kill Him, so He carried on His ministry in Galilee. But the feast of tabernacles was at hand. It was His Father's will that all the males of the children of Israel should appear before the Lord three times in the year, and this time of the feast of tabernacles was one of the three. Should fear of death hinder Jesus? never; but He would wait His Father's time. His brethren, sceptical as to His divine origin and mission, ironically urged upon Him greater publicity, "Depart hence, and go into Judea. . . . If Thou do these things, show Thyself to the world." It is just this same spirit which makes men demand a tabulation of cases of Divine Healing with medical certificates to certify the disease and the cure, thus to subject the work of God to scientific investigation. But His ways are "past finding out." As soon as men think they have reduced His work on soul or body to a system, He works in a way exactly opposite.

Though He touched two blind men (Matt. 9: 29), and said: "According to your faith, be it unto you," He did not bind Himself always to act in that way. We find Him saying to Bartimeus, "Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole" (Mark 10: 52), while to the man born blind (John 9), He said, after anointing his eyes with clay, "Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash." In all these three cases, sight was given, but who can discover a set law by which Jesus worked? There was one, but it was out of the sphere of man. Jesus worked by the law of His Father's will. His reply to His brethren was fully characteristic, "My time is not yet come; but your time is always ready." He was a living Sacrifice, and did not choose His own time, but always waited to know His Father's will. His brethren, who lived to please themselves, had no idea of waiting for guidance; their time was always ready. "The world cannot hate you," He said. Oh, reader, is this true of you or me? Are we so made of the color of the world that we do not provoke its hatred? Jesus said: "Me it hateth, because I testify of it that the works thereof are evil." Thus Jesus delayed to go up to the feast because His time was "not yet full come."

Meanwhile, He was the leading topic of conversation at the feast. People were congregated from all parts. Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, contributed their thousands; and from all parts came questions or testimonies concerning Jesus. This wonderful Prophet, with His unforgettable teaching, His mighty works, His deep humility, in all so unlike other men, left an irresistible impression on all who saw and heard Him. Those who had been receptive, and had thus been blest through Him, declared that He was "a good man;" those who were in the habit of finding out and repeating the sentiments of those in power, found it was "the thing" to say "Nay; but He deceiveth the people." Suddenly, Jesus Himself appeared among them, teaching in the temple. An impression was made, but it was not that which His heart longed for; the Jews marvelled where He had obtained the learning which His discourse manifested. "Jesus answered them, and said: My doctrine is not Mine, but His that sent Me. If any man he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or whether I speak of Myself."

WILL DO HIS WILL,

Our loving Master always led His hearers to His Father, and spoke of Himself as One sent, His Father's Messenger, and, therefore, speaking with His authority. "He that speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory"—this did not Jesus. But had the Jews only made use of the test He gave them they would have recognized Him as the Messiah. "If any man will do His will," or wills to do His will, "he shall know of the doctrine." God makes known His will to surrendered hearts, to those who have yielded themselves living sacrifices to Him (Rom. 12: 1, 2). We cannot long be in ignorance of God's will on any point after we have fully given up our own, and laid ourselves as His property upon the altar.

All this time the strong feeling on the part of the enemies of Jesus was becoming intensified, while the number of those who believed in Him grew greater and greater. His enemies felt all His teachings were undermining their influence, and showing up the unreality and inconsistency of their lives, and their hatred grew more and more bitter. Jesus did not mince matters; He went straight into the thing which they made the ground of their accusation, "If a man on the Sabbath day receive circumcision, that the law of Moses should not be broken, are ye angry at Me because I have made a man every whit whole on the Sabbath day?" His words, and the way they were taken, caused astonishment. Some said: "Is not this He whom they seek to kill? But lo, He speaketh boldly, and they say nothing unto Him." Do the rulers know, indeed, that

THIS IS THE VERY CHRIST?

Some dared to say it, and dared to believe it, but their reasoning got the better of their faith, "Howbeit we know this Man whence He is; but when Christ cometh no man knoweth whence He is." When some sought to take Him, but without avail, He could not be taken one hour before His Father willed. Spite of all the opposition of the Pharisees, "many of the people believed on Him, and said: 'When Christ cometh, will He do more miracles than these which this Man hath done?'" They saw in Jesus the divine power of the Messiah; there was in Him a holiness of life, a loveliness of character, which none other exemplified. But the Jews wanted a Messiah more like themselves, one who would exalt Himself and exalt them as a nation, one who would make them pleased with themselves, and who would answer to all the pride of their fallen human nature.

They were maddened with disappointment and rage at Jesus' claim to Messiahship, without these qualifications, and they sent officers to take Him. They saw plainly that many were persuaded that He was the Christ, and they were determined to stop the current of His popularity. Jesus took no other notice of those who came to apprehend Him than to say, "Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto Him that sent Me." They had no control over His destiny, it was His Father who disposed of Him. He continued His teaching without interruption, and those who were sent to take Him into custody were themselves brought under the power of His words.

Day by day He had taught the people, and now, "in the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried: If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink. He that believeth on Me, as the Scripture hath said (or, more correctly, 'as saith the Scripture'), out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." How many believe on Jesus, but not "as saith the Scripture!" How many believe as their spiritual teachers say, or as their own hearts say, and not "as saith the Scripture!" How many have a human view of Jesus, and believe on Him just as far as their limited apprehensions go! Some see in Him the Sacrifice for their sins, but have no apprehension of Him as the Holy One dwelling in their hearts by faith. They have never entered into relationship with Him as members of His body, or as the bride of Christ; they do not know Him as the One Paul knew when he said: "To me to live is Christ." As the great Healer, as the Baptizer with the Holy Ghost they have yet to make acquaintance with Jesus. But when a man believes in Jesus in a scriptural way, he spreads around him wherever he is a spiritual fertility. "I love to be in the company of so and so," said a friend to me one day; "he always brings God near." This was the testimony to Fletcher of Madely, to Mr. Pennefather, of Mildmay, to Mr. Aitken, of Pendeen.

"This spake He of the Spirit, which they that believed on Him were to receive, for the Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified." Peter, James, and John believed in Jesus, but only when, on the day of Pentecost, the Holy Ghost took possession of them, did they become rivers of living water; then the very power of God was manifest in them, and thousands were converted to God. They became channels of the Holy Ghost. Jesus was glorified by His ascension into heaven, and then He sent down the Holy Ghost. Dear reader, as you glorify Jesus, you can receive and become a channel of the Holy Ghost who will reveal Him to you more and more fully. When the people heard this saying, they reiterated their convictions, "Of a truth, this is the Prophet. This is the Christ."

Some were puzzled, because they did not know Jesus was born in Bethlehem, and they knew the birth of the Messiah was predicted to be there. Had they but come to Him with their difficulties, He would have solved them; but no, they only talked among themselves. Again, the officers sought to take Him, but a mysterious power which they themselves could not understand hindered them, and when they were questioned by the Pharisees, they had but one answer, "Never man spake like this Man." They were met with the scornful question, "Are ye also deceived? Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on Him?" Nicodemus, one of the Sanhedrim, ventured to appeal to the law, "Doth our law judge any man, before it hear him, and know what he doeth?" The answer was given in the same tone of scorn, and with no right or justice in it, "Art thou also of Galilee? Search, and look: for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet." And thus ignoring law and justice, these rulers of the people pronounced Jesus an impostor. They took for granted that they were right, and then judged Him accordingly. Are there not many in the present day who are thus judging the unseen but felt power and presence of Jesus, working on the souls and bodies of men? Are there not many who condemn anybody and anything that makes God real; many who say in heart, "We will not have this Man to reign over us?"

HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. J. CLARK.

No tempests blow
Around the shores of yon bright sinless land,
Where my beloved—my soul's true kindred—stand
In glory's glow.
A splendor falls
On all its hills of light, its blissful bowers,
Its streams, its streets of gold, its glittering towers,
And jasper walls.
How blest are they
Who there find rest from all their wanderings!
No pain, no grief is there;—the former things
Are passed away.
In rapture sweet,
These heavenly denizens, all faultless now,
With psalms extol their King, or, silent, bow
Before his feet.
With love agleam,
They serve their best Redeemer day and night;
Their God their glory, and the Lamb their light,
Oh, bliss supreme!
Heaven's gates unfold
To let the welcome friends of Jesus in;
But oh, what heights and depths of joy they win
Hath not been told.
When God shall will,
I too shall find a home in that blest place;
And gaze forever on the King of grace;
O soul, be still!
Lord, even so!
Forgiven by Thee the fullest "seven times seven,"
The sweet, full, perfect happiness of heaven
I soon shall know.

HENRY GRAT-TAN, the Irish Patriot—A Meeting of the Home Rule Parliamentary Party.

THE IRISH PARLIAMENTARY PARTY.

THE American people have always taken a deep interest in the welfare of Ireland, and that interest has increased during the past few weeks, since it seemed possible that the unhappy country might gain the prize which she has so long coveted—legislative independence. Meetings have been held in many of our great cities to congratulate Ireland and to express the hope that Mr. Gladstone's effort in her behalf might be successful. The picture, therefore, which appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and some brief outline of the long struggle which has arrived at a supreme crisis may interest our readers.

The picture depicts a gathering of the men elected by the Irish people to represent them in the British Parliament. Many such gatherings have been held recently, for it was important for the achievement of the end they have in view that they should act as one man, and should not injure their cause by impetuous utterances. They have met, therefore, in a kind of caucus, though the direction of the campaign has not been in the hands of the majority, but has been vested in Mr. Parnell. It has consequently been rather as a council than as a caucus that they have assembled, and when, as represented in the picture, Mr. Parnell has risen to express his decision as to their course his word has been accepted as final.

It is one of the romances of current history that records the rise of this young man to his present remarkable place and power. He is only forty years old, and he did not enter Parliament until 1875. At that time it was difficult to get the House of Commons to seriously consider any Irish question. Very often there was not a quorum when an Irish bill was set down for debate, and still more frequently the much-needed legislation was defeated by aristocratic votes. Mr. Parnell, with a patience that was remarkable, set himself to study the intricate rules of Parliamentary practice, and to devise methods for compelling the unwilling legislators to attend to Irish questions. He became an adept in the art of obstruction, and succeeded in rendering progress with English and Scotch measures almost impossible. By the very tactics which had wasted the time of the House when Irish grievances were under consideration, he managed to delay legislation on English difficulties, and in plain words to make himself a nuisance.

The necessity of satisfying him became apparent, or he would block the wheels of progress altogether. Special rules had to be made to meet the case, and summary powers were given to the Speaker; but the obstruction continued. Finally, at the last election, the people of Ireland sent him a large number of supporters, pledged to do his bidding, and he became a powerful leader. He also showed himself a skilful tactician, for, seeing that the English and Scotch constituencies were likely to elect a large majority of Liberals, he urged all Irishmen living in England and Scotland to vote against Liberal candidates. His object was to neutralize the popular drift, so as to get the House of Commons almost evenly divided between Conservatives and Liberals. In that condition his compact battalion of Irish members could decide any question, and he could, by voting with the opposition, defeat any Cabinet. It was seen that he held the balance of power, and that he could at any moment oust a Prime Minister and his colleagues from office. It was a stroke of genius, and persons who do not sympathize with the object for which Mr. Parnell is working cannot but admire his methods. He is disliked, he is hated; but he is not despised. If he is not respected, he is feared by his opponents.

Meanwhile other elements had been at work. The no-rent agitation, the boycotting system, operations of the dynamite contingent, and the detestable crime of assassination had been voicing the discontent of the people. The condition of Ireland could be no longer ignored. The time is past when such a Government as that of England could rule Ireland by the sword. The principles of the Government were opposed to such a rule. The nation that had pitied Poland, sympathized with Hungary, and rejoiced in the liberation of Italy could not consistently treat Ireland as a captive nation. Mr. Gladstone recognized the fact, and proposed his scheme of a limited legislative independence. It has serious and grave defects; it is in some of its features indefensible, but it is evidently a sincere attempt to do justice to Ireland, and that is an advance in the right direction. A better bill will doubtless be produced, and will finally be enacted. That Ireland will prosper under Home Rule cannot be predicted with confidence, but if it is conceded to her, she will, at least, have the power of remedying such of her grievances as can be remedied by legislation. Unhappily, her worst calamities are those beyond the power of legislation to remedy. Until she learns that Roman Catholicism is the curse of Ireland, as it is of every country that submits to it, and until she rids herself of the rule of the priests, she must be miserable. We can but hope and pray that the spiritual emancipation she does not crave may come to her with the political freedom for which she has been struggling so long.

HENRY GRATTAN.

Born in 1750—Enters the Irish Parliament in 1775—Joins Flood and the Patriotic Party—An Impotent Assembly—Grattan's Aim—His Opportunity—The Organization of the Volunteers—Legislative Independence Conceded—Efforts to Reform the House—Their Failure—The Rebellion of 1798—Grattan's Last Effort to Prevent Union with England—The Triumph of Shameful Corruption—Death.

THE mention of an Irish Parliament irresistibly recalls to the memory the name of the illustrious man whose portrait appears on the first page. While there was still a Parliament in Dublin he never ceased to labor for its purification, for its better representation of the people, and for its deliverance from the trammels of English domination. He it was who, gaunt and weak from illness, was borne into the Irish House of Commons at its last session to make a last but futile effort to prevent the union with England. If eloquence could have saved the Irish Parliament it would have been saved by that two hours' speech, which he was too feeble to stand to deliver, but which he uttered from his seat. But it could not be done; the members had been bought with promises, pensions, offices, titles, and money, and they delivered the Parliament to the purchasers unmoved by the earnest appeal of the brilliant orator. On that memorable night of January 16th, 1800, the Irish House of Commons voted its own abolition by a majority of forty-two, and Grattan left the place broken-hearted. By June 7th the House of Peers had confirmed it, and on August 2d it became law by the royal assent. The patriot whose sagacity and foresight realized all the evil that would fall upon his country by the act against which he fought so persistently was a man whose name is dear to Irish hearts the world over, and whose memory will never die.

Henry Grattan was born in 1750, and he entered the Irish Parliament in 1775. Henry Flood was then the idol of the people, the leader of the little band of patriots who were striving for the reformation of the Parliament, for greater liberty of trade, and for the reduction of the burdens Ireland had to bear in the shape of pensions which were being paid to the illegitimate children and cast-off mistresses of the English king. These amounted at that time to the sum of $360,000 a year—a prodigious sum for a country so small and poor as Ireland. In Grattan the patriots found a noble and self-sacrificing colleague. He was only twenty-five years old, but he was full of fire and energy, clear of thought, and brilliant in speech. Contemporary chronicles describe him as "short in stature, and unprepossessing in appearance. His arms were disproportionately long. His walk was a stride. With a person swaying like a pendulum, and an abstracted air, he seemed always in thought.

... How strange it seems that a mind so replete with grace and symmetry and power and splendor should have been allotted such a dwelling for its residence! It was the victory of mind over matter." He was a comparatively poor, man, though his father was Recorder of Dublin, and had himself been a member of the Irish Parliament. At that time the only way to enter Parliament was through the favor of some lord or by buying the seat with a money purchase from a lord. Young Grattan was given a seat by Lord Charlemont, and immediately joined himself to Flood and his friends.

THE SHAM PARLIAMENT, for it was little more, was not truly representative of Ireland when Grattan entered it. The members were corrupt, and would vote against the interests of their country as ordered by the lords who had placed them there, or the English Government, which had places and pensions to give them. The Parliament never passed bills, but only presented "heads of bills," for consideration, first by the Irish Privy Council, the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary, and secondly by the English Privy Council—that is to say, the Ministry of the day in England. Either the Government in Ireland or the Government in England could make any alterations they pleased; and when they returned the bills, if they chose to return them, to the Irish Parliament, no amendment could be made; Parliament must either accept or reject them, on a third reading. The Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary, with the Privy Council, whenever they pleased, could intercept a measure which had passed its two readings and its Committee in either House of Parliament, or could transform it, whenever they pleased, into a different measure; and the English Ministry could do the same. These powers were continually exercised, reducing Irish Parliamentary action to sheer impotence.

It was a forlorn hope that the patriots were fighting under such disadvantages, and they were still further discouraged by the defection of their gifted leader. Henry Flood, wealthy though he was, could not resist the temptation with which he was plied by the English Government. He accepted the sinecure office of Vice-Treasurer with its large salary. The act seemed to Grattan the basest political apostasy. The alliance between the two orators was definitely broken off; the friendship was finally severed in the fierce discussion that took place between them in the House of Commons some years later, when Flood tauntingly described Grattan as a "mendicant patriot," and Grattan painted Flood as a traitor in crushing and pitiless invective. Such a quarrel between such men was the more to be regretted because each had the same end in view, and each had special qualifications for furthering that end which were not possessed by the other. Grattan thereupon became the LEADER OF THE PATRIOTS, the people knowing well how little dependence could be safely placed in Flood after his acceptance of office.

An opportunity came at last for gaining concessions from England. The colonies in America were suffering from evils analogous to those of Ireland, and they had risen in rebellion. George Washington was giving employment for all the troops England could spare, and at length every regiment had to be withdrawn from Ireland for service in America. Ireland was left defenceless, and she was threatened with a French invasion, and was at the mercy of a gang of pirates led by the terrible Paul Jones. Belfast was in imminent danger, but when the call was made by the mayor for soldiers to defend the city from the French, who were hovering off the coast, only sixty troopers could be found to hold the fort. A call was made for volunteers, and in an incredibly short space of time sixty thousand men responded and were speedily armed and drilled. There was no fighting to be done, after all, but with such a force, and with England drained of troops, Grattan saw that the time had come for compelling concessions. An appeal for redress of grievances must be heard and attended to when made by a man who had an army at his back.

GRATTAN'S PARLIAMENT

was the result of the policy he pursued. By a bill passed in 1782, and which the king dare not refuse to sign, it was declared that the Irish Parliament was the only power competent to enact laws for Ireland, and that all measures passed by it were to be submitted to the king for his signature in the same way and with the same freedom as the measures passed by the English Parliament. That was an important victory, but it was only a part of what was necessary to secure safety for the national liberties. The Parliament might now pass the necessary laws, but who was to see that the members did their duty? They were a corrupt set, and the people had not the power to control them because they did not elect them. The members still owed their places to the lords, and not to the people. Grattan desired greater liberty for the people, and was anxious that they, and they alone, should elect the members of Parliament. Five sixths of the people could not vote at the elections, being excluded from the franchise because they were Roman Catholics, and of the Protestant electors many had no votes. In some places ten men elected a member of Parliament, in others the election was vested in the mayor and eleven members of the corporation, and several peers could elect fourteen members through their tenants and dependents. Grattan, though a Protestant, desired to admit Roman Catholics to the franchise, but he was opposed by Flood and other leaders. He could not get the franchise extended and the Parliament remained as before, subservient to the dominant interest. The volunteers peaceably disbanded, and the power that had forced the concessions was laid aside.

In 1792, after ten years of ceaseless labor, an act was passed permitting Roman Catholics to vote at elections, but prohibiting them from sitting in Parliament. That last concession, so much desired, seemed at one time on the verge of being granted, for in 1794 William Pitt announced himself in its favor. Grattan immediately introduced a bill to accomplish the reform, and could it have been hurried through at once it might have become law. But in the interval consumed by the necessary formalities the king recovered from his lunacy, and when he heard of what had been set on foot during his mental eclipse, declared to Pitt that he would never consent to the proposed change. It was never submitted to him. The Irish Parliament received orders from the lords who controlled the elections, bribes were freely distributed, and of the three hundred members of the Irish House of Commons only forty-eight voted with Grattan. Utterly sick and disgusted with the subserviency and venality of his colleagues, hopeless of accomplishing anything in a Parliament of which not more than a fourth of the members were chosen by the people, Grattan resigned and retired for a time into private life.

THE REBELLION

of 1798 was led by men who had Grattan's spirit, but not his gentleness and discretion. They saw that Grattan had succeeded when he had the volunteers to support him, and that he failed when he relied on constitutional agitation alone. It was not surprising, therefore, that they drew the inference that in force alone lay their hopes for the future. Their fatal error was that they omitted to take into account the different position of England then from what it had been when Grattan's volunteers were formidable. Tone, Fitzgerald, Rowan, Tandy, and other leaders of "the United Irishmen" were personally brave, brilliant, and patriotic, but they had not the capacity necessary for such an undertaking. The outbreak was premature, and was characterized by hideous barbarity on both sides. The horrors of that time will never be forgotten. Deeds of frightful savagery committed by one side were revenged by deeds as brutal on the other, until at last the rebellion was crushed and the flames trampled out. It is important to remember that this was not, as later troubles have been, a conflict of creeds. The leaders of the insurgents were Protestants, and but few Catholics were in the ranks. Not more than one in four of the rebels, it is stated, were Romanists.

THE END OF THE PARLIAMENT

soon followed. What the sword did for the rebellion gold did for the Houses. It was necessary to gain a majority in the Irish House of Commons to secure its own dissolution, for the concession won by Grattan that the Parliament should be supreme in Ireland was still in force. Irishmen had to be induced to betray their country and to surrender the hard-won prize. It is an indelible shame to Ireland that Irishmen were willing to become traitors so shameless. Place and office were lavishly distributed. Peerages won the highest, and secret service money the lowest, of those who were to be bought. The English ministry had decided that Ireland was to be joined to England in an indissoluble union, and as Ireland was hostile to the scheme, the union was effected by bribery. The Bill of Union was introduced and passed by a well-paid majority of sixty, in 1800. The eloquence of Grattan was raised to the last in immortal accents against the unholy pact. One hundred men alone kept their hands clean and voted against the surrender of their liberties. Grattan was elected to the United Parliament, and there labored with his old devotion for the country he had loved and served so well, but it was with a sad heart and with but little hope. He died in 1820. His name still lives enshrined in the hearts of his countrymen.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Full Look at Christ's Face.—Mr. Stewart said at a recent meeting: "I heard of a man who was dying; a friend bent over him, and whispered, 'Are you getting a glimpse of His face?' 'I have been getting a good full look at Him for forty years,' answered the dying man. Dear fellow Christians, can we say that? or are we only getting a glimpse now and then of the Lord? If we desire to be continually in the sunshine of His presence, we must get Him every morning, for He must be first. He wants you to eat of His flesh and drink of His blood, and He will dwell in you and ye in Him."

The Absent Nobleman.—"I Once Went into the house of a certain nobleman in the Highlands of Scotland, for the purpose of giving a tract to the person who kept it. On entering into conversation with her, she told me that she had kept that house for upward of eighteen years, but she said: 'I never have seen the owner's face; he does not live here.' And, dear friends, although with our bodily eyes we have not seen our dear Lord's face, yet we know and believe that He liveth, and we ought to be continually living in the hope that He is soon coming to take possession of His own, and to give to every man according as his work may be."

Wicked Maggie and Her Companion.—Mr. Calder related the following: "One night a short time ago when on my way to a Gospel meeting, two young women came forward to me, and asked if they might accompany me. I readily consented, for they did not know where I was going, and I saw by their manner that they only wanted some amusement. I led them into the church, and conducted them to a pew that we call the penitents' seat. I placed myself at the entrance of the seat, to prevent them getting out during the service, which I thought they very likely would do when they found of what nature the meeting was. The Holy Spirit of God came down with mighty power upon these two young women that night, and at the close of the service both were weeping bitterly on account of their sins; and well they might, for they confessed that they had been leading not only sinful and careless lives, but lives of wretched vice and woe. One of them had a Christian mother who had been praying for her child for many years. But what was remarkable is this: the very night on which the girl gave her heart to Christ the mother had been wrestling with God in prayer, and had concluded her petition with these words: 'Oh, Saviour, I will not let Thee go till Thou dost save my Maggie!' She rose from her knees with the full assurance that her prayer was answered. And so it proved, for while she was calling God was answering."

A Song in His Sleep.—Sergeant Stephens remarked: "I went to a Gospel meeting once to scoff, but brave as I thought myself, I was really a coward, and, like one, I took a back seat. But it was God who had led me there, and before I left I was deeply convicted of sin, and longed for a Saviour. I went again next night, and the speaker's subject was, 'Yet there is room.' On my way out a gentleman stopped me, and asked if I were saved. I replied that no one could say that for certain; but he pointed out many passages of Scripture which proved to me that we could say so if we had accepted Christ. But the verse that was most blest to my anguished heart was, 'Him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out.' I went home, and casting myself on my knees, gave myself wholly to Jesus. In the morning my mother told me that in my sleep that night she heard me sing, 'What a friend we have in Jesus.' Before going forth to the world that day I asked Him to keep me in times of temptation, and I realized that He who saves will also keep those who put their trust in Him."

A Sceptic's Timely Discovery.—"I had a brother-in-law of whom I was very fond. The liking was mutual, for in an illness he would have me at his bedside, and when his last hours came I was with him. He was a sceptic, and I remember the day on which he died how sadly he fixed his eyes on me. 'John,' I said, 'we love each other very dearly. And why do I love you so much? It is because I love the Lord Jesus with all my heart, and it is He who constrains me to speak to you of His love.' He replied: 'Oh, do not speak so much of these things! I feel almost as if I were in hell already. Oh, if I could but see!' I knelt in prayer by the bedside of the dying man, when he grasped me by the arm, and staring wildly at me, he exclaimed: 'Is it—is it—is it true that Jesus is the Son of God, that if I believe in Him He will save me from this misery?' 'Yes, John,' I answered, 'His amazing love is such that He will save even to the uttermost. None are cast out, but lovingly received and pardoned who trust Him.' After a few moments' silence, he said: 'I see it, I see it, I know it all now. God loved me, so loved me.' I had the joy of seeing him soon afterward pass away at peace with God, through faith in the perfect and life-procuring atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ."

A Blessed Visit to Scotland.—Dr. Cameron said: "I recently heard from a man in Berlin who some years ago visited Scotland, and going through one of the streets he was attracted by a band of people singing in the open-air. He listened, and tried to catch the words of the hymn, which were:

'Jesus, my Lord, to Thee I cry;
Unless Thou help me, I must die;
Oh, bring Thy free salvation nigh,
And take me as I am!'

Being a German, he could not quite comprehend their meaning. A short time after this I was introduced to him, and took him to a Gospel meeting, where he learned its meaning. The light of truth shone like a full-orbed sun into his soul. He saw his need as a sinner, and the fulness of love there is in Jesus, and soon he was rejoicing in the knowledge of the fact that he was 'born again,' and had become a child of God through faith in Jesus Christ. On his return to Berlin his friends remarked that he had far too much to say about Scotland, and his answer was: 'How can I help talking about Scotland, when it is the land of my second birth?' He is now doing what he can for Christ in his own country."

MONOPOLY AND COMMUNISM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 6, 1886.

"Thy land shall be married."—ISA. 62 : 4.

Our Republic Wooed—Several Suitors for the Fair Land—I. Monopoly—Its Awful and Increasing Power—The Curse of the Country—The Land Sharks of Europe—The Paupers they Make—A Legislative Check Necessary—II. Nihilism—A Universal Butcher—Vandalism in a College—The Worst Enemy of Labor—III. Infidelity—A Mean Business—The Territory it Wants—Protesting Voices—IV. The Prince of Peace—The Land Pledged to Him—By Columbus—By the Huguenots—By the Pilgrim Fathers—A New Leaf in National History—A Site for the Nuptials.

As the greater includes the less, so does the circle of future joy around our entire world include the epicycle of our own republic. Bold, exultant, unique, divine imagery of the text! So many are depressed by the labor agitation, and think everything in this country is going to pieces, I preach this morning a sermon of good cheer, and anticipate the time when the Prince of Peace and the Heir of Universal Dominion shall take possession of this nation and "Thy land shall be married."

In discussing the final destiny of this nation, it makes all the difference in the world whether we are on the way to a funeral or a wedding. The Bible leaves no doubt on this subject. In pulpits, and on platforms, and in places of public concourse I hear so many of the muffled drums of evil prophecy sounded, as though we were on the way to national interment, and beside Thebes, and Babylon, and Tyre in the cemetery of dead nations our republic was to be entombed, that I wish you to understand it is not to be obsequies, but nuptials; not mausoleum, but carpeted altar; not cypress, but orange blossoms; not requiem, but wedding march, for "Thy land shall be married." I propose to name some of who are claiming the hand of this republic. This land is so fair, so beautiful, so affluent, that it has many suitors, and it will depend much upon your advice whether this or that shall be accepted or rejected.

I. In the first place, I remark: There is a greedy, all-grasping monster who comes in as suitor seeking the hand of this republic, and that monster is known by the name of MONOPOLY.

His sceptre is made out of the iron of the railroad and the wire of telegraphy. He does everything for his own advantage and for the robbery of the people. Things have gone on from bad to worse, until in the three Legislatures of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, for the most part, monopoly decides everything. If monopoly favor a law, it passes. If monopoly oppose a law, it is rejected. Monopoly stands in this railroad depot, putting into his pockets in one year two hundred millions of dollars in excess of all reasonable charges for service. Monopoly holds in his one hand the steam-power of locomotives, and in the other the electricity of swift communication. Monopoly decides nominations and elections—city elections, State elections, national elections. With bribes he secures the votes of legislators—giving them free passes, giving appointments to needy relatives to lucrative positions, employing them as attorneys, if they are lawyers, carrying their goods fifteen per cent less if they are merchants; and if he finds a case very stubborn, as well as very important, puts down before him the hard cash of bribery.

But monopoly is not so easily caught now as when, during the term of Mr. Buchanan, in one of our States a certain railway company procured a donation of public land. It was found out that thirteen of the Senators of that State received one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars among them: sixty members of the Lower House of that State received five thousand and ten thousand dollars each; the Governor of the State received fifty thousand dollars; his clerk received five thousand dollars; the Lieutenant-Governor received ten thousand dollars; all the clerks of the Legislature received five thousand dollars each, while fifty thousand dollars were divided amid the lobby agents.

That thing, on a larger or smaller scale, is all the time going on in some of the States of the Union, but it is not so blundering as it used to be, and therefore not as easily exposed or arrested. I tell you that of the United States to-day is monopoly. He puts his hand upon every bushel of wheat; upon every sack of salt, upon every ton of coal; and every man, woman, and child in the United States feels the touch of that moneyed despotism. I rejoice that in twenty-four States of the Union already anti-monopoly leagues have been established. God speed them in the work of liberation! I wish that this question might be the question of our Presidential elections, and that we compel the political parties to recognize it on their platforms.

I have nothing to say against capitalists. A man has a right to all the money he can make honestly. There is not a laborer in the land that would not be worth a million dollars if he could. I have nothing to say against corporations as such—without them no great enterprise would be possible; but what I do say is that the same principles are to be applied to capitalists and to corporations that are applied to the poorest man and the plainest laborer. What is wrong for me is wrong for great corporations. If I take from you your property without adequate compensation I am a thief, and if a railway damage the property of the people without any adequate compensation that is a gigantic theft. What is wrong on a small scale is wrong on a large scale. Monopoly in England has ground hundreds and thousands of her best people into semi-starvation, and in Ireland has driven multitudinous tenants almost to madness.

EUROPEAN LAND SHARKS.

Five hundred acres in this country make an immense farm. When you read that in Dakota Territory Mr. Cass has a farm of 15,000 acres, and Mr. Grandon, 25,000 acres, and Mr. Dalrymple, 40,000 acres, your eyes dilate, even though these farms are in great regions thinly inhabited. But what do you think of this which I take from the Doomsday Book, showing what monopoly is on the other side the sea? I give it as a warning of what it would do on this side the sea, if in some lawful way the tendency is not resisted. In Scotland, J. G. M. Heddle owns 50,400 acres; Earl of Wemyss, 52,000 acres; Duke of Montrose, 68,000 acres; Cameron of Lochiel, 109,500 acres; Sir C. W. Ross, 110,400 acres; Earl of Fife, 113,000 acres; the Mackintosh, 124,000 acres; Lord MacDonald, 130,000 acres; Earl of Dalhousie, 136,000 acres; Macleod of Macleod, 141,700 acres; Sir K. Mackenzie, of Gairloch, 164,680 acres; Duke of Argyle, 175,000 acres; Duke of Hamilton, 183,000 acres; Duke of Athole, 194,000 acres; Duke of Richmond, 255,000 acres; Earl of Stair, 270,000 acres; Mr. Evan Baillie, 300,000 acres; Earl of Seafield, 306,000 acres; Duke of Buccleugh, 432,183 acres; Earl of Breadalbane, 437,696 acres; Mr. A. Matheson, 220,433 acres; and Sir J. Matheson, 406,070 acres; Duchess of Sutherland, 149,879 acres; and Duke of Sutherland, 1,176,343 acres.

THE RESULT.

Such monopolies imply an infinite acreage of wretchedness. There is no poverty in the United States like that in England, Ireland, and Scotland, for the simple reason that in those lands monopoly has had longer and larger sway. Last summer in Edinburgh, Scotland, after preaching in Synod Hall, I preached in the Grass Market and to the wretched inhabitants of the Cowgate and Canongate, the audience exhibiting the squalor, and sickness, and despair that remains in one's mind like one of the visions of Dante's Inferno.

Great monopolies in any land imply great privation. The time will come when our Government will have to limit the amount of accumulation of property. Unconstitutional, do you say? Then constitutions will have to be changed until they allow such limitation. Otherwise the work of absorption will go on, and the large fishes will eat up the small fishes, and the shad will swallow the minnows, and the porpoise swallow the shad, and the whales swallow the porpoises, and a thousand greedy men will own all the world.

But would a law of limitation of wealth be unrighteous? If I dig so near my neighbor's foundations, in order to build my house, that I endanger his, the law grabs me. If I have a tannery or a chemical factory, the malodors of which injure residents in the neighborhood, the law says: "Stop that!" If I drain off a river from its bed, and divert it to turn my mill wheel, leaving the bed of the river a breeding place for malaria, the law says:

"QUIT THAT OUTRAGE!"

And has not a good Government a right to say that a few men shall not gorge themselves on the comfort, and health, and life of generations? Your rights end where my rights begin.

Monopoly, brazen-faced, and iron-fingered, vulture-hearted monopoly, offers his hand to this republic. He stretches it out over the lakes, and up the Pennsylvania, and the Erie, and the New York Central railroads, and over the telegraph poles of the continent, and says: "Here is my heart and hand; be mine forever." Let the millions of the people, North, South, East, and West, forbid the banns of that marriage— forbid them at the ballot-box, forbid them on the platform, forbid them by great organizations, forbid them by the overwhelming sentiments of an outraged nation, forbid them by the protest of the Church of God, forbid them by prayer to high heaven. That Herod shall not have this Abigail. It shall not be to all devouring monopoly that this land is to be married.

II. Another suitor claiming the hand of this republic is NIHILISM.

He owns nothing but a knife for universal blood-letting and a nitro-glycerine bomb for universal explosion. He believes in no God, no government, no heaven, and no hell, except what he can make on earth. He slew the Czar of Russia, keeps Emperor William, of Germany, practically imprisoned, killed Abraham Lincoln, would put to death every king and president on earth, and if he had the power would climb up until he could drive the God of Heaven from His throne and take it himself—the universal butcher. In France it is called Communism; in the United States it is called Socialism; in Russia it is called Nihilism. That last is the most graphic and descriptive term. It means complete and eternal smash-up.

Where does this monster live? In St. Louis, in Chicago, in Brooklyn, in New York, and in all the villages and cities of this land. The devil of destruction is an old devil, and he is to be seen at every great fire where there is anything to steal, and at every shipwreck where there is anything valuable floating ashore, and at every railroad accident where there are overcoats and watches to be purloined. On a small scale I saw it in my college days, when, in our literary society in New York University, we had an exquisite and costly bust of Shakespeare, and one morning we found a hole bored into the lips of the marble and a cigar inserted. There has not for the last century been a fine picture in your art gallery, or a graceful statue in your parks, or a fine fresco on your wall, or a richly bound volume in your library but would have been despoiled if the hand of ruffianism could have got at it without peril of incarceration.

The philosophy of the whole business is, that there is a large number of people who either through their laziness or their crime own nothing, and are mad at those who through industry and wit of their own, or of their ancestors, are in possession of large resources. The honest laboring-classes never had anything to do with such murderous enterprises. It is the villainous classes who would not work if they had plenty of work offered them at large wages. Many of these suppose that by the demolition of law and order they would be advantaged, and the parting of the ship of state would allow them as wreckers to carry off the cargo. It offers its hand to this fair republic. It proposes to tear to pieces the ballot-box, the legislative hall, the Congressional assembly. It would take this land and divide it up, or, rather

DIVIDE IT DOWN.

It would give as much to the idler as to the worker, to the bad as to the good, Nihilism! This panther, having prowled across other lands, has set its paws on our soil, and it is only waiting for the time in which to spring upon its prey. It was Nihilism that massacred the heroic policemen of Chicago and St. Louis a few days ago and that burned the railroad property at Pittsburgh during the great riots; it was Nihilism that slew black people in our Northern cities during the war; it was Nihilism that again and again in San Francisco and in New York mauled to death the Chinese; it is Nihilism that glares out of the windows of the drunkeries upon sober people as they go by. Ah! its power has never yet been tested. It would, if it had the power, leave every church, chapel, cathedral, schoolhouse, college, and home in ashes.

Let me say, it is

of the laboring-classes in any country. The honest cry for reform lifted by oppressed laboring men is drowned out by the vociferations for anarchy. The criminals and the vagabonds who range through our cities talking about their rights, when their first right is the penitentiary—if they could be hushed up, and the down-trodden laboring men of this country could be heard, there would be more bread for hungry children. Let not our oppressed laboring men be beguiled to coming under the bloody banner of Nihilism. It will make your taxes heavier, your wages smaller, your table scantier, your children hungrier, your suffering greater.

Yet this Nihilism, with feet red of slaughter, comes forth and offers its hand for the republic. Shall the banns be proclaimed? If so, where shall the marriage altar be? and who will be the officiating priest? And what will be the music? That altar will have to be white with bleached skulls, the officiating priest must be a dripping assassin, the music must be the smothered groan of multitudinous victims, the garlands must be twisted of nightshade, the fruit must be apples of Sodom, the wine must be the blood of St. Bartholomew's massacre. No! It is not to Nihilism, the sanguinal monster, that this land is to be married.

III. Another suitor for the hand of this nation is INFIDELITY.

Mark you that all anarchists are infidels. Not one of them believes in the Bible, and very rarely any of them believe in a God. Their most conspicuous leader was the other day pulled by the leg from under a bed in a house of infamy, cursing and blaspheming. The police of Chicago, exploring the dens of the anarchists, found dynamite, and vitriol, and Tom Paine's "Age of Reason," and obscene pictures, and complimentary biographies of thugs and assassins, but not one Testament, not one of Wesley's hymn-books, not one Roman Catholic breviary. There are two wings to infidelity; the one calls itself Liberalism, and appears in highly literary magazines, and is for the educated and refined; the other wing is in the form of Anarchy, and is for the vulgar. But both wings belong to the same old filthy vulture—infidelity! Elegant infidelity proposes to conquer this land to itself by the pen; Anarchy proposes to conquer it by bludgeon and torch.

When the midnight ruffians despoiled the grave of A. T. Stewart, in St. Mark's churchyard, everybody was shocked; but infidelity proposes something worse than that—the robbing of all the graves of Christendom of the hope of a resurrection. It proposes to chisel out from the tombstones of your Christian dead the words, "Asleep in Jesus," and to substitute the words, "Obliteration—annihilation." Infidelity proposes to take away from this country the book that makes the difference between the United States and the United Kingdom of Dahomey, between American civilization and Bornesian cannibalism.

The only impulse in the right direction that this world has ever had has come from the Bible. It was the mother of Roman law and of healthful jurisprudence. That book has been the mother of all reforms and all charities—mother of English Magna Charta and American Declaration of Independence." I tell you that of the century is the attempt to destroy this book; yet infidelity, loathsome, stenchful, leprous, pestiferous, rotten monster, stretches out its hand, ichorous with the second death, to take the hand of this republic.

And this suitor presses his case appallingly. Shall the banns of that marriage be proclaimed? "No!" say the home missionaries of the West—a martyr band, of whom the world is not worthy, toiling amid fatigues, and malaria, and starvation. "No! not if we can help it. By what we and our children have suffered we forbid the banns of that marriage!" "No!" say all patriotic voices; "our institutions were bought at too dear a price, and were defended at too great a sacrifice, to be so cheaply surrendered." "No!" says the God of Bunker Hill, and Independence Hall, and Gettysburg; "I did not start this nation for such a farce." "No," cry ten thousand voices; "to infidelity this land shall not be married!"

IV. But there is

that presents his hand for the hand of this republic. He is mentioned in the verse following my text, where it says: "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." It is not my figure, it is the figure of the Bible. As often princesses at their birth are of marriage to princes or kings of earth, so this nation at its birth was pledged to Christ for Divine marriage. Before Columbus and his hundred and twenty men embarked on the Santa Maria, the Pinta, and the Nina, for their wonderful voyage, what was the last thing they did? They kneeled down and took the holy sacrament of the Lord Jesus Christ. After they caught the first glimpse of this country, and the gun of one ship had announced it to the other vessels that land had been discovered, what was the song that went up from all the three decks? "Gloria in Excelsis." After Columbus and his hundred and twenty men had stepped from the ships' decks to the solid ground, what did they do? They all knelt and consecrated the New World to God.

What did the Huguenots do after they landed in the Carolinas? What did the Holland refugees do after they had landed in New York? What did the Pilgrim Fathers do after they landed in New England? With bended knee, and uplifted face, and heaven-besieging prayer they took possession of this country for God. How was the first American Congress opened? By prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. From its birth this nation was pledged for holy marriage with Christ.

And, then, see how good God has been to us! Just open the map of the continent and see how it is shaped for immeasurable prosperities. Navigable rivers, more in number and greater than of any other land, rolling down on all sides into the sea, prophesying large manufactures and easy commerce. Look at the great ranges of mountains timbered with wealth on the top and sides, metalled with wealth underneath. One hundred and eighty thousand square miles of coal, four hundred and eighty thousand square miles of iron. All fruits, all minerals, all harvests. Scenery displaying an autumnal pageantry that no land on earth pretends to rival. No South American earthquakes. No Scotch mists. No London fogs. No Egyptian plagues. No Germanic divisions. The people of the United States are happier than any people on earth. It is the testimony of every man that has travelled abroad. For the poor, more sympathy; for the industrious, more opportunity. Oh, how good God was to our fathers, and how good He has been to us and our children!

We have during the past six or seven years in our national history by the sudden addition of millions of foreigners. At Kansas City I was told by a gentleman who had opportunity for large investigation, that a great multitude had gone through there, averaging in worldly estate eight hundred dollars. I was told in the city of Washington by an officer of the Government, who had opportunity for authentic investigation, that thousands and thousands had gone, averaging one thousand dollars in possession each. I was told by the Commissioner of Emigration that twenty families that had arrived at Castle Garden brought eighty-five thousand dollars with them. Mark you, families, not tramps—additions to the national wealth, not subtractions therefrom. I saw some of them reading their Bibles and their hymn-books, thanking God for His kindness in helping them cross the sea. They will turn your Territories into States, and your wildernesses into gardens, if you will build for them churches, and establish for them schools, and send Christian missionaries.

Are you afraid this continent is going to be overcrowded with this population? Ah! that shows you have not been to Oregon, that shows that you have not been to Texas. A fishing-smack to-day on Lake Ontario might as well be afraid of being crowded by other shipping before night as for any one of the next ten generations of Americans to be afraid of being overcrowded by foreign populations in this country. The one State of Texas is far larger than all the Austrian Empire, yet the Austrian Empire supports thirty-five million people. The one State of Texas is larger than all France, and France supports thirty-six million people. The one State of Texas far surpasses in size the Germanic Empire, yet the Germanic Empire supports forty-one million people. I tell you the great want of the Territories and of the Western States is more population.

While some may stand at the gates of the city, saying: "Stand back!" to foreign populations, I press out as far beyond those gates as I can press out beyond them, and beckon to foreign nations, saying: "Come, come!" "But," say you, "I am so afraid that they will bring their prejudices for foreign Governments, and plant them here." Absurd. They are sick of the Governments that have oppressed them, and they want free America. Give them the great gospel of welcome. Throw around them all Christian hospitalities. They will add their industry and hard-earned wages to this country, and then we will dedicate all to Christ, "and thy land shall be married."

THE SITE FOR THE NUPTIALS.

But where shall the marriage altar be? Let it be the Rocky Mountains, when, through artificial and mighty irrigation, all their tops shall be covered, as they will be, with vineyards, and orchards, and grain fields. Then let the Bostons, and the New Yorks, and the Charlestons of the Pacific Coast come to the marriage altar on the one side, and then let the Bostons, and the New Yorks, and the Charlestons of the Atlantic Coast come to the marriage altar on the other side, and there between them let this bride of nations kneel; and then if the organ of the loudest thunders that ever shook the Sierra Nevada on the one side, or moved the foundations of the Alleghanies on the other side, should open full diapason of wedding march, that organ of thunders could not drown the voice of Him who should take the hand of the bride of nations, saying: "As a bridegroom rejoiceth over a bride, so thy God rejoiceth over thee." "And so thy land shall be married."

A DESPERATE PRISONER OVERCOME.

A WRITER in the Chicago Inter-Ocean relates the following remarkable incident in the life of Mrs. Sarah J. Smith, the eminent Quakeress, who died recently at Dublin, Ind. Mrs. Smith, in her Christian compassion for prisoners, succeeded some years ago in getting the appointment of superintendent of the new reformatory for females at Jeffersonville, Clarke County, Ind. When the building was ready for their reception, the culprits, a hardened, debased gang, were brought over in the prison vans, and Mrs. Smith stood in the doorway, dressed in her Quaker costume, with snow-white cap and handkerchief, and with a fine physique and noble beauty. The first one brought in by four stalwart officers was a woman past middle age, manacled hand and foot. She was a murderess, had been incarcerated seventeen years, and was the terror of all convicts and officers.

As they brought her in they inquired for the cell in which she was to be placed, feeling, doubtless, as many do now, that women could never manage such terrible creatures. With compassion beaming out of her eyes, Mrs. Smith directed her to be set down and her chains removed.

They looked astonished, and demurred; when, in the full dignity of her strength, she replied: "I command you to unloose her; take off every chain, and let her be free. She is my prisoner, not yours." And as the last chain fell off, she stepped forward, took the vile creature into her arms, and said: "My poor child, I receive thee into my arms as my child, and I will be a mother to thee, and I know thou wilt to me be a faithful child." And imprinting a kiss on her forehead—the first, doubtless, that she had received in many years—she said: "Let us pray." Together they kneeled, while Mrs. Smith asked for the power of the Holy Ghost and for grace to care for the poor woman; and then, rising with her arms still round her, they walked to the cell, the hardened woman a broken, penitent soul. In three weeks she gave every evidence of being converted to God, and for fourteen years led a meek, humble, and self-denying life.

CANNIBALISM IN AFRICA.

THOUGH much has already been done for the evangelization of Africa, few people realize how much yet remains to be done. A paper published in the Foreign Missionary, by J. H. Reading, of Kängwe, shows how frightful is the present condition of the people. The following is an extract, which, be it remembered, is the report of an eyewitness:

I have witnessed scenes in Africa, and should have witnessed many more if I had not fled from beholding them, which made me sometimes ready to say that no feeling of which compassion was an ingredient dwelt in the African heathen heart. Often it has seemed as though absolutely nothing but the fear of private revenge restrained the natives from all imaginable or unimaginable crimes.

The Kängwe and Talaguga stations of the West Africa Mission are both situated in the midst of cannibal villages. The Niam Niam and the Fans are the same as the Fangwe, and the Monbutu the same as the Osheha, who live a little back from the Ogove. Du Chaillu's description of the cannibals was considered by many incredible; but some of his most fearful statements can be and have been corroborated in detail by the missionaries, and his general account of those tribes is correct.

In the autumn of 1880 Dr. Bachelier sent three messengers from Kängwe overland to Gaboon, to carry letters. The Fangwe fired on them, killed one and captured the others. These two saw their comrade cut up and divided among the war party, each person, in the most matter-of-course way, taking off his share. The captives obtained their liberty through the influence of the missionaries. The friends of the murdered man compelled the doctor to pay a large sum for their slain relative, and then, coming stealthily upon a Fangwe village, killed three of its people in revenge.

Eighteen miles above Kängwe, amid the Fangwe, lives a mulatto ivory-trader, from Boston, often visited by the missionaries. He told me on one of my visits that, a short time before, the Fangwe bought a woman, on the opposite side of the river, who was condemned to death for witchcraft. They brought her over to an island in the river, directly in front of his house, and, after they had let her cry awhile and beg for mercy, they killed her and divided the body, each carrying off his portion. Almost the last time I was at Talaguga, Dr. Nassau told me of a canoe which had stopped at his landing with a supply of provisions which one of his mission boys was about to buy; but, on opening the bundle, evidence too horrible to repeat, was at once disclosed which forbade the thought. The cruelties upon the living are still more terrible.

SEEING WITH ONE EYE.

AMONG my friends and acquaintances there is a missionary of a city mission and tract society who is remarkable for his skill and tact in dealing with individual cases. At one time a Christian master of a large carpenter's shop sought his services in behalf of his foreman.

"He is profane, a scoffer, and a sceptic," he said. "I cannot do anything with him, and I cannot get along without him, he is such an excellent workman."

The missionary promised to see what he could do. Frequently he visited the shop, speaking to one and another of the journeymen, but sedulously avoiding the foreman, until his curiosity was thoroughly aroused. At last the opportunity waited for came. Seeing the foreman squinting along a board to see if it was straight, the skill and tact of the missionary seized upon the occasion. Stepping up to the workman, he said: "Now, is it not strange that a man with two good eyes can see better with one?"

With a hearty laugh, the foreman answered: "Well, I never thought of that, but it is true sometimes."

"Yes, it is true; and that reminds me of a verse in the Bible, 'If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness.' I guess you had better think of that," and the missionary left him.

However, the wedge was in, the workman's respect was won, and his mind set to thinking. As he said afterward, he could never run his eye along a board without the words coming to mind, and an inquiry as to their meaning. Slowly and patiently the missionary followed up his advantage, until at last the heart yielded, and the scoffer became a humble but zealous follower of Christ. The last I heard of him, some years ago, he was a faithful steward in a church and superintendent of the Sunday-school.

LORD SHAFTESBURY'S FAMILY PLATE.

THE Bishop of Exeter, who was an intimate friend of the late philanthropic Earl of Shaftesbury, speaking recently of the deceased nobleman, related an instance of his self-denial, which has not been published before. He said: I knew him in my childhood's days, when he came as Lord Ashley to my father's house, and was always a favorite of us children. I was one of his clergymen in Dorsetshire, the living of Hinton—the first living in his gift as Earl Shaftesbury. He came to me after I went there, and said: "Bickersteth, I am going to build a schoolroom in your parish." I knew that he had a good many claims on him, and I said: "Let me help you to collect the funds." But he would not, and he built schoolrooms in two of the parishes on the estate. Afterward he said to me: "You asked me to allow you to help me in collecting funds, but I thought it was not my duty to do so. Do you know how I got the money?" I said: "No, of course I do not." "Well," he said, "I found I had so much more plate left me by my father than I wanted, that I thought I would sell enough to build these two schoolrooms." I had not been at Hampstead very long when we had a great sorrow in our Sailors' Orphan School. The Roman Catholics got hold of one of our children, one of the sweetest of the children in the school; the Roman Catholics demanded her. The story is far too long to tell. Well, we had a contest before the Court of Queen's Bench, and one and another were falling back. I said to Lord Shaftesbury, "Will you support me?" and he said: "Dear Bickersteth, we will fight them to the end, and we will not lose one of the children." That child was made a ward of Chancery, was rescued from the clutches of Rome, and has been a faithful servant of Jesus Christ from that time to this. That was Lord Shaftesbury, and the same self-denying spirit entered into everything he did.

BLESSING FOR SOUL AND BODY.

IN the current number of Thy Healer the following testimony is given by Mr. Charles Goodland, 32 Wells Street, London: The Lord has done great things for me. When we get all the powers of our soul blessed, our judgment, affections, understanding, will, memory, and conscience, it would be a very strange thing, indeed, if the body were not blessed also. It seems remarkable that people should talk so much about having their souls thoroughly saved and sanctified, and yet keep a body full of suffering and pain. When I gave myself to the Lord, I had very weak eyesight, so that I could not properly see to do my work. Often I had intense pain at the back of the head through straining the optic nerve. The Lord gave me deliverance from this, also from intense depression of spirits. I could not, by any eloquence of language or any power of words, describe to you the extreme suffering I formerly underwent. Often I awoke at night with sweat on my brow, fancying I was dying. I could not tell you the excruciating agony I suffered. But the Lord has perfectly healed me. I have not come from the Antipodes or the backwoods of America to tell you a wonderful story. I have lived and been known in this neighborhood for twenty years and if anybody had told me twenty months ago that to-day I should be testifying to a body healed and a mind perfectly at rest and a soul saved, I should have regarded it as one of the greatest of miracles. Glory be to God. My restoration came through no power of the flesh, but by the Spirit of the living God, whose love dwells in my heart, and from whom I hope all my affections will henceforth spring.

A REMINISCENCE OF NOVA SCOTIA.

BISHOP HELLMUTH, late of Huron, in the course of a recent speech, said: The Forks of St. Mary on the eastern side of Nova Scotia are the scene of very interesting work. On that rocky, inhospitable coast a faithful missionary has been carrying on the work under difficulties and perplexities which would have discouraged many Christians. I remember well the rough journey to the Forks of St. Mary. Going along the coast, partly in a cart without springs, and partly walking, I came to the place occupied by the faithful missionary, now in heaven, the Rev. Mr. Alexander, who had been carrying on the work for thirteen years, and he gave me a description, which other people corroborated, of the neighborhood. Its condition was originally most wretched. Wreckers watched the coast, lighting false fires, and doing everything they could to lead ships to destruction. Strong drink was universal. The teapots of the people, instead of containing tea, were filled with brandy, whiskey, or other strong drink. The missionary encountered great difficulties; but, resolved to lead as many sinners as he could to Christ, he went from hamlet to hamlet, entreating the people to attend any little meeting he might have. At first his efforts and remarks were sneered at, and he could not entertain the hope that his appeals would find a lodgment in the hearts of the people; still he went on in the Spirit of his Lord and Master, and what was the result, after thirteen years? When I reached the coast there was no drink and there were no wreckers. The people gladly assembled whenever they were summoned to the house of God, or called together in any way to serve their Lord and Master. I remember preaching there to a crowded congregation at a little place called Sherbrook. A seafaring man was sitting at the foot of the pulpit, listening to the Word of life with tears streaming down his cheeks. I asked Mr. Alexander who the old man was. He was between eighty and ninety years of age. "Ah!" said Mr. Alexander, "that was the captain of the wreckers, but now he is my helper in God's work. He is like a hard-working curate to me."

JESUS, OUR "ELDER BROTHER!"

By Mr. Silliman Blagden.

ON Friday night, January 29th, 1886, I was standing on the corner of Summer and Washington streets, Boston, waiting for a car. It had been, and was still, very rainy, and generally uncomfortable for all who had to be out of doors.

Suddenly I heard a feeble voice behind me, cry the evening papers for sale; I turned to look, and there in the dark recess of a doorway, were two little forms, shrinking and shivering in the cold and wet.

One was a boy about four or five years of age, I suppose, and the other one, who proved to be the former's brother, was about seven or eight, I should think.

I noticed this poor little fellow, the elder one, was crying bitterly; his eyes were red, and his wizened face and cheeks were wet with many tears. I don't think I ever saw such a woe-begone, distressed, and frightened look in a child's face before! They were both poorly clad, and evidently the children of very needy and severe parents.

I asked the elder one what he was crying for, and what was the matter? He said that his little brother had dropped the papers in the flooded street, and that they were now no good; he had them stuffed in his pocket as he showed me, and the poor little waif looked as if all hope and life had forever flown from the horizon of his young existence! Poor little fellow! I shall never forget those red and wet and tearful eyes, with their agonized and pleading and despairing look.

And then his little brother told the secret in these words: "When we get home, he'll get a licking!"

Why, I said, if you dropped the papers, you will be the one to get the whipping! But all he replied, was, "He'll get a licking!"

Yes; here was a case of the elder brother taking the punishment of the guilty, though himself innocent!

After a little talk I found that the wet papers would occasion a loss of "ten cents!"

I found a ten-cent piece in my pocket, and gave it to the elder brother.

Oh, how that poor little faded face brightened up! And right away I thought of our Lord's words: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto Me!"

Then I asked him who it was that died on the cruel cross to save us? and he answered: "Our Lord;" then I said, I give you these ten cents in His name, and you will try to love Him, and keep His commandments, won't you? And oh, how bright and cheerful came now the quick response: "Yes, sir!"

I bought a paper from the younger one, and then took a passing car for home, and while riding I was deeply moved, even to tears myself, thinking of those poor little waifs—newsboys; and of that forlorn elder brother who was dreading that whipping that awaited him when he got home that cold, wet, and stormy night. And it all made me think "of Jesus, blessed Jesus," our "Elder Brother!" and the untold agonies He silently endured, being innocent, in taking our punishment, we being indeed guilty!

"Jesus saith,—Lovest thou Me?
Feed My lambs.
Lovest thou Me?
Feed My sheep."

"More love to Thee, O Christ!
More love to Thee;
Hear Thou the prayer I make
On bended knee;
This is my earnest plea,
More love, O Christ, to Thee!
More love to Thee!
More love to Thee!"

"And whosoever shall give unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward" (Matt. 10:42).

THE USES OF PROPHETIC STUDY.

By the Rev. Clarmont Skrine.

A Practical Subject—Pressed on the Thessalonians—Their Fears Removed—What they were to Wait for—The Present Hope of the Church—What it Will Bring—Union—Rewards—Governmental Power.

THERE are many who keep from the subject of prophecy, because they think it impractical; because it takes their thoughts away from the present time and present subjects—the growth of holiness, the present enjoyment of the Lord, and such things. Now, we have the answer to these objections in the first and second Epistles to the Thessalonians. How does the Apostle Paul deal with the subject there? Did this hope make the Thessalonian Church indifferent to the cause of Christ or the dissemination of Christianity? Did it make them neglect the subject of personal holiness? Was it not quite the reverse? But it has come to pass that the subject is neglected and lost sight of to a considerable extent, and that great which seem to stand together in Rev. 1:3, is forgotten and lost: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein."

Just glance with me then at these first and second Epistles to the Thessalonians. Notice how in each chapter the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ is referred to. Bear in mind that the apostle had spent in Thessalonica just six short Sabbath days; but that during those few weeks, when he visited that place of conspicuous heathenism, and led souls to Jesus, he was able in the very A B C of the Gospel to place before them the glorious doctrine of the Second Advent of the Lord Jesus Christ. That hope was the one great thought which filled their souls, and made them such zealous converts, such diligent and earnest workers, and such faithful servants of the Lord.

Was it not a fact, dear friends, that so strongly had this truth been impressed upon the minds of the Thessalonian Christians that they grieved and mourned for the dead; and that, as they followed a dear saint to the grave and laid the body there in the hope of a glorious resurrection, they shed tears of sorrow because they thought that loved one had lost the prospect of

MEETING THE LORD IN THE AIR

—that there was some loss to the one who had been taken away before the personal return of the Lord? And when the apostle corrects the mistaken idea, how does he do it? Not by telling them that they had misunderstood him in reference to the immediate and sudden removal of the Church during the lifetime of the saints; but in this way: he tells them that "the dead in Christ shall rise first"—those for whom you mourn will have left the grave before you are taken; they will be carried up from the grave before you are transformed into the likeness and glory of the Lord Jesus Christ, but that both together they should meet the Lord in the air.

I know we may look, and should look, for tribulation. We know there is to be trouble; we see the oncoming of the great tribulation; but none of these things, I apprehend, are intended to come in the way of the hope of

or to rise up before us as a series of events for which we are to look before we can expect the Lord to come. I take literally the divine command in the last prayer the Master ever taught His Church—occurring as it does at the close of the revealed Word, where He says: "Surely I come quickly," and we reply: "Even so, come Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Now, the Thessalonians were under persecution, and they looked also for the oncoming evil, which yet looms in the near distance before us to-day. About Antichrist they were taught about the lawless one who was to arise, and whom the Lord should consume with the breath of His mouth, and destroy with the brightness of His Coming. But what was the apostle's way of dealing with them? As they looked at that dark and gloomy picture in the distance, what did he tell them? As they feared, because the day of the Lord was to be so terrible, what was His counsel and consolation? He told them that there was another event which was to antedate that great apostasy—which was to antedate that manifestation of the Man of Sin; and that that event was their gathering together unto our Lord Jesus Christ.

The hope of the Church, whether it be out of the tribulation, or before the tribulation, whether in the midst of the tribulation or otherwise, the hope of the Church which is put before the mind of the Church of God, is the immediate, the sudden and unexpected removal of the saints to meet the Lord, not on the earth but in the air.

Look at the Church of Christ in its present condition. What is its state? How separated, how divided, how mingled with that which is evil; how many there are of us out of fellowship with one another, and sometimes it may be out of fellowship with the Lord. But again, and when the Church is gathered around His glorious person, then all the members are one, and the Lord is manifested to them all. Then we shall see Him as He is, and we shall be like Him. Is not that a much more blessed condition than the separated state of the Church now? Do not you pray for His Coming because you realize that this is the only remedy for all our divisions, and all that is distracting and disturbing in the communion of the Church.

Then, do not let us forget this last exhilarating thought in connection with the hope of the Church—

THE DISTRIBUTION OF REWARDS.

II Cor. 5 bears distinctly upon this. The Bema, or throne of judgment, there spoken of, is that to which you and I are looking as the only judgment-seat with which we as justified and pardoned men and women—children of God by faith in Jesus Christ, and doing service for God springing out of our relationship to Him—this I say, is the only judgment-seat with which we have to do. Our sins have been judged, but our works have not been rewarded; and it is a wonderful thought that after the Lord has converted your soul He gives you the desire and the power to work for Him. After He has wrought all these works by you, He is then going, in a wondrous way, to reward you for what you have done.

Then there is governmental power, on which I cannot now dwell, but that is also part of the hope of the Church. The Church will reign with Christ, and we shall be kings and priests with the Lord. What comfort this gives to us as we look at the condition of the world at this moment. As we see all the powers of the earth shaken to their very foundation, thrones tottering, sedition rife, infidelity on the increase, and moral and social evil abounding to such an extent that it has never before reached the point it has now, except, perhaps, in the days of Sodom—what a comfort it is for us to be able to expect the Master at any moment, that He may reign and gather up all power for Himself.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Marriage Called Forth Cordial congratulations from all sections of the country and all political parties. It was strange but pleasant to read in journals where Mr. Cleveland's name is never mentioned without censure an expression of good wishes for Mr. and Mrs. Grover Cleveland. Of course this does not imply a political reconciliation, but it is gratifying to notice how little personal animosity there is in honest public criticism of prominent men. Republicans took as much interest as Democrats in the happy event, and all united in wishing the bride and bridegroom a happy life. The bride, who is a member of the Central Presbyterian Church of Buffalo, N. Y., seems to have charmed all who have seen her, and Washington society is looking forward to a more sunny time during the remainder of the President's term.

The Bankruptcy Bill Suffered a Defeat in the Senate on June 1st. On the motion of Senator George, of Mississippi, the clause providing for involuntary bankruptcy was condemned. The Senator expressed his approval of all other parts of the bill, and wished to have it recommitted and reported back without the involuntary clause. Senator Hoar, however, who had the bill in charge, stated that he and his committee regarded the clause as essential to the bill for the protection of creditors against one of their number who might be first in the field. Mr. Hoar intimated that the bill would probably be withdrawn for this session. That result will be much regretted in business circles, especially by creditors, by whom the bill was generally approved. It is less favorable to debtors than the present system.

The Secretary of the Treasury has so far recovered as to be able to travel, but not to resume his duties. He tendered his resignation to the President in a letter published last week, but has been persuaded by Mr. Cleveland to hold it in abeyance and take a vacation of four months, in the hope that it will re-establish his health. Mr. Manning, in the course of his characteristic letter, emphatically urges prompt and radical legislation. He writes: "Under the operation of currency laws and tariff laws now in force, which you and the Forty-ninth Congress were elected by the people to repeal and reform, the burdened industries of our country are plunging heavily along a miry road toward foreseen danger. We talk of arbitrating our respective share of disaster, instead of knocking off our self-imposed fetters and releasing a general prosperity." There is but little probability of the Secretary's warning being heeded. Congress is opposed to any reform in the direction indicated, and a large part of the country shares the feeling.

The Indictment of the Anarchists in Chicago by the Grand Jury last week was accompanied by a report in which the jury say: "The evidence produced before us was conclusive as to the fact that the Anarchist conspiracy had no real connection with the strikes or labor troubles, but that it simply made use of the excitement incident to those troubles as its opportunity. By those in the best position to know, we have been assured that the total number of Anarchists or Nihilists in this country from whom danger need be apprehended is less than one hundred, and probably does not exceed from forty to fifty men. Associating with them, and partly subject to their malign influence, there are perhaps a few hundred more who would be dangerous in exact proportion to the extent that they are made to believe in the power of their leaders and in the weakness of the law. Then, again, there are perhaps from two to three thousand men variously classed as Socialists, Communists, etc., who are addicted to wild and visionary theories in regard to matters of government, but who are not necessarily dangerous or inimical to the peace and welfare of society so long as the law is enforced in such a manner as to entitle it to their wholesome respect." The moderation and good sense of the entire report indicate that the public feeling in Chicago is not tending in the direction of vindictive punishment, but of stern justice.

Herr Most was Sentenced on Wednesday of last week to the full penalty allowed by the law for the offence of which he was convicted. The Recorder, in passing sentence, expressed his regret that he could not administer a heavier punishment. Most is not a man to feel his position acutely, or the scathing words the judge addressed to him would have been no inconsiderable part of his punishment. The Recorder said it would be useless to waste words on such a man, but he thus briefly explained to him why he was to be punished: "You have advocated poison, murder, arson. You have made addresses to ignorant foreigners, urging them to resort to these awful crimes against individual citizens and against society. You have gone so far as to instruct domestic servants through your writings how to manufacture and administer poison to their employers. A more wicked and atrocious scoundrel than you are does not disgrace the face of this earth! It is well that men of your character, views, and opinions should be taught that, although the laws of this land are merciful, they will be upheld at any cost, and that those who violate or attempt to violate them will be punished with severity." He then sentenced him to a year at hard labor in the penitentiary, and to pay a fine of five hundred dollars, standing committed a day for each dollar.

The Death of Mr. John Kelly on June 1st removes from the political arena a man who has long exercised a powerful influence on State and national politics. As the head of the Tammany organization, he was able to control for many years a majority of the Democratic voters of New York, and to make his power felt in the National Conventions. He was trusted, honored, and loved by thousands of enthusiastic supporters, who were ready to do his bidding blindly. Added to this, his magnetic personal character and extensive private charity won him respect. His power, however, was not unchallenged within his party. Mr. Tilden was his persistent opponent, and was nominated in spite of his determined opposition. Mr. Cleveland also he vigorously opposed, though in both cases Mr. Kelly acquiesced in the decision of the Conventions. His quarrel with Lucius Robinson, however, was carried to the polls, and by his own candidacy he voluntarily handed the State government to the Republicans at a time very critical in the interests of his party. Both the city and the State suffered at his hands, not directly, but because he secured appointments for men totally unfitted for the positions they gained through his influence. Even his most active enemies, however, bear witness that personally he was honest and incorruptible. He was a native of New York City, and was sixty-four years old when he died.

The Belgian Courts had on Trial Last Week the man whose writings are said to have incited the recent fatal riots in that country. A burlesque catechism which was circulated by tens of thousands before the riots was the chief basis of the charge. It was distributed among the working men, and was of an incendiary character. The accused denied that the catechism was in any way responsible for the Belgian riots, and declared the pamphlet only began to sell well after the Charleroi outbreak. Much to the disgust of his disciples, he repudiated all connection with the anarchists. The court sentenced him to a year's imprisonment.

An Ante-Russian Combination is Expected as an outcome of the Eastern question. The European correspondent of the Herald cables that both at Constantinople and at Athens hopes are entertained that the advent of M. Tricoupis to power will lead to a quasi-alliance between Greece and Turkey. The recent manifestations of Russia's aggressive policy at Sebastopol, the proceedings at Moscow and the speeches made there are reckoned as showing the necessity of both the former governments preparing to meet at an early date the further manœuvres of the common enemy in the Balkan States. Neither Turkey nor Greece has as yet materially reduced the respective armies, but a collision between the two is now regarded as improbable.

The Home Rule Bill was Debated in the British Parliament and at meetings in various parts of the country throughout last week. Mr. Chamberlain made frantic efforts to keep his followers together. He held a meeting on Monday of all who acknowledge him as their leader, and fifty-four members of Parliament presented themselves. He read a letter from John Bright indorsing his policy, and harangued the meeting in a speech showing not only determined opposition to Mr. Gladstone's scheme, but the jealousy of which he has been long suspected of Mr. Gladstone himself. On the next night he delivered an acrimonious speech in the House of Commons, where for almost the first time in his life he was received with cheers from the Tories. It was a curious combination, that of the Birmingham screw-maker, the man who advocates a Republic instead of a monarchy, being applauded by the aristocratic Whigs and Conservatives. Mr. Sexton replied to him, pointing out with much force the distinction between Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hartington. The latter, he said, the Irish people respected as an open enemy; he had not, at least, been false and treacherous. Mr. Sexton concluded by saying: "Whatever should be the fate of the bill, the Irish people would cherish with lasting gratitude the memory of Mr. Gladstone. Whether that bill was carried or not, it would not be a dead measure; it would live in its results. Mr. Gladstone deserved a statue beside that of Fox in the corridor of the House, and his memory would yet be cherished and blessed as that of the man who conceived a settlement satisfactory to Ireland and honorable alike to both countries." On Tuesday, June 8, the bill was defeated by a vote of 341 to 311.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $27. From Second-Adventist, Cambridgeport, Mass., $20; W. S. M., Philadelphia, Pa., $5; S., New York, $2. Recipients of the journal by this fund should understand that the gratitude they so pathetically express in their letters is due not so much to us as to the friends whose liberality enables us to send them the paper. When they pray for the editors, as they promise to do, they must not forget their unknown benefactors.

The Ninth Summer School of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy will be held at Key East, N. J., from August 17th to 26th. Among the speakers already engaged are Rev. C. F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., President of the Institute; Francis L. Patton, D.D., LL.D., Professor Benjamin C. Blodgett, Rev. James Whitton, Ph.D., Professor Borden P. Bowne, Rev. J. E. Rankin, D.D., Ransom B. Weich, D.D., LL.D., and Rev. James W. Lee, of Atlanta, Ga. We are glad to notice that one of the subjects set down for discussion is that of the relations of "Labor and Capital." The peaceable solution of this question depends more upon the serious attention of intelligent clergymen than is generally supposed. We have had enough of empty declamation and rant. If men who think and pray examine it, we may hope for some just settlement of the problem. Key East, where the meetings are to be held, is one mile below Ocean Grove. For further particulars address Mr. Charles M. Davis, 4 Winthrop Place, New York.

The New Library and Gymnasium Presented by Mr. Ira D. Sankey to the Young Men's Christian Association of Newcastle, Pa., his former home, has been formally opened and dedicated. It is an imposing brick building in the Queen Anne style of architecture. The land on which it is erected cost $7000, and the building $28,000. The library contains three thousand volumes, the majority of which were selected by Mr. Sankey during his visit to Europe.

Four New Bishops have been Elected by the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and formally consecrated. They are: Rev. William Wallace Duncan, of South Carolina; Rev. Charles D. Galloway, of Mississippi; Rev. Dr. Eugene Russell Hendrix, and Rev. Dr. Joseph Stanton, of Kentucky. It was stated at the conference that the total increase in the Methodist Church South for the past four years has been 130,277, giving in 1885 a total membership of 990,994. Number of Sunday-schools in 1885, 10,632, an increase in four years of 1312 schools; teachers, 9531; scholars, 108,425. In 1882 this church raised for foreign missions $103,000; in 1885, $230,000, more than doubling the contributions in four years.

A Larger Number of the New York Churches than usual will, it appears by the published announcements, remain open during the summer. One pastor states that he finds the devil does not suspend his operations during the summer months, but is as active as usual when the thermometer is "among the nineties." That is a fact that it is well that clergymen are beginning to recognize. If some of them were to come home quietly from the summer resorts and spend a Sunday in the city, they would be astonished to see how their congregations occupy themselves on the Lord's Day when the churches are closed.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church South, at Augusta, Ga., has condemned by a vote of 137 to 13 the teaching of the doctrine of evolution in the colleges. The resolution adopted declared that the theory of development as taught by Dr. Woodrow was contrary to the Scriptures as these were interpreted by the Presbyterian standards. The Assembly also "earnestly recommended the synods of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and South Georgia and Florida, which direct and control the Columbia Theological Seminary, to dismiss the Rev. James Woodrow, D.D., as professor in the seminary, and to appoint another in his place, and to speedily take such other steps as in their judgment will be best adapted to restore the seminary to the confidence of the Church."

A Woman's Temerity is Causing Anxiety to engineers on the Erie Railroad. She is one of a great number of people who obtain their supplies of fuel by picking up waste coal from the railroad track. She frequents one particular crossing. Every day she subjects the nerves of some engineer to a terrible strain. She persists in remaining on the track, quietly and unconcernedly picking coal, until the locomotive is almost upon her, when she steps to one side as if she were merely turning out of the way of a pedestrian instead of a railroad train going at high speed. Engineers have got so they are on the lookout for her as they approach the crossing. As soon as they see her they sound the alarm whistle, but she simply looks up, as if measuring the distance between her and the advancing train, and the probable time it will consume in reaching her, and then coolly resumes her coal-picking until the engine is within two or three feet of her, when she steps from in front of it. The engineers have asked that the police keep the woman off the track or she will be killed. They apparently show more concern for her safety than she does. That is seldom the case where life is in peril, though it is common enough in persons whose souls are not saved (II Chron. 36 : 16).

A Ship and a Cargo were Saved in a Storm recently by pouring oil on the waves. Captain Boutcher, of the steamer Mentmore, reports in this month's United States Pilot Chart that during his last voyage from Baltimore, Md., he experienced heavy gales from the north-west, attended with very heavy seas. As the ship had a deck load of cattle and there was imminent danger of some of the cattle being washed overboard, he placed two oil bags, filled with fish oil, at each end of the foreyard. The oil ran over the side slowly. The effect was seen very soon in the perceptible smoothing of the previously breaking seas. The oil slick extended at least two hundred yards to windward of the vessel, and scarcely a drop of water came on board after the use of oil was begun. The storm was long in abating, but the Mentmore rode safely. The captain states his conviction that if it had not been for the oil, even if the ship had outlived the storm, the decks would have undoubtedly been swept. Captain Boutcher states that he was induced to use the oil bags by reading the reports on the monthly charts. The mere theoretical knowledge that oil would calm the sea would not have helped him had he not been prepared to turn it to practical use. His example may be commended to young people commencing the voyage of life. There are abundant testimonies on record of the value of religion in the crises through which they must pass (Isa. 43 : 1-4).

A Capitalist's Application for Admission to the poorhouse was rejected recently at Goshen, N. Y. About two years ago a bachelor tradesman in New York retired from business and went to Hamptonburg, N. Y., to get the benefit of country prices. He succeeded in living at a low rate, and as he abstained from voting and was very reticent about himself, he escaped taxation. Eventually, however, the assessors found that he had money in two savings banks, and a comfortable income besides. They therefore put him on the list of taxpayers. About the same time a mortgage of a thousand dollars which he held became worthless, owing to a defect in the mortgagor's title. The two troubles together made the man almost frantic, and, though he had a considerable income left, he determined to economize. He read in the newspapers that the cost of boarding a pauper in the county poorhouse at Goshen was only two dollars a week, and he immediately made application for admission, offering to pay the two dollars. He was informed that the law did not allow the superintendent to entertain capitalists. So it appears there is still one place left in the country to which wealth does not give its possessor a title, and actually renders him ineligible. It should not be forgotten that there is another place, not, indeed, barred against the rich, but which they cannot enter so easily as can the poor (Mark 10 : 23, 24).

An Editor's Chagrin was Honestly Confessed in the columns of his newspaper recently. He edits a journal in Maine. On the first of this month he left his office shortly after six o'clock in the evening, and went to his nephew's grocery store to purchase some provisions. To his amazement he found it closed. Going to another store he found that closed too, and looking down the street he saw that every grocery store was shut up. The editor in his astonishment inquired the reason, and learned that during the summer months the dealers had agreed among themselves to close at six o'clock. Then it dawned upon his memory that he had not only advocated the movement editorially, but had published an advertisement announcing the early closing, and had called the attention of buyers to it in a paragraph. It will be unspeakably sad at the last if it is found that preachers or Sunday-school teachers, who have warned others against procrastination, have themselves been cut off in their sins (I Cor. 9 : 27).

A Schoolboy's Ideas about Work were Expressed with some candor in an essay handed to Professor Staats a few days ago by one of his pupils. The boy, who had been told to prepare a composition on work, wrote: "I hate work so do a great many other people I know. It is a good thing to get rid of when you can. Generally those people that work the hardest git the least pay. Men are now striking to work very little & git pay very big. A handy way to get rid of work is never to be around where it is. A grate many people are ashame to work for their living & say thay dont haf to work, but do it for there helth. In this town some men let there wives work for what thay eat, while they say they are looking for work & where any can be found they charge so much that thay dont git it. When I say I dont like work I tell the truth." Many grown men have the same ideas, though they have not the honesty to confess it. We see, however, in the church, as well as in the world, that the boy made no new discovery when he described his "handy" method of getting rid of work by not being around where it is. Christ's cause makes slow progress in the world compared with that it would attain if His professed followers were "zealous of good works" (Titus 2 : 14).

Adrift at Sea in a Row-Boat for Fifty-two hours was the painful experience of three Brooklyn young men last week. They started out on Tuesday afternoon to row to Staten Island, but the tide proved too strong for them. Finding they could not reach their destination nor return, they tried to make Coney Island Point or Sandy Hook. They failed in both instances, and the current carried them out to sea. They slept by turns all that night, one using an oar to keep the head of the boat turned toward the wind. On Wednesday they lay down in the bottom of the boat and with open mouths welcomed the rain which fell early in the afternoon. One of the young men became so hungry that he cut a piece of leather from his boot and began to chew it. They passed Wednesday night as they had passed Tuesday night. It was not until near sunset Thursday evening, when they were almost in a state of despair, that a steamship came into view. She took the young men on board, and they were brought safely to New York. They had suffered much from hunger and thirst, but more from distress. When they started on their excursion they must have either under-estimated the power of the current they had to cross, or over-estimated their own strength. Both mistakes are often made by young men who voluntarily enter into temptation and drift out into the sea of iniquity. It is sad to think that of those few are ever saved, though rescue is offered them (Ps. 1 : 4-6).

REJOICE EVERMORE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

THE NINETEEN HUNDREDTH HE HAS PUBLISHED.

"Rejoice evermore."—I THESS. 5 : 16.

A Sunny Precept—Set Among Duties—When to be Wretched—The Saints of Misery—A Woman Shakes her Head—Liberty to Groan—I. The Quality of the Rejoicing—Not Carnal—Not Presumptuous—Persons who Should not Rejoice—Not Fanatical—Shouting Soldiers—Not Ecstasy—II. The Object of Rejoicing—III. Reasons for Rejoicing—Keeps Temptation Away—Encourages Others.

THIS is a sunny precept. When we read it we feel that the time of the singing of birds has come. While musing on this text, I seem carried in spirit to the green woods, and their bowers. As in a dell all blue with hare-bells, where the sun smiles down upon me through the half-born oak leaves, I sit me down, and hear the blessed birds of the air piping out their love-notes; their music saith only this—"Rejoice evermore." All that I see, and hear, and feel, surrounds me with garlands of delight; while the fairest of all the shepherds of Sharon sings to me

THIS DELICIOUS PASTORAL.

The very words have breathed spring into my soul, and set my heart a blossoming. Thus am I also made to be as a daffodil which long has hidden away among the clods, but now at last ventures to uplift her yellow lily, and ring out her golden bell. Who can be sad, or silent, when the voice of the Beloved saith "Rejoice evermore"? Some things being once done are done with, and you need not further meddle with them; but you have never done with rejoicing. "Rejoice evermore."

Our text is set in the midst of many precepts. Notice how from the fourteenth verse the apostle packs together a number of duties of Christian ministers and church members one toward another. "We exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient toward all men." All these things are to be done in turn, according as occasion requires; but "rejoice evermore." You have plenty to do; but this thing you have always to do. You shall never be able to fold your hands for want of some holy task or other; but be not worried; be not fretted by what you have to do; on the contrary, take up the sacred duties with alacrity, welcoming each one of them, and entering upon them with delight. Rejoice in each one, because you "rejoice evermore."

You will have to warn the unruly, and their rebellious tempers will, perhaps, irritate you; or, if in patience you possess your soul, yet you may grow sad at having so melancholy a duty to perform; but be not overmuch troubled, even by the grief of injured love. Warn the unruly, but "rejoice evermore." Do not pause in the blessed service of rejoicing when you are called upon to comfort

THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

There is a danger that the feeble-minded may rob you of your comfort, but let it not be so. In attempting to lift them out of the waters you may, perhaps, be almost drowned yourself; your deliverance will lie in the sweet word: "Rejoice evermore." You will lose your power both to warn the unruly and to comfort the feeble-minded, if you lose your joy. Your rejoicing will be a great support to the faint; your ceasing to rejoice will be a terrible confirmation of their sorrow. Lend the feeble a hand, but do not stop your own singing. Does not a mother carry her babe, and sing at the same time? The command to rejoice is set in the midst of duties; it is put there to teach us how to perform them all.

Also notice that our text comes after just a flavoring of trouble and bitterness. Read verse fifteen: "See that none render evil for evil unto any man." Children of God are apt to have evil rendered to them. They may have slanderous reports spread about them; they may be accused of things they never dreamed of; they may be cut to the heart by the ingratitude of those who ought to have been their friends; but still they are bidden, "rejoice evermore." Even rejoice in the persecution and in the slander. "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." So says our Lord. "Rejoice ye," He says, "and be exceeding glad."

WHEN ARE YOU TO BE WRETCHED?

Surely despondency is excluded. If slander is to make us dance, when are we to fret? Suppose some other kind of trial should come upon you, you are still to rejoice in the Lord always. The dearest friend is dead; "rejoice evermore." The sweet babe is sickening, the darling of your household will be taken away; "rejoice evermore." Trade is ebbing out, prosperity is disappearing from you, you may even be brought to poverty; but, "rejoice evermore." Your health is affected, your lungs are weak, your heart does not beat with regularity, very soon you may be sick unto death; but, "rejoice evermore." Shortly you must put off this tabernacle altogether! Tokens warn you that you must soon close your eyes in death; but, "rejoice evermore." There is no limit to the exhortation. It is ever in season. Through fire and through water, through life and through death, "rejoice evermore."

I am bound to mention among the curiosities of the churches, that I have known many deeply spiritual Christian people who have been afraid to rejoice. Much genuine religion has been "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought"! Some take such a view of religion that it is to them a sacred duty to be gloomy. One of the commandments of the is: "Draw down the blinds on a Sunday." Another is: "Never smile during a sermon; it is wicked." A third precept is: "Never rest yourself, and be sure that you never let anybody else rest for an instant. Why should anybody be allowed a moment's quiet in a world so full of sin? Go through the world and impress people with the idea that it is an awful thing to live." I have known some very good people spoiled for practical usefulness, and spoiled as to being like the Lord Jesus Christ, by their deeply-laid conviction that it was wicked to be glad. Well do I remember an earnest Christian woman who saw me when I was first converted, full of the joy of the Lord, and joyfully assured of my salvation in Christ Jesus. She seemed distressed at the sight of so much joy. She shook her head. She looked at me with that heavenly-minded pity which these good people usually lay by in store. It seemed to her a dreadful thing that so young a Christian should dare to know whom he had believed. Since then I have found a great many like her; and when I have seen them shake their heads they have not shaken me half so much as she shook my heart on that first occasion; because I know them now, and I know that there is nothing in that shake of the head after all. The fact is that they ought to shake their heads about themselves for getting into so sad a state while this text stands on the sacred page, "Rejoice evermore."

GROANING PERMITTED.

Oh, dear friends, you may rejoice! God has laid no embargo upon rejoicing; He puts no restriction upon happiness. Do believe it that you are permitted to be happy. Do believe that there is no ordinance of God commanding you to be miserable. Turn this book over and see if there be any precept that the Lord has given you in which He has said: "Groan in the Lord always, and again I say groan." You may groan if you like. You have Christian liberty for that; but, at the same time, do believe that you have larger liberty to rejoice, for so it is put before you. He bids you rejoice, and yet again He says "rejoice."

But I go a step farther, and that is, that it is a sin not to rejoice. I will not say it harshly; I should like to say it as softly and tenderly as it could be put; but it must be said, and I must not take away from the force of it by my tenderness. If it be a command: "Rejoice evermore," then it is a breach of the command not to rejoice evermore. And what is a breach of a command? What is a neglect to obey a precept? Is it not a sin—a sin of shortcoming, though not of transgression? Beloved, why do your faces wear those gloomy colors? Come, ye unhappy and dolorous professors, question yourselves rather than others. Heavy-heart, chide not the glad. Glad-heart, deal not roughly with the sorrowful. Bear ye one another's burdens, and share ye one another's joys.

All this by way of introduction.

I. And now, just for a minute or two, I desire to speak upon the quality of this rejoicing which is commanded in our text. May the Holy Spirit enable me to set before you the select taste and special quality of a believer's life-long joy! "Rejoice evermore."

Brethren, this is

NOT A CARNAL REJOICING.

If it were, it would be impossible to keep it up evermore. There is a joy of harvest; but where shall we find it in winter? There is a joy of wealth; but where is this joy when riches take to themselves wings, and fly away? There is a joy of health; but that is not with us evermore, for the evil days come and the years of weakness and sorrow. There is a joy in having your children round about you; sweet are domestic joys, but these last not forever. At the house of the happiest knocks the hand of death. No; if your joys spring from earthly fountains, those fountains may be dried up; and then your joys are gone. If the foundation of a man's joy be anywhere on earth it will be shaken; for there is a day coming when the whole earth shall shake, and even now it is far from being a stable thing. I know not that carnal joy is commanded anywhere. Men are permitted to rejoice in the things of this life, but that is the most that we can say. They are forbidden to rejoice too much in these things, for they are honey, of which a man may soon eat till he is sickened. The joy which God commands is a joy in which it is impossible to go too far. It is a heavenly joy, based upon things which will last forevermore; or else we could not be bidden to "rejoice evermore."

Again, as this joy is not carnal, so I feel quite sure that it is

NOT PRESUMPTUOUS.

Some persons ought not to rejoice. They have never fled to Christ for refuge—they have never been born again—they have never submitted themselves to the righteousness of God, and yet they are at ease in Zion. Ah! wretched ease. Many are ignorant of their ruin, strangers to the remedy of grace, strangers to the blood that bought redemption; and yet they rejoice in their own righteousness. They have a joy that has been accumulated through years of false profession, hypocritical formality, and vain pretence. Such as these are not told to "rejoice evermore." There must be sound reasons for rejoicing now, or there can be no reason for rejoicing evermore. The joy that will abide forever is the joy to be sought after; but joy which a man cannot justify never ought to be thought of as enduring for "evermore." Have you been begotten again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead? If so, it is safe for you to rejoice at once; and it will be equally safe for you to "rejoice evermore."

Again, dear friends, I feel bound to add that it must be

NOT A FANATICAL JOY.

Certain religious people are of a restless, excitable turn, and never feel good till they are half out of their minds. They are in such a state of mind that they cry "hallelujah" at anything or nothing, for they feel ready to cry, or shout, or jump, or dance. I do not condemn their delirium, but I am anxious to know what goes with it. Come hither, friend; let us have a talk. What do you know? What? Is it possible that I offend you the moment I seek a reason for the hope that is in you? Is it so, that you do not know anything of the doctrines of grace? You were never taught anything; the object of the institution which "enlisted" you is not to teach you, but only to excite you. It pours boiling water into you, but it does not feed you with milk. That is a miserable business. Those who rejoice without knowing why can be driven to despair without knowing why; and such persons are likely to be found in a lunatic asylum ere long. The religion of Jesus Christ acts upon truthful, reasonable, logical principles; it is sanctified common sense. A Christian man should only exhibit a joy which he can justify, and of which he can say: "There is reason for it."

NOT ECSTASY.

I go a little farther, and I say that I believe that this joy which is commanded here: "Rejoice evermore," is not even that high and divine exhilaration which Christians feel upon special occasions. There are moments on the top of the mount when Peter is no fool for saying: "Let us build three tabernacles." It is so good to be there that we would willingly stay in that mount and never come down again to the bustle, and turmoil, and sin of a guilty world. Now, you are not commanded in the text to be always in such a high, exalted, rapturous state of mind as that. "Rejoice evermore," but you cannot always rejoice at that rate. I have said that you cannot, and I mean it literally. There is a physical impossibility in it. The strain upon the mind would be much too great.

I hope that you catch my thought, though I am afraid that I do but dimly put it. This shows you what kind of joy could not be with us always. The joy that can be with us evermore is a part of ourselves, a power of the new nature which God works in us by His own Spirit. It consists in the great cheerfulness of the new-born disposition; a full conviction that whatever God does is right; a sweet agreement with the providence of God, let it ordain what it will; an intense delight in God Himself and in the person of His dear Son; and consequently a quietness, a calm, a stillness of soul, "the peace of God which passeth all understanding."

II. Suffer a few words upon

THE OBJECT OF THIS REJOICING,

in order to help you, dear friends, to indulge it. God helping us, we can always rejoice in God. What a God we have! "God my exceeding joy," said the Psalmist. "Delight thyself also in the Lord." Delight thyself in thy Father God. Delight thyself also in the Son, who is "God with us." God with us ever the earth was, in the covenant council when He became our surety and our representative. Then think of the Holy Ghost, and rejoice in Him as dwelling in you, quickening you, comforting you, illuminating you, and abiding with you forever. Think of the triune God, and be blest.

I believe, dear friends, that if we are right-minded every doctrine of the gospel will make us glad, every promise of the gospel will make us glad, every precept of the gospel will make us glad. If you were to go over a list of all the privileges that belong to the people of God, you might pause over each one, and say: "I could rejoice evermore in this if I had nothing else." If ever you fail to rejoice, permit me to exhort you to arouse each one of the graces of the Spirit to its most active exercise. Begin with the first of them—faith. Believe, and as you believe this and that out of the ten thousand blessings which God has promised, joy will spring up in your soul. Have you exercised faith? then lead out the sister grace of hope. Begin hoping for the resurrection, hoping for the second coming, hoping for the glory which is then to be revealed. What sources of joy are these! When you have indulged hope, then go on to love, and let this fairest of the heavenly sisters point you to the way of joy. If you cannot get joy either out of hope, or faith, or love, then go on to patience. I believe that one of the sweetest joys under heaven comes out of the severest suffering when patience is brought into play. Put patience to her perfect work, and she will bring you the power to rejoice evermore.

At any rate, when you do not rejoice, say to yourself: "Come, heart, this will not do. Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" I have heard of a mother that whenever her children began to cry, and grow fretty, she said: "They must have medicine." She was sure that they were not well. Whenever you begin to fret and worry, say to yourself: "I must take heavenly medicine, for I am not right. The leaves of the Scriptures are for my healing; I will use them for my soul's good. If my heart were right I should rejoice in the Lord, and as I am not rejoicing I must resort to the great Physician."

III. Lastly, somebody will say: "But why should we rejoice?" What are the REASONS FOR THIS REJOICING?

We ought not to want arguments to persuade us to be happy. The worldling says that "he counts it one of the wisest things to drive dull care away." The child of God may count it the wisest thing to cast his care upon his God. You do not want an argument for rejoicing; but if you did, it is found in the command of your Lord, who says to you: "Rejoice evermore."

Rejoicing wards off temptation. The Christian may be tempted; but little impression is made upon him by the pleasurable bait if he is happy in the Lord. The joy which we wear is far superior to any which the evil one can offer us; and so his temptation has lost its power.

WHAT CAN THE DEVIL OFFER

the joyous Christian? Why, if he were to say to him: "I will give thee all the kingdoms of the world and the glory thereof, if thou wilt fall down and worship me," the believer would reply to him: "Fiend, I have more than that. I have perfect contentment; I have absolute delight in God." The devil will speedily quit such a man as that; for the joy of the Lord is an armor through which he cannot send the dagger of his temptation.

This joy of the Lord will shut out worldly mirth from the heart. You say to the man who has once eaten bread: "I will take you to such a grand feast. I will show you a company of swine all feeding upon husks. Look upon them, see how they enjoy themselves! You shall have as much as you like, and be as happy as they are." He says: "But you do not know me; you do not understand me. I have none of the qualities that link me with swine. I cannot enjoy the things which they enjoy." He that is once happy in God pours contempt upon the sublimest happiness that a worldling can know. It is altogether out of his line. But your miserable professors who simply go to a place of worship because they ought to go, and who are very good because they dare not be anything else, they have no joy in the Lord. They go to the devil for their joy; they openly confess that they must have a bit of pleasure sometimes, and therefore they go to questionable amusements. No wonder that they are found in Satan's courts, looking up to him for delights, since they find no rejoicing in the ways of the Lord.

He that rejoices in the Lord always will be a great encouragement to his fellow-Christians. He comes into the room; you like the very look of his face. It is a half holiday to look at him; and as soon as ever he speaks he drops a sweet word of encouragement for the weak and afflicted.

This is the kind of thing that attracts sinners. They used in the old times to catch pigeons and send them out with sweet unguents on their wings; other pigeons followed them into the dovecot for the sake of their perfume, and so were captured. I would that every one of us had the heavenly anointing on our wings, the divine perfumes of peace, and joy, and rest; for then others would be fascinated to Jesus, allured to heaven. God grant that it may be so, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

TWO REMARKABLE PRAYERS.*

A YOUNG man, son of an honored minister of the Gospel, was hopefully converted when he was about sixteen years of age, and after a season of careful and prayerful consideration he gave himself up to serve God in the work of the ministry. During his college course he "lost his first love," and a worldly ambition taking possession of his soul, he determined to turn to the profession of the law as his life-work. Shortly after commencing the study of law he was prostrated by an attack of sickness, which all his friends and he himself thought must prove fatal. His sickness was of such a kind as to leave him in the undisturbed possession of his powers of thought and reasoning. A Godly sorrow for his sin in breaking covenant with God was awakened within him. He sought, and, as he believed, received pardon for this his sin. And then his original desire to serve God in the ministry of His Word taking full possession of his soul, he prayed earnestly that God would restore him to health, that he might thus serve Him. Contrary to the expectation of his physician and friends, he began to recover from that very hour; and he is to-day and has been for more than twenty years preaching the Gospel with great effect.

A second case: A Christian father was suddenly, unexpectedly, called to part with a beloved child. She had always been a thoughtful, though by no means a precocious child, and for several reasons her father had cherished the hope that as her mind was opening and her powers developing they were being sanctified by the Spirit of God. He knew that in addition to her daily prayers repeated at her mother's knee, she had been accustomed for several months to go away by herself to pray to God in secret. Her disease, a form of membranous croup, made such rapid progress that she was dying, her senses and power of speech gone before he thought of saying anything to her about death and her trust in Jesus. To all appearance she died. Her mother's hand had closed her eyes, and friends had left the room to make ready her shrouding. It was the father's first experience of parting with a child, the first death in the family, and he knelt by the bedside of his child, and prayed with deepest earnestness that God would give him some assurance that in giving up his loved one he was giving her into the arms of Jesus. While he was yet praying, contrary to the expectation of all, the child began to breathe again, and slowly recovering her senses and power of speech, she put her arms around her father's neck, and drawing him down close to her, said, as if divining his thoughts: "Father, I am dying;" and a sweet smile lighting up her countenance, she added: "I am going to Jesus;" and then, slowly unclasping her arms and lying back upon her pillow, her spirit took its flight.

[Dr. Armstrong personally vouches for the veracity of both these cases.]

IS THERE LIFE ON THE MOON?†

ders still more startling. . . . For three hundred and fifty-four hours, nearly fifteen terrestrial days, the sun darts its rays without intermission to the ground, at first obliquely in the hours which follow its rising, then more and more vertically as midday approaches. The temperature of the surface under the prolonged influence of such an intense radiation must attain an extraordinary elevation, "perhaps much greater," says Sir John Herschel, "than that of boiling water." After the lunar noon, the heating of the soil continues, and attains undoubtedly its maximum between this time and sunset, as on the earth. . . . During the three hundred and fifty-four hours of the night all this accumulated heat being no longer attained by a gaseous envelope, the temperature decreases with extreme rapidity. It sinks, undoubtedly, much below that of our polar winters. How could living beings resist these alternations of excessive heat and cold?

THE BOYHOOD OF THE AUTHOR OF "THE TEMPLE."

(See Illustration.)

THOUGH more than three centuries have passed away since George Herbert wrote the exquisite poetry of "The Temple," Christian people read it still with all the pleasure of their fathers, and its calming, soothing, elevating influence still exerts its sway on the reader. It is impossible to study it without the conviction that its author must have been a man of consecrated spirit and of earnest piety.

He was born in 1593, fifteen years before John Milton, the author of "Paradise Lost," and twenty-nine years after Shakespeare. Queen Elizabeth was then on the throne, and though Herbert was not a man to hang about palaces, the influences which radiated from her brilliant court could not fail to have been felt by him in his retirement. It was a time of literary activity; and true religion, which had been forced to hide itself before the terrors of Queen Mary's persecution, could once more show itself openly.

George Herbert was blessed in a saintly mother. It was from her that he received the rudiments of education, and he inherited from her the sweetness and gentleness of disposition, which run like a silver thread through his writings. He was only four years old when his father, Richard Herbert, of Montgomery Castle, died, and the widow found herself confronted with the task of bringing up her ten children—seven sons and three daughters. George was the fifth son. She immediately quitted Montgomery Castle, and went to Oxford to live, that she might be able to exert a mother's influence over her eldest son, who was studying at the University, and might have the benefit for her younger children of the society of the godly and learned men who at that time made their home in Oxford.

During her residence at Oxford Mrs. Herbert gave herself wholly to her duties as a mother. All her thoughts and time were devoted to her children, and they all loved her, and even the elder ones constantly sought her guidance and counsel in their difficulties. The younger ones she taught herself, being a woman of high culture and accomplishments. Her love and patience seemed inexhaustible, and it was no uncommon sight for her learned acquaintances to come upon George and his mother deep in a Latin Grammar in the attitude shown in our illustration.

George, whose disposition was most like that of his mother, and who had grown up wholly under her influence, was sent to Cambridge, where evil influences were not so rampant as at Oxford. He became a clergyman, to his mother's great delight, and was made Prebendary of Layton Ecclesia. By that time Mrs. Herbert had contracted a second marriage, altogether congenial and beneficial to herself and her children. Her second husband was Sir John Danvers, a Privy Councillor of Charles I.

George Herbert, on his arrival at his charge, found the church a heap of ruins. He resolved to rebuild it, and, as usual, went to his mother for counsel. She quailed before the formidable undertaking, and told him that such a task was not for a man so weak in body and so poor in pocket as he. The young man, however, could not bear to abandon the work, and pleading for forgiveness for his first undutiful act, he set about collecting funds. The forgiveness was easily granted in such a case, and the loving mother not only gave him her blessing, but helped him by obtaining subscriptions from her wealthy friends. She did not live to see the completion of the work. One year after its commencement she passed peacefully away and entered into her rest.

George Herbert lived only a few years longer. He died in 1632, at the age of thirty-nine, having spent his brief life in the service of his Master. Of his clerical work but little record remains. He is remembered now, and will be remembered while the English language is spoken by his beautiful poem, "The Temple; or, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations." A prose treatise, entitled "The Country Parson," also from his pen, breathes the same ardent spirit as that which characterizes his better known work.

LION'S LESSON TO HIS MASTER.

"I'll never forgive her, never; and there's an end of it," said John Whitworth. "I'll have nothing more to do with her, happen what will."

Such was the reply I received from my cross-grained parishioner when I went to him to plead the cause of his niece, Mary Walton, who had sorely displeased him by her marriage with Henry Symonds. The old man's displeasure seemed to me unreasonable, as it was not based on anything his niece's husband had done, but was solely because he was the son of an old rival, with whom Whitworth had had an unsuccessful contention in the law courts.

But Mary loved too well to give up Symonds. She was married from her cousin's house, and they settled in a village about two miles from Whitworth's farm, Henry having obtained a situation there with a farmer, which would give them a settled though humble home.

Several years passed by, and brought misfortune and sorrow to Mary Symonds. Her husband had a long illness, and the little household, in which there were now two children, felt the pinch of poverty. More than once I tried to get the childless farmer to spare a little from his hoarded wealth to help his niece, but without success. She might starve, he said; she had made her own bed and must lie upon it. "I never forgive," he said in conclusion, as his final answer. "Then I hope you never sin," said I; and with that I left him.

One night about this time the old man's house was broken into by thieves, and a sum of money was stolen out of a bureau that stood in the parlor. His dog Lion slept in the yard very near that part of the house, but he had not barked or given any alarm, probably because he had been drugged. Whitworth was very angry with him, and insisting that the dog had grown lazy with old age, pronounced him a useless bit of lumber, when he was telling me about his loss the following day.

Whitworth's loss troubled him more than it would a poorer man. Since his niece left him he seemed to have transferred his love for her to his money. He had grown more miserly as well as more morose, and if the thieves had stolen all he had instead of the inconsiderable sum that he was going to take to the bank to add to his hoard, he could not have been more savage. No one could bear to go near the man, he was so violent in his rage.

Lion felt the full force of his anger. If the dog had done his duty, the money would not have been stolen. It was Lion's fault, and he should die. That was Whitworth's sentence on his faithful old friend, and two days after he prepared to execute it. Taking the dog in his boat, he rowed toward a coppice a little way down the river, with a stout rope on board by which Lion was to be hung from the limb of a tree until he was dead.

How it occurred no one knew, not even Whitworth himself, but the boat was overturned. Perhaps it struck a submerged stump, for the river was high and the current strong; but so it was, and the old man, who could not swim, was being rapidly carried down the stream. Suddenly he felt a grip of the collar of his coat, and his head was lifted above the water. He uttered a loud shout for help, and to his great relief, heard it answered from near the bank. Lion seemed to hear it, too, for still holding his master by the collar he paddled as well as he could with such a weight toward the bank.

Looking up in the desperation of his condition, what was Whitworth's astonishment to see the man whom he had treated as an enemy—his niece's husband. Would Symonds help him out, or would he leave him to drown? He was not long in suspense. Bidding him "hold up," Symonds threw himself on the ground, and stretching over, at the risk of being dragged into the water himself, he grasped the hand of the drowning man, and pulled him out.

Whitworth's illness from the shock and the cold was a severe one. Symonds took him to his own cottage, and Mary nursed her uncle with a love and tenderness which the estrangement had not diminished, and had the satisfaction of seeing him survive the fever and grow strong and well again. The old man was quite changed in spirit by his escape from death. Not only Mary and her husband but Lion, too, felt the change. I visited him regularly during his illness, and had the pleasure of seeing the hard, vindictive spirit give place to a chastened, subdued disposition as I talked to him of the mercy of God and of the love which He had shown to rebellious sinners. The parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18: 23-35) especially affected him. He saw and felt his sin, and sought and found forgiveness.

AT THE MISSION.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Arrival of the Harmony.

WHILE Juliet was thus saying farewells and receiving parting gifts and paying last visits to those Esquimaux families whom at first she had looked upon with disgust, but whom now she loved and was loved in return—during all this leave-taking what had become of Fritz Edelstein?

He, too, had been recovering some measure of health, but not so rapidly as Juliet did now, for his mind was far less at ease. A struggle, unseen, unguessed by his friend at Bethabara, was going on in the heart of the young Moravian, a struggle more painful than the wounds inflicted by the bear. What Fritz had endured in seeing Juliet in danger, had made him feel what she was to him; her words, uttered in delirium, and overheard in the adjoining room, had showed that he was something to her.

"A brother—yes, a brother!" Fritz would often say to himself, but he was not adept at self-deception; the mere idea of the possibility that had he not been already betrothed he might have been something more than a brother, raised a tempest in his soul. The conscience of Fritz was tender, his sense of honor chivalrous, and had he committed some crime, Edelstein could hardly have reproached himself more bitterly than he did for a disloyal thought toward a woman whom he had never seen.

"She trusts herself to the guidance of the Lord in simple faith in His wisdom and my honor; she is leaving family and home, encountering the perils of the sea, the regions of an unknown clime; she comes, as Rebekah came to Isaac, with the truthfulness of a child, willing to give me that loyal affection which of course she expects in return! I shame me that I let a thought wander when the path of duty is so plain. I must never think of Juliet but as a sister; I dare not—I cannot pray to forget her, but the less we meet before she sails for England the better for my peace of conscience. I must avoid her presence; the more intensely I long to be near her, the more resolutely I must keep away."

It was this struggle with himself that kept

Fritz's cheek so pale, and took all the joyous light from his eyes, even when his wounds pained him no more. Fritz determined not to return to the White Bear's Den until close on the time when the Harmony might be expected. So firmly did Edelstein adhere to his conscientious resolution, that the party at Eshcol were beginning to fear that the bridegroom would not be in time to welcome the bride, when Fritz made his long-looked-for appearance.

His face and hands, marked with scars, bore tokens of his fearful encounter with the Arctic bear, but the wounds were perfectly healed. Fritz had the self-command to betray no embarrassment on meeting with Juliet, and replied to her anxious inquiries with a smile.

"I am not quite strong enough for a hunting expedition, or a wrestling match with Samson, but I am up to some work. I am so thankful to see you again looking so well, Miss Erle."

"She looks like an English rose," said Pastor Wilhelm; "if so many years spent in Labrador have not made me forget what the flower is like. Well, Fritz, you're an acknowledged hero among our Labrador folk. They made a banquet off your bear, but they've kept and preserved the skin for you. It will make a magnificent rug for—" The good man hesitated, and stopped short at a warning glance from his wife.

"For your bride," said Juliet Erle. "Oh, Brother Fritz, I shall better express to her than I can to yourself how very, very grateful I feel to you for preserving my life!"

"Grateful to the Lord, not to me," said Fritz; "I did nothing but my duty."

It was little more than this that Fritz could bring himself to say to Juliet. The revelation to him of Juliet's love uttered in delirium had come too soon after the other revelation of his own love for her to permit of easy commonplace conversation. The ecstatic joy that it might have given him in other circumstances was now an intense misery. The light and joy of life had come so near to him that just to miss it was torture to him. Yet he was bravely resolved to do his duty, but now in Juliet's presence it must be done, with dogged, almost sullen obstinacy. It could not be done lightly or cheerfully.

Juliet on her side, though she strove to be bright and happy in manner, carried a wounded heart within her. She was all unconscious of the suffering Fritz was enduring, having no suspicion that in her illness she had betrayed the secret she had guarded so carefully. With a resolution really stronger than that of Fritz she was bearing herself bravely, resolved that none of the kind friends about her should suspect her grief. But she, too, had passed the point where she could bear to talk long with Fritz as with a brother. She excused herself, and going to her room, took up her pen, intending to make one more, possibly the last entry she would make in her journal before she left Labrador forever. She wrote:

"It is the anniversary of my birthday; the last one—can I ever forget it! At this hour I was standing on the deck of the Quebec with my beloved Maria, and she was warning me, oh, so tenderly, so gently, against the follies, the sins, into which I was madly—"

Here the journal came to an abrupt conclusion; the pen—all unwiped—was flung down, the chair on which Juliet had been seated was well-nigh overturned, so hastily had she started up at the sudden cry, "The Harmony! the Harmony is in sight!"

Juliet's heart beat very fast as she ran out of her room, then through the parlor and porch, and joined the pastor and his wife, who were hurrying down to the beach. Among the Esquimaux all was excitement. Every hut was left empty; the people gathered on the shore laughing, shouting, dancing, and clapping their hands, thinking what the good vessel would bring them. And many a merry look was turned toward Fritz, and some jests made in the Esquimaux tongue, for every one knew that the ship was to bring out a bride.

The pastor was more excited than his wife. Anna was usually calm and possessed, and her present pleasure was by no means unmixed with pain, for was not Juliet to leave her on the morrow?

"When do you think the travellers will land?" asked Anna of her husband; "I can see nothing but the waves."

"She can't anchor for the next hour and a half at the earliest," was the reply; "you see the wind's against her."

"Then had we not better have the bell sounded as usual for morning prayer, and after service take a little breakfast." Anna was always a practical woman, and punctual almost to a fault.

"Prayers if you will—and thanksgiving!" cried the enthusiastic pastor, "but breakfast with the Harmony in sight! Nay, nay, we must have a grand—a superlative breakfast; you must use up everything left of your stores, and let the Esquimaux bring in whatever Labrador affords. We shall have guests—guests!" The good man rubbed his hands in unrestrainable excitement. "Go, Samson, let the church-bell be sounded, let the ringer pull with a will, that our brethren may hear it over the sea; and then after service, let every one gather branches and mosses and flowers to deck the place for tomorrow's wedding."

Very loudly the bell rung.

"Fritz, why you're the calmest of us all!" cried the pastor. "I do believe that you're more fit to take the service than I am."

"I am quite ready to take it," said Fritz. By earnest prayer young Edelstein had gained the victory over himself. He was calm and resigned, though he could not feel joyous. He avoided even looking at Juliet.

After the service there was a general scattering in all directions to seek for grasses and flowers, or for materials for a banquet. The Harmony, battling against the land breeze, took a good deal more time than the pastor had calculated on before she could reach the anchoring place. At last she came near enough for figures on deck to be seen; flags waving, signals flying, she bore on her way toward the White Bear's Den.

Pastor Wilhelm, his wife, with Fritz and Juliet, stood on the shore watching the vessel's approach.

"Of course she has stopped a day or two at White Havens," said the pastor; "she was to leave a missionary couple there, and part of her cargo."

"Perhaps when the captain hears of the sad losses last winter at Bethabara, he may take on the pair there, instead of dropping them at White Havens," observed Anna; "in that case we shall have a large party of guests. Let's see—we'll sit down four—six—seven—eight, and the sailors on the bit of lawn, all as hungry as grampus. Oh, Juliet, my child, we must hurry off at once to see to the cooking! Lena! Lena! we shall want two—three—four dozen of eggs; and see if you can't get some one to bring us in a pair of wild geese!"

Pastor Wilhelm seemed the only one at leisure to watch the movements of the vessel; he was to give a signal as soon as the Harmony should be able to anchor and put out a boat. That signal, very loudly given, at once brought every one again in haste to the beach. They could hear the "Yo-he-yoo" of the sailors at their work. Then saw the boat lowered over the side.

"There's the captain—our old friend—bless him!" cried the pastor, gleeful as a boy; "he's weathered many a voyage. Two passengers—one in a bonnet and veil. Fritz, here comes your bride!"

Juliet felt greatly excited, and pressed to the side of Anna. Fritz went forward, ready to plunge into the surf, to help to pull in the boat.

"My dear child—Juliet—what is she like?" whispered Anna, with irrepressible curiosity. "Oh, if I had eyes—just for one minute!"

"Not what I expected," said Juliet, softly; Anna's quick ear detected disappointment in her tone.

"Anna, my dear!" exclaimed the pastor, as Fritz dashed into the surf, "she's plump as a porpoise, and old enough to be Fritz's mother; I never saw such a bride in my life!"

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" exclaimed Sister Anna, in real distress, "how could our brethren make such a blunder!"

Juliet did not speak, she was ready to burst into tears.

"Fritz does not seem to mind," said the pastor, laughing; "he's shaking her hand with both his own, as if he were the happiest bridegroom in the world!"

The boat's keel grated on the pebbles. Fritz handed out the stout lady, as he had handed out Juliet before on her first arrival at Eshcol.

The captain jumped out of the boat, made his way to where his old friends were standing, and shook hands most heartily with the Moravian pastor and Anna; he did not at first notice Juliet, who had shrunk behind them.

"There is just one bit of bad news which you have to break to our poor Fritz," said the captain.

"What—his father has—"

"No, no; his father is all right," said the captain. "But Sister Bessy, who was quite prepared to come—outfit ready—friends agreed—took a bad cold; doctor called in—he said her chest was weak—she must not attempt a winter in Labrador, so she is to be sent to the Mauritius instead."

"And that—that is her substitute?" said poor Pastor Wilhelm, glancing at the newly arrived, who was, with Fritz's assistance, getting a bag and sundry wraps and nondescript articles out of the boat.

The captain burst into a laugh, a loud hearty explosive laugh, which for some moments made him unable to speak. "What!" he exclaimed, brimming over with mirth, "you actually mistook Brother Smidt's good wife, the mother of five children, for a bride sent out to Eshcol! No, no; things are not so managed or mismanaged at home! Sister Louisa—she's the best creature in the world, a true missionary's wife, but she has been in the field these fifteen years, and a rare good worker she has been. She and her husband go on with me to Bethabara, to labor there till directions come from headquarters."

Brother Wilhelm and Anna could not restrain their mirth, though they made great efforts to do so, as they met and welcomed the Smidts. Then there was no need to "break the news" to Fritz, as might be seen by his happy face. He had recognized and most joyfully greeted the Smidts, whom he had known when he was a boy in England, and had heard from them of the failure of the home friends to send him a wife. Sister Bessy he remembered faintly, and but for the arrival of Juliet and the feelings which she had aroused he would have been content to take her as his wife; but not now. Fritz felt as if a heavy weight were removed from his heart.

"Brother Wilhelm, Sister Anna—these have been like parents to me!" was Fritz's introduction of his friends to the missionary of Eshcol.

"And what sister have we here?" asked Brother Smidt, a tall man with bald head, broad brow, and calm penetrating gaze, as to his surprise he saw Juliet Erle. His surprise was shared by his wife and the captain, to whom the apparition of an aristocratic lady in Labrador was most unexpected.

"She is a dear shipwrecked child," said Pastor Wilhelm, who had quite changed his earlier impressions of Juliet's character; "a pearl cast on our shore, we may say, by the waves, or rather brought here by the Lord, to be a blessing to us all."

Juliet had her share of kindly greetings and hand-shakings, and then the cheerful party all turned toward the Missionary Home, well prepared to do justice to an abundant meal.

Anna could hardly find leisure to whisper to her husband, "Is it not possible after all that our dear Juliet may not leave us?"

"Get Fritz to persuade her to stay," said Brother Wilhelm, with hardly suppressed mirth; and never had the pastor's kindly eyes brightened with a merrier twinkle than when he added: "You have made two feather quilts—one for the parting, the other for the expected guest—I should not be much surprised should our Juliet come in for them both."

The idea was very pleasant to the good pastor's mind. Why, he thought, should not these two be united immediately? The little church was ready decked for a wedding. Everything was prepared, but the bride was not come. Well, here was a substitute better than the lady expected. The pastor would have united Sister Bessy and Fritz if Sister Bessy had come; there would have been nothing else possible, if she had come out for the purpose. He would have performed the ceremony assured that in some way God would have made matters right. But his pleasure would not have been unalloyed. Knowing what he knew of Juliet's love revealed in her delirium, guessing as he did the state of Fritz Edelstein's affections he would have sympathized with the two stricken hearts, and pitied Sister Bessy for having to marry a man whose love was given to another. It would have been a sad case for all three. It seemed as if Providence had interfered to prevent the calamity. Bessy's non-arrival was a blessing, not a misfortune, in his eyes, and the natural course was to take advantage of it, and let Juliet and Fritz follow their inclinations. Let there be a wedding by all means, and without delay.

This was simple Pastor Wilhelm's view of the matter at first, and very gleeful it made him. He could hardly give his mind to the landing of such part of the cargo as was destined for Eshcol; he had never before been so indifferent as to the contents of casks rolled on the beach, or parcels tossed out from the boat.

But when the good man was able at last to impart his plans to the newly-arrived Moravians, he found rather, to his dismay, that the idea of a marriage which he represented as a providential arrangement, was not received by them with perfect satisfaction.

JESUS AND ABRAHAM.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for June 20, John 8: 31-59. Golden Text, verse 59.

A Sad Period—The Hour Appointed for the Experience—The Ineffable Name Claimed—An Awful Doom—Christ's Self-Abnegation—Freedom Offered—The Bondage of Sin—Victims Bound by their Vices—The Time of Release—A Fearful Parentage Indicated.

THERE is something overwhelmingly sad in the description of those days which Jesus spent in Jerusalem—He seeking to save, seeking to lead men to Himself that they might be saved; they seeking by every means in their power to resist His influence, falsify His teaching, and even to criminate Him. But eager as were His enemies to take Him, no man laid hands on Him, for His hour was not yet come. But had we seen the secrets of His heart we should have found that His hour was come for the very experience through which He was then passing; this discouraging, heartsickening atmosphere of argument and criticism, this bitter persecution on the part of those for whom He was every moment a living Sacrifice—all this was no mere chance, "For this cause came I unto this hour" (John 12: 27). Oh, how He longed to save them! Oh, how real was the loss of a soul to Him! He said: "I go My way, and ye shall seek Me, and shall die in your sins; whither I go, ye cannot come." It was this from which Jesus came to save men, and He added: "If ye believe not that ye shall die in your sins." Long ago God had revealed Himself to Moses as the great I AM, the self-existing God, and added: "I am that I am." This was the title now claimed by Jesus. No man can be saved from His sins but by believing that Jesus Christ, who died for him, is the Son of God, the I am, the Christ of God. This the Scribes and Pharisees would not believe. True, He did the works which none other man did, He spake as no other man ever spake, He was unlike every other, for He sought not and received not honor from man; but He was one who brought no honor to anybody, who made no one satisfied with himself, who did not exalt the Jewish name, and could in no way be called one of earth's great ones. He was not to their taste, He did not answer their expectations, He was altogether too mystical for them, too spiritual. The very fact that He came endued with powers and gifts which they might look for in the Messiah made them the more angry, and made them feel more desperate in their opposition. Jesus did not hide the truth. "Ye are from beneath," He said; "I am from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world. I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins."

DIE IN YOUR SINS!

What a fate! Oh, how different from falling asleep in Jesus! To go out of this world bound by an indissoluble tie to all our past sins, bound to them for an endless eternity, breathing over and over again forever the atmosphere of sin in which we pass out of this world—what a maddening prospect! Yet there are many who choose it rather than to believe and confess that Jesus Christ, their Saviour, is the very Son of God, and that He dwells in them!

Again they asked him: "Who art Thou?" and He replied: "Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning. I have many things to say and to judge of you; but He that hath sent Me is true; and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of Him." With their carnal conceptions they did not understand that Jesus spoke of His Father. Had they possessed the power to do mighty works which they saw in Him, they would never have spoken of the authority of another as He did; they would have made the most of themselves, and no doubt they were irritated beyond measure because Jesus was so independent of all earthly glory. Then He said: "When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am, and that I do nothing of Myself; but as the Father hath taught Me, I speak these things. And He that sent Me is with Me; the Father hath not left Me alone; for I do always those things that please Him." He had before said: "The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do;" and again: "I can of Mine own self do nothing" (John 5: 19, 30). The Jews looked for a conquering Messiah, who should make everybody bend to him, and they could not tolerate who made Himself the servant of all men, who made no assumption of earthly prerogative, and even called Himself a nothing. They did not want a Messiah who was always referring to an unseen God whose nearness they might assent to, but they did not practically realize. Yet there were some who believed on Him when He spake these words, some to whom "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength" had been a reality, the command of a real Divine Person with whom they had to do, and these, to whom the Word of God was real, had never seen that law fulfilled in the spirit as well as the letter by any other man—they believed on Him.

Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on Him, If ye continue in My word, then are ye My disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and

THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE."

This was to them a direct attack on their national pride. Free! "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest Thou, Ye shall be made free?" Their conceptions were all earthly, bounded by time and sense; they had no spiritual ideas whatever. But Jesus came to set up a kingdom in the hearts of men of which they did not even dream. He answered them: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." Oh, how true this is! Ask the poor drunkard in his sober moments if he is a free man, and he will tell you how gladly he would escape the slavery if he could, but he is bound by the chains of his sins; he once yielded up his will to sin, and from that time lost all power over it. Ask the impure man if he is free. Society may ignore in him what it revolts from in the very one whom he has trodden under foot; but is he free? Is he not as great a slave as she whom his heartless tyranny has made an outcast? Ask the man or the woman who is possessed with a spirit of jealousy if he or she is free. Ask the guilty thief shunning the light of day, ask the murderer, are they free? No; whosoever committeth sin is the slave of sin. But, thank God, the servant abideth not in the house forever; there is a time of going free, and our "year of

RELEASE" IS AT HAND

(Deut. 15: 1, 12). "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation" (II Cor. 6: 2). But though the servant abideth not in the house forever, and we may be and shall be loosed if the Son make us free, yet the Son abideth ever, and Jesus, the Son of God, seeks an abiding dwelling-place in our hearts.

Reader, are you still "the slave of sin"? Are you, perhaps, a child of God, and yet often overcome by besetting sins? Is there some bondage which has never yet been broken, something—temper, discontent, worry, self-pity, jealousy, self-consciousness—which recurs again and again, and which makes you its slave, which uses your life to speak of it, your mind to think of it, your heart to feel it, and to remember it until you feel you are mastered by it? Thank God, there is deliverance for you. The Son waits to make you free and to abide in the house, in your heart forever, to receive from you a willing, spontaneous service, which His own deep love makes easy. Do you say with the Jews: "I am Abraham's seed, I have faith, I am converted, I have experienced sanctification, what more do I need? I am not worse than others." The Lord may say to you: "If ye were Abraham's children ye would do the works of Abraham." God has taught us in His Word that "whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. 14: 23)—i.e., sin in His sight; on our side "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin" (James 4: 17). If we take the position of being Abraham's seed—i.e., men of faith, we must then take God's view of sin, and accept God's way of freedom from it.

Jesus had these several grounds of condemnation against these professors: "My word hath no place in you. . . . Ye seek to kill Me, a man that hath told you the truth. . . . Ye do not understand My speech. . . . because ye cannot hear My word. . . . Because I tell you the truth, ye believe Me not." And on the ground that their deeds did not resemble Abraham, but the devil, who is the father of lies, Jesus told them the unwelcome home-truth: "Ye do the deeds of your father. . . . Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do." Things were reaching a crisis; these men were come into contact with Him who is the light of the world. If they would not walk in the light, they must nevertheless see themselves in the revealing clearness of that light. They claimed: "We be not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God." But the full glare of the light came upon them in the words: "If God were your Father, ye would love Me: for I proceeded forth and came from God. . . . He that is of God heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God."

Filled with the spirit of retaliation and debate, the Jews again accused Jesus of having a devil. But He led them out of their depth, and said: "If a man keep My saying, he shall never see death." They understood nothing of that everlasting life which lives through the grave and bridges it, that which ceases to die when the body dies, and which contains the germ of "that body which shall be" (I Cor. 15: 37). This exasperated them to the utmost. "Now we know that Thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead, and the prophets. . . . Art Thou greater than our father Abraham, which is dead? and the prophets are dead: whom makest Thou Thyself? Jesus answered, If I honor Myself, My honor is nothing: it is My Father that honoreth Me; of whom ye say, that He is your God: yet ye have not known Him. . . . Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day: and he saw it, and was glad. . . . Before Abraham was, I am." He spoke the simple, unvarnished truth, but the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God (I Cor. 2: 14); they did not know God, they were not of God, and instead of accepting their Saviour they took up stones to cast at Him. But the Father of whom He spoke shielded Him. "He hid Himself, and went out of the temple, passing through the midst of them, and so passed by."

THESE MANY YEARS.

DEUTERONOMY 8: 2.

THESE many years! What lessons they unfold
Of grace and guidance through the wilderness,
From the same God that Israel of old
In the Shekinah glory did possess.
How faithful He, through all my griefs and fears
And constant murmurings, these many years!

God of the Covenant! From first to last,
From when I stood within that sprinkled door
And o'er my guilt the avenging angel passed,
Thy better angel has gone on before;
And naught but goodness all the way appears,
Unmerited and free, these many years!

Thy presence wrought a pathway through the sea;
Thy presence made the bitter waters sweet;
And daily have Thy hands prepared for me
Sweet, precious morsels—lying at my feet.
'Twas but to stoop and taste the grace that cheers,
And start refreshed, through all these many years!

What time I thirsted and earth's streams were dry,
What time I wandered and my hope was gone,
Thy hand has brought a pure and full supply,
And, by a loving pressure, lured me on.
How oft that hand hath wiped away my tears
And written "Pardoned!" all these many years!

And what of discipline Thy love ordained
Fell ever gently on this heart of mine;
Around its briars was my spirit trained
To bring forth fruits of righteousness divine;
Wisdom in every check, and love appears
In every stroke throughout these many years!

Lord, what I might have been my spirit knows—
Rebellious, petulant, and apt to stray;
Lord, what I am, in spite of flesh and foes,
I owe to grace that kept me in the way.
Thine be the glory! Merit disappears
As back I look upon these many years.

Thine be the glory! Thou shalt have the praise
For all Thy dealings, to my latest breath;
A daily Ebenezer will I raise,
And sing Salvation through the vale of death—
To where the palm, the golden harp appears,
There to rehearse Thy love through endless years.

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."

This is a common expression, one used perhaps more frequently in connection with Life Insurance as an objection to the ordinary life plan. "It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but must die to win."

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN

This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take, for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15 or 20 years hence. Say you die before the termination of the period—your family wins. You survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advanced years. You have lived and won.

The "MANHATTAN'S" new plan meets the case. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature, while it reduces the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

For an example of the operation of this plan address the Company, giving your nearest age, a statement will be sent to you. Mention this paper.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND AND HIS BRIDE—The Wedding in the White House.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

An Enemy's Tribute—Birth in 1837—Early Life—Settlement in Buffalo—Called to the Bar in 1859—Mayor of Buffalo in 1881—Elected Governor of New York in 1882—The Presidency.

As in time of war the white flag of truce sometimes waves over men in amity who the day before were in fierce conflict, so by common consent the wedding of the President was accepted throughout the country as a signal for a truce to political animosity. The New York Tribune, the most implacable and unrelenting of the President's opponents in the press, very gracefully took the lead in this magnanimous movement. On the morning of the wedding it printed an editorial, the following extract from which is so true to the public feeling that we quote it here with congratulations to the Tribune on its affability: "Experienced observers assert that there are more politics to the square inch in this land of ours than in any of the countries beyond the sea. But if politics do abound in America kindness does much more abound; and the wedding which takes place at the White House this evening is attended by the hearty congratulations of all the people of the thirty-eight States and the nine Territories. On this occasion we are all enthusiastic Democrats—or, at least, all sympathetic indorsers of the latest phase of the 'policy' of the Administration. By common consent the tariff, the currency, and other cold-blooded causes of division are laid on the table, while both parties and all parties, forgetting political ties in the contemplation of tenderer ones, unite as one affectionate family in giving expression to their heartfelt wishes for the happiness of the President and his bride. . . . May their days be long and unclouded in the land. May they live to celebrate their golden wedding by the light of an unwasted honeymoon. So say we all of us."

During the campaign of 1884 Mr. Cleveland's record was so minutely examined and every detail about him so extensively published, that the briefest sketch of his life is all that is necessary in this place to maintain our usual custom of giving a biography when we publish a portrait.

THE FAMILY.

Grover Cleveland was born at Caldwell, N. J., on March 18th, 1837. He is therefore now forty-nine years of age. His great-grandfather, Aaron Cleveland, who was a native of Norwich, Conn., was in 1779 a member of the Legislature. He afterward became a Congregational minister, and died at New Haven in 1815. Richard Cleveland, the father of Governor Cleveland, was born at Norwich in 1804, and was a graduate of Yale College. He taught school in Baltimore, studied theology, spent some months at Princeton, and in 1828 was ordained a Presbyterian clergyman. Grover Cleveland, who was the fifth of nine children, was educated at the public schools of New Jersey and at an academy in Clinton, Oneida County, N. Y.

At the age of sixteen he became a clerk in the New York Blind Asylum. There he happened to meet a young man who prevailed upon him to seek his fortunes in the Far West. They started for Cleveland, O. On their way they stopped at Buffalo, N. Y., where young Cleveland paid his respects to his uncle, Mr. Lewis F. Allen. This gentleman was very favorably impressed with the young man, whom he saw for the first time. As much to dissuade his nephew from the Western venture as anything, Mr. Allen told him that he was in need of a clerk, and if he would stop in Buffalo he should have the situation. The offer was accepted, but after a short time the young man persuaded his uncle to let him study law, and consent was given. He was articled to a law firm in Buffalo, and served them so much to their satisfaction, that they voluntarily paid him a handsome salary. In 1859 Mr. Cleveland was ADMITTED TO THE BAR.

He continued, however, with his employers for four years afterward. He was then appointed Assistant District Attorney for the county of Erie, which position he filled for a period of three years. He was nominated by the Democratic County Convention in 1865 for District Attorney to succeed Mr. Torrance, but was defeated at the polls by Lyman K. Bass. Mr. Cleveland then formed a law partnership with the late I. V. Vanderpoel on the 1st of August, 1866, which was continued until January, 1869. He then became a member of the firm of Laning, Cleveland & Folsom, the late A. P. Laning and the late Oscar Folsom—whose daughter he has now married—being his associates. The firm remained in existence for two years, and until Mr. Cleveland retired therefrom, to assume the duties of Sheriff of Erie County, to which office he was chosen at the election in November, 1870. At the expiration of his official term as Sheriff he became a member of the firm of Messrs. Bass, Cleveland & Bissell, with Lyman K. Bass and Wilson S. Bissell as associates. From this Mr. Bass soon retired, owing to ill-health, and the firm became Cleveland & Bissell. In 1881 Mr. Cleveland was elected by an unprecedented majority, running five thousand ahead of his own ticket. He threw himself into the duties of his office with the vigor and plodding industry for which he is famous, and soon became master of every detail of the city government. Several remarkable vetoes came from his pen during his mayoralty, which attracted public attention by their manly regard for honesty and their disregard of party ties.

The peculiar situation of the Republican Party in New York State in 1882 resulted in a bolt of prominent men from the decision of the State Convention. Popular as was Mr. Folger, the Republican candidate for Governor, there was an impression produced in the party that his nomination had been effected by discreditable methods. Regret was expressed that so respected a man as Mr. Folger should suffer, but a large number of Republicans resolved that they would not support a nomination arranged as that was believed to have been. When, therefore, the Democrats nominated Mr. Cleveland, the dissatisfied Republicans gave him their votes. Mr. Cleveland was elected Governor of the Empire State by the enormous majority of 192,854.

THE PRESIDENCY.

Two years later came the Presidential election. The nomination by the Republican Convention of Mr. James G. Blaine was made with the knowledge that it was distasteful to certain Republican leaders; but so strong was the candidate and so enthusiastic were his friends, that it was believed that the opposition to him would be counterbalanced. That conviction very nearly came true—but not quite. Mr. Cleveland did not carry New York by 192,000 votes in 1884, but he did carry it, and it gave him the Presidency. Since his election his popularity with his party has not increased. He has been slow in making removals, and disappointed place-hunters have been numerous. The Republicans who voted for him, however, are well content, and have never wavered in their confidence in him.

MRS. CLEVELAND.

Birth in 1864—The Death of her Father—School and College—Floral Tributes from the President—Appearance and Character.

MRS. CLEVELAND, whose portrait appears with that of her husband on the first page, is, as we have already intimated, the daughter of the late Oscar Folsom, one of Mr. Cleveland's law partners. She was born at Buffalo, N. Y., on July 21st, 1864, and is therefore now in her twenty-second year. Her first name, says the Buffalo Courier, which publishes the most reliable sketch of her life, is Frank, not Frances, as has been generally supposed. When she was only eleven years old she was bereaved of her father, who was killed in a runaway accident while driving his buggy. After his death she and her mother went to reside with Mrs. Harmon, the mother of Mrs. Folsom, at Medina. There she attended the High School. The widow and her daughter subsequently returned to Buffalo, where Miss Folsom went to the Central School. There she was noted for close attention to study, and when she graduated her certificates entitled her to admission to the Sophomore Class of Wells College.

Of her career at Wells College the Courier says: "Miss Folsom was a great favorite at the college, and her power of winning the love and unswerving allegiance of many friends is a direct inheritance from her father, for a more genial, generous-hearted, and companionable man than the late Oscar Folsom never lived. Her tall, commanding figure, frankness, and sincerity made her the queen of the school. She was graduated from Wells College in June, 1885, her graduating essay taking the form of a story. The hampers of flowers sent to her nearly every week, beginning about the second year of her college life, from the Executive Mansion at Albany, and the particularly abundant supply that came from the White House conservatories when she was graduated, was but one of many little attentions paid her, the knowledge of which her college mates spread abroad on scattering to their distant homes for the summer vacations, thus exciting public gossip concerning Miss Folsom's relations to the President."

Miss Folsom's character is that of an unspoiled, ingenuous girl, full of self-possession, and with too much common-sense to be overcome by her sudden elevation. Her chief characteristic is intense loyalty to her mother, who is a charming woman. Between them exists that perfect confidence and sympathy too seldom seen between parent and child. Miss Folsom's life has had its deeper side, as is evident by her becoming early in life a member of the Central Presbyterian Church of Buffalo. She is old for her years, and too observing and tactful to make any mistakes, which, even should they occur, would be forgiven in one so young and inexperienced, obliged suddenly to regulate her life by the complicated etiquette of society at the capital. One of her accomplishments is a rare gift for letter-writing. In dress her taste is very simple.

THE WEDDING.

UNUSUAL interest was aroused about the ceremony, for never before has the White House been the scene of such an event with its official occupant in the character of the bridegroom. There have been weddings before this in the White House, but Mr. Cleveland is the first President to enter matrimony in the old mansion. Reporters, however, were rigorously excluded, but a full report of the ceremony was sent to the press by Colonel Lamont, the President's private secretary, who in early life was on the staff of the New York Sun.

About five o'clock on Wednesday, June 2d, the usual attendants at the White House began to appear about the place with their best clothes on. All of the clerks and attachés, to the laundress, were notified that they might witness the ceremony, and they were filled with gratitude at the privilege. Jerry, the footman, came out with a roll of velvet matting, which he spread over the flagging of the porch from the carriage way to the entrance, and Hawkins, the coachman, made his appearance in a new plum-colored livery and yellow gloves to open the carriage doors as the guests arrived. A captain of police, with one arm done up in a sling, arrived with a squad of policemen, and notified the crowd that began to gather about the place that they must keep away from the portico.

By half past six every member of the Cabinet except the Attorney-General had arrived. Mr. Garland's dislike to all ceremonies being notorious, he was not expected, and a remark he made to a friend implied that the President had excused him. The other invited guests were all assembled in the Blue Room. At seven o'clock a hush of expectancy fell on the brilliant group. Starting from the western corridor on the upper floor, the President came slowly down the western staircase with his bride leaning on his arm. They were unaccompanied, even the bride's mother awaiting her with the other guests. Passing through the central corridor, the bride and groom entered the Blue Room and took a position near the southern wall, which was completely hidden from sight by a mass of nodding palms, tropical grasses, and an endless variety of choice flowers.

The crystal chandelier poured a flood of mellow radiance upon the scene, and the colors of the massive banks of scarlet begonias and royal Jaqueminot roses, mingling with the blue and silver tints of the frescoed walls and ceiling, gave a warm and glowing tone to the whole brilliant interior. The delicate ivory shades of the bride's wedding gown found an exquisite setting in the masses of crimson roses immediately beyond. The President was in full evening dress, with turn-down collar, white lawn necktie, and white enamel studs.

The President's pastor, Dr. Sunderland (whose portrait appears on page 380), stepped forward to his position fronting the wedding couple. In a distinct tone of voice and with a deliberate utterance, the doctor began the simple and beautiful wedding service of the Presbyterian Church.

At the conclusion of the ceremony Mrs. Folsom, showing traces of deep emotion, was the first to tender her congratulations to the newly-married pair. She was followed by Miss Rose E. Cleveland, the President's sister, and the Rev. William Cleveland, his brother, and the other relatives and friends in turn. While the congratulations were in progress the band, under the leadership of Professor Sousa, performed the bridal chorus and march from "Lohengrin," and to this music the President and his wife led the way into the stately East Room.

Our lady readers will be interested in knowing that the bride's wedding dress was of ivory satin, simply garnished on the high corsage with India muslin crossed in Grecian folds and carried in exquisite falls of simplicity over the petticoat. The orange blossom garniture, commencing upon the veil in a superb coronet, continued throughout the costume with artistic skill. Her veil of tulle, about five yards in length, completely enveloped her, falling to the edge of the petticoat in front and extending the entire length of her full court train. She carried no flowers and wore no jewelry, except an engagement ring, containing a sapphire and two diamonds.

About an hour after the conclusion of the ceremony the President and his bride slipped quietly away from the White House to a carriage, in which they drove to the spot where President Garrett, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, had his private car waiting. They entered, and were soon on their way to the pleasant retreat at Deer Park, Md., which had been placed at their disposal by ex-Senator Henry Davis, of West Virginia. A little less than a week was all the holiday the President allowed himself, and on June 8th he was back again at his desk in Washington.

An Example to Employers who Have Trouble with their men has been set by the New England Granite Works of Westerly, R. I. The president of the company operating the works has persuaded the directors and shareholders to make an experiment dating back to the beginning of this year. The men are to be paid the present rate of wages, the shareholders are to receive legal interest on their investment, and at the end of the year whatever balance remains is to be divided into three parts. One of these will go to the shareholders, one to the workmen, and one to a permanent reserve fund formed to meet emergencies, losses, etc. This experiment will be watched with interest. If it proves successful it may be the model of a scheme for the solution of the labor problem. It certainly promises well.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Visit to an Attic.—At a Recent Meeting the Rev. Mr. M'Donand said: "I remember visiting a woman who lived in an attic of a back house, and a more wretched room I never entered. It had no fireplace, not even a bed nor a chair; nothing was to be seen in the wretched hovel but some straw in a corner. I pitied the inmate as she stood there in the midst of her misery, for she had known better times; she had once been a respectable married woman, but drink, as usual, had brought her to this. I told her that God loved her. She tried hard to convince me that God did not love her, but I only repeated the words: 'God loves you; God loves you.' At last she came to see, and was convinced of the fact that God did love her, and a bright day has dawned upon her."

Shaking the Duke's Hand.—"At the Battle of Waterloo, on one occasion when a party of the enemy came suddenly down upon the British, the Duke of Wellington sent for one of his officers. When the officer appeared in his presence the Duke asked him if he could take a certain battery. 'Give me a shake of your conquering hand, and I will take it,' replied the officer. He wound his way round the hill with a few men, and the very fact that his brave commander's eye was upon him nerved him with courage to go boldly forward and execute the duty that was assigned to him; and with some of his master's courageous spirit he soon put to flight the French. Oh, that Christians had that faith in their Captain!"

The Leaf an Infidel Tore Out.—A Clergyman remarked: "I visited an infidel's house in Edinburgh and asked to see his Bible. On looking through it I found that the leaf which contained the third chapter of John was torn out, so great was his hatred of these words of Jesus, 'Ye must be born again.' But although he tore the words from his Bible, they were no less true, and he could not tear them from his memory and heart. Yes, there they were stamped upon his unregenerated heart, and he could not get clear of them, and they greatly troubled him. But I have known people whose consciences were so seared by sin that even that solemn truth had no effect, and they went down to everlasting death with the greatest sin of all, that of unbelief, upon them. It is an awful reality that 'ye must be born again.'"

Paying the Car Fare.—The Rev. Mr. Graham said: "Not long ago I was travelling in a horse-car in London. The conductor came inside to collect the fares, and there was a lady sitting beside me who had forgotten her purse. She made known this fact to the collector, but he insisted on having the money. A lady opposite kindly offered to pay it, but the other would scarcely accept it until she saw she was getting into trouble, and even then she would not take it until she got the name and address of the lady that she might return the money, so great was her aversion to accept a penny for nothing. Such is the case with sinners; it is long before they will accept salvation as a gift, so great is the dislike of many to take anything for nothing; they will not receive a penny's worth of grace without at least doing something to merit it. 'By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God.'"

An Unblushing Admission.—The Rev. George Gladstone said: "I was speaking to a man in my vestry, and his difficulty was this: 'Oh,' he said, 'I do wish to be a Christian, but I cannot believe God.' 'Suppose,' I said, 'that I told you that when I was coming down to the church to-night I met a carriage drawn by four horses, would you believe me?' 'Yes,' he said, with a look of surprise. 'Why?' I asked. 'Because I know all you say is truth,' he replied. 'Can you sit there and look me in the face, and say you believe what I say, and do not believe what God says?' 'I cannot help it; how am I to believe?' he asked, in a distressed voice. 'Instead of asking how am I to believe, ask yourself, What is it that God wants me to believe?'

Here is the point on which so many stumble; they will believe anything or any one but the Gospel. Dear friends, God can only free us from the condemnation of His just law through believing in His glorious Son. For the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

The Challenge of a Daniel.—Sergeant Mathers said: "A friend told me of a young man who was a true soldier of the cross, and suffered much in consequence, not only from his companions, but from his own father, who was overseer in the same works. That young man showed forth Christ in all his actions, even when his companions who worked with him were unusually provoking in tormenting him about his religion, and, I am ashamed to say, were often encouraged in their wickedness by his own father. One morning, after enduring their cruel and insulting words for some time, he turned to them with a calm look and said: 'Friends, tell me, is there anything in my life that is not consistent in a Christian? If there is, tell it to me, and I will kneel in your presence and ask God to forgive me.' Complete silence fell on the men; not one dared to open his mouth as that young man stood there and challenged them to find anything against him."

Laughed Out of a Good Thing.—"I was talking to a lad the other night who said that he was a backslider. 'What was the matter?' I said. 'Was the Lord Jesus not good enough for you?' 'Oh, yes,' he replied; 'it was not that, but I had to suffer a great deal of persecution from my companions.' 'What!' I said, looking at the young man; 'you do not seem to be very much the worse for it. You have not lost an arm, nor an eye, nor do I see anything the matter with you.' 'No,' he replied, rather ashamed; 'it is not that, but I was laughed at, and jeered at so much, and told that it was just a silly notion, and the sooner I got clear of it the better. So I could bear it no longer and gave it all up.' So this is what he, like many more, called persecution. He could not even stand being scoffed at for Christ's sake. Let such remember that one soul may laugh another into hell, but a thousand will not bring him out of it."

John the Joiner's Decision.—A Minister Related: "I once said to a joiner who came to repair a window in my house: 'Are you a Christian?' 'No, no,' he answered; 'I am not going to be a Christian till I am an old man.' 'You are working for the railway company, are you not, John?' 'Yes, sir, I am.' 'Suppose a gentleman should come and offer you a much larger sum than that which you are at present receiving if you would enter his employment, and you refused, saying you would much rather stay with your old employer and the small wages. But a day comes when your employer says to you: 'John, you are getting an old man, and as you are of little or no use to us now, you will be paid off on Saturday.' You go home with a heavy heart, because you have not been able to save any money, for you required it all as you earned it for the necessities of life. But a bright thought strikes you; you go to the gentleman who once offered you the large wages, and tell him that your employer has turned you off, and now you are willing to come to him, and at the same time you remind him that he offered you a good remuneration for your work. But he now refuses to have you, saying: 'No; when I offered you good wages you were strong and able to do the work, but now you are feeble and of no use to me.' Would he be doing quite right in refusing you?' 'Yes, he would; and it would serve me right. Just what I would deserve,' replied John. 'And that is just what you are wanting to do with Jesus. With a ruined soul you come to offer the wasted fragments to Jesus. What if He were to refuse you; for He has said: "My Spirit will not always strive with man;" so go, serve Him while you are strong and young.' John took my advice, and gave himself right away to Jesus."

THE WORST FOE OF LABOR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 13, 1886.

"He that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes."—HAGGAI I: 6.

Where the Money Goes—What the Rum-Money would Buy—The Anarchist of the Centuries—A Strike Proclaimed—American and British Statistics—Physical Energy Depleted—A Sacque that Cost—A Church Impoverished for Pleasure—Micawber's Precept—What the Disciple of Rum Loses—Self-Respect—Fifteen Years Going Down—Loss of Health—A Scene in a Hospital—Loss of Home—Loss of Soul—A Call for a Woman's Crusade—The Last Chance.

IN Persia under the reign of Darius Hystaspes the people did not prosper. They made money, but did not keep it. They were like people who have a sack in which they put money, not knowing that the sack is torn, or eaten of moths, or in some way made incapable of holding valuables. As fast as the coin was put in one end of the sack it dropped out of the other. It made no difference how much wages they got, for they lost them. "He that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes."

WHAT HAS BECOME OF THE BILLIONS

and billions of dollars in this country paid to the working classes? Some of these moneys have gone for house rent, or the purchase of homesteads, or wardrobe, or family expenses, or the necessities of life, or to provide comforts in old age. What has become of other billions? Wasted in foolish outlay. Wasted at the gaming table. Wasted in intoxicants. Put into a bag with a hundred holes.

Gather up the money that the working classes have spent for rum during the last thirty years, and I will build for every workingman a house, and lay out for him a garden, and clothe his sons in broadcloth and his daughters in silks, and stand at his front door a prancing span of sorrels or bays, and secure him a policy of life insurance, so that the present home may be well maintained after he is dead. The most persistent, most overpowering enemy of the working classes is intoxicating liquor. It is the anarchist of the centuries, and has boycotted and is now boycotting the body and mind and soul of American labor. It is to it a worse foe than monopoly and worse than associated capital.

It annually swindles industry out of a large percentage of its earnings. It holds out its blasting solicitations to the mechanic or operative on his way to work, and at the noon-spell, and on his way home at eventide; on Saturday, when the wages are paid, it snatches a large part of the money that might come to the family, and sacrifices it among the saloon-keepers. Within eight hundred yards of Sand Street Methodist Church, Brooklyn, it has fifty-four saloons, and is plotting now for another. Stand the saloons of this country side by side, and it is carefully estimated they would reach from New York to Chicago. Forward march, says the rum power, and take possession of the American nation!

The rum business is pouring its vitriolic and damnable liquids down the throats of hundreds of thousands of laborers, and while the ordinary strikes are ruinous both to employers and employés, universal against strong drink, which, if kept up, will be the relief of the working classes and the salvation of the nation. I will undertake to say that there is not a healthy laborer in the United States who, within the next ten years, if he will refuse all intoxicating beverage and be saving, may not become a capitalist on a small scale. Our country in a year spends one billion five hundred million and fifty thousand dollars for rum. Of course the working classes do a great deal of this expenditure. Careful statistics show that the wage-earning classes of Great Britain expend in liquors one hundred million pounds, or five hundred million dollars a year. Sit down and calculate, O working man! how much you have expended in these directions. Add it all up. Add up what your neighbors have expended, and realize that instead of answering the beck of other people you might have been your own capitalist. When you deplete a workingman's physical energy you deplete his capital.

I PROCLAIM A STRIKE

THE STIMULATED WORKMAN

gives out before the unstimulated workman. My father said: "I became a temperance man in early life, because I noticed in the harvest-field that, though I was physically weaker than other workmen, I could hold out longer than they. They took stimulants, I took none." A brick-maker in England gives his experience in regard to this matter among men in his employ. He says, after investigation: "The beer-drinker who made the fewest bricks made six hundred and fifty nine thousand; the abstainer who made the fewest bricks, seven hundred and forty-six thousand. The difference in behalf of the abstainer over the indulger, eighty-seven thousand." There came a very exhausting time in the British Parliament. The session was prolonged until nearly all the members got sick or worn out. Out of six hundred and fifty-two members only two went through undamaged; they were teetotallers.

When an army goes out to the battle the soldier who has water or coffee in his canteen marches easier and fights better than the soldier who has whiskey in his canteen. Rum helps a man to fight when he has only one contestant, and that at the street corner. But when he goes forth to maintain some great battle for God and his country, he wants no rum about him. When the Russians go to war a corporal passes along the line and smells the breath of every soldier. If there be in his breath a taint of intoxicating liquor, the man is sent back to the barracks. Why? He cannot endure fatigue. All our young men know this. When they are preparing for a regatta, or for a ball club, or for an athletic wrestling they abstain. Our working people will be wiser after awhile, and the money they fling away on hurtful indulgences they will put into co-operative association, and so become capitalists. If the workingman put down his wages and then take his expenses and spread them out, so they will just equal, he is not wise. I know workingmen who are in a perfect fidget until they get rid of their last dollar.

A COSTLY SACQUE.

The following circumstances came under our observation: A young man worked hard to earn his six or seven hundred dollars yearly. Marriage day came. The bride had inherited five hundred dollars from her grandfather. She spent every dollar of it on the wedding dress. Then they rented two rooms in a third story. Then the young man took extra evening employment; almost exhausted with the day's work, yet took evening employment. It almost extinguished his eyesight. Why did he add evening employment to the day employment? To get money. Why did he want to get money? To lay up something for a rainy day? No. To get his life insured, so that in case of his death his wife would not be a beggar? No. He put the extra evening work to the day work that he might get a hundred and fifty dollars to get his wife a sealskin coat. The sister of the bride heard of this achievement, and was not to be eclipsed. She was very poor, and she sat up working nearly all the nights for a great while until she bought a sealskin coat. I have not heard of the result on that street. The street was full of those who are on small incomes, but I suppose the contagion spread, and that everybody had a sealskin coat, and that the people came out and cried, practically, not literally: "Though the heavens fall we must have a sealskin coat!"

I was out West, and a minister of the Gospel told me, in Iowa, that his church and the neighborhood had been impoverished by the fact that they put mortgages on their farms in order to send their families to the Philadelphia Centennial. It was not respectable not to go to the Centennial. Between such evils and pauperism there is a very short step. The vast majority of children in your almshouses are there because their parents are drunken, or lazy, or recklessly improvident.

I have no sympathy for skinflint saving, but I plead for CHRISTIAN PRUDENCE.

You say it is impossible now to lay up anything for a rainy day. I know it, but we are at the daybreak of national prosperity. Some people think it is mean to turn the gas low when they go out of the parlor. They feel embarrassed if the door-bell rings before they have the hall lighted. They apologize for the plain meal, if you surprise them at the table. Well, it is mean if it is only to pile up a miserly hoard. But if it be to educate your children, if it be to give more help to your wife when she does not feel strong, if it be to keep your funeral day from being horrible beyond all endurance, because it is to be the disruption and annihilation of the domestic circle—if it be for that, then it is magnificent.

There are those who are kept in poverty because of their own fault. They might have been well off, but they smoked or chewed up their earnings, or they lived beyond their means, while others on the same wages and on the same salaries went on to competency. I know a man who was all the time complaining of his poverty and crying out against rich men, while he himself keeps two dogs, and chews and smokes, and is full to the chin with whiskey and beer. Wilkins Micawber said to David Copperfield, "Copperfield, my boy, one pound income, expenses twenty shillings and six pence; result, misery. But, Copperfield, my boy, one pound income, expenses nineteen shillings and six pence; result, happiness." But, O workingman of America, take your morning dram, and your noon dram, and your evening dram, and spend everything you have over for tobacco and excursions, and you insure poverty for yourself and your children forever!

If by some generous fiat of the capitalists of this country, or by a new law of the Government of the United States, twenty-five per cent, or fifty per cent, or one hundred per cent were added to the wages of the working classes of America, it would be no advantage to hundreds of thousands of them unless they stopped strong drink. Aye, until they quit that evil habit, the more money, the more ruin; the more wages, the more holes in the bag.

My plea this morning is to those working people who are in a bottle, the beer-mug, and the wine-flask. And what I say to them will not be more appropriate to the working classes than to the business classes, and the literary classes, and the professional classes, and all classes, and not with the people of one age more than of all ages. Take one good square look at the suffering of the man whom strong drink has enthralled, and remember that toward that goal multitudes are running. The disciple of alcoholism suffers the LOSS OF SELF-RESPECT.

DISCIPLESHIP TO WHISKEY

Just as soon as a man wakes up and finds that he is the captive of strong drink, he feels demeaned. I do not care how reckless he acts. He may say, "I don't care;" he does care. He cannot look a pure man in the eye unless it is with positive force of resolution. Three fourths of his nature is destroyed; his self-respect is gone; he says things he would not otherwise say; he does things he would not otherwise do. When a man is nine tenths gone with strong drink, the first thing he wants to do is to persuade you that he can stop any time he wants to. He cannot. The Philistines have bound him hand and foot, and shorn his locks, and put out his eyes, and are making him grind in the mill of a great horror. He cannot stop. I will prove it. He knows that his course is bringing ruin upon himself. He loves himself. If he could stop he would. He knows his course is bringing ruin upon his family. He loves them. He would stop if he could. He cannot. Perhaps he could three months or a year ago, not now. Just ask him to stop for a month. He cannot; he knows he cannot, so he does not try.

I had a friend who was for

under this evil habit. He had large means. He had given thousands of dollars to Bible societies and reformatory institutions of all sorts. He was very genial, very generous, and very lovable, and whenever he talked about this evil habit he would say, "I can stop any time." But he kept going on, going on, down, down, down. His family would say, "I wish you would stop." "Why," he would reply, "I can stop any time if I want to." After a while he had delirium tremens; he had it twice; and yet, after that, he said, "I could stop at any time if I wanted to." He is dead now. What killed him? Rum! Rum! And yet among his last utterances was, "I can stop at any time." He did not stop it because he could not stop it. Oh, there is a point in inebriation beyond which if a man goes, he cannot stop!

One of these victims said to a Christian man, "Sir, if I were told that I couldn't get a drink until to-morrow night unless I had all my fingers cut off, I would say, 'Bring the hatchet and cut them off now.'" I have a dear friend in Philadelphia whose nephew came to him one day, and when he was exhorted about his evil habit, said, "Uncle, I can't give it up. If there stood a cannon and it was loaded, and a glass of wine were set on the mouth of that cannon, and I knew that you would fire it off just as I came up and took the glass, I would start, for

I MUST HAVE IT."

Oh, it is a sad thing for a man to wake up in this life and feel that he is a captive! He says, "I could have got rid of this once, but I can't now. I might have lived an honorable life and died a Christian death; but there is no hope for me now; there is no escape for me. Dead, but not buried. I am a walking corpse. I am an apparition of what I once was. I am a caged immortal beating against the wires of my cage in this direction; beating against the cage until there is blood on the wires and blood upon my soul, yet not able to get out. Destroyed without remedy!"

I go on and say that the disciple of rum suffers from the LOSS OF HEALTH.

The older men in the congregation may remember that some years ago Dr. Sewell went through this country and electrified the people by his lectures, in which he showed the effects of alcoholism on the human stomach. He had seven or eight diagrams by which he showed the devastation of strong drink upon the physical system. There were thousands of people that turned back from that ulcerous sketch, swearing eternal abstinence from everything that could intoxicate.

God only knows what the drunkard suffers. Pain files on every nerve, and travels every muscle, and gnaws every bone, and burns with every flame, and stings with every poison, and pulls at him with every torture. What reptiles crawl over his creeping limbs! What fiends stand by his midnight pillow! What groans tear his ear! What horrors shiver through his soul! Talk of the rack, talk of the Inquisition, talk of the funeral pyre, talk of the crushing Juggernaut—he feels them all at once. Have you ever been in the ward of where these inebriates are dying, the stench of their wounds driving back the attendants, their voices sounding through the night? The keeper comes up and says, "Hush, now, be still! Stop making all this noise!" But it is effectual only for a moment, for as soon as the keeper is gone they begin again, "Oh, God! Oh, God! Help! Help! Rum! Give me rum! Help! Take them off me! Take them off me! Oh, God!" And then they shriek, and they rave, and they pluck out their hair by handfuls, and bite their nails into the quick, and then they groan, and they shriek, and they blaspheme, and they ask the keepers to kill them—"Stab me! Smother me! Strangle me! Take the devils off me!" Oh, it is no fancy sketch! That thing is going on now all up and down the land, and I tell you further that this is going to be the death that some of you will die. I know it. I see it coming.

Again, the inebriate suffers through the LOSS OF HOME.

I do not care how much he loves his wife and children, if this passion for strong drink has mastered him, he will do the most outrageous things; and if he could not get drink in any other way, he would sell his family into eternal bondage. How many homes have been broken up in that way no one but God knows. Oh, is there anything that will so destroy a man for this life and damn him for the life that is to come? I hate that strong drink. With all the concentrated energies of my soul I hate it. Do not tell me that a man can be happy when he knows that he is breaking his wife's heart and clothing his children with rags. Why, there are on the roads and streets of this land to-day little children, barefooted, unwashed, and unkempt—want on every patch of their faded dress and on every wrinkle of their prematurely old countenances, who would have been in churches to-day, and as well clad as you are, but for the fact that rum destroyed their parents and drove them into the grave. O rum, thou foe of God, thou despoiler of homes, thou recruiting officer of the pit, I hate thee!

But my subject takes a deeper tone, and that is, that the unfortunate of whom I speak suffers from the LOSS OF THE SOUL.

The Bible intimates that in the future world, if we are unforgiven here, our bad passions and appetites, unrestrained, will go along with us and make our torment there. So that, I suppose, when an inebriate wakes up in the last world, he will feel an infinite thirst clawing on him. Now, down in the world, although he may have been very poor, he could beg or he could steal five cents with which to get that which would slake his thirst for a little while; but in eternity where is the rum to come from?

Oh, the deep, exhausting, exasperating, everlasting thirst of the drunkard in hell! Why, if a fiend came up to earth for some infernal work in a grog-shop, and should go back taking on its wing just one drop of that for which the inebriate would it make there! Put that one drop from off the fiend's wing on the tip of the tongue of the destroyed inebriate; let the liquid brightness just touch it; let the drop be very small, if it only have in it the smack of alcoholic drink; let that drop just touch the lost inebriate in the lost world, and he would spring to his feet and cry, "That is rum, ah! That is rum!" And it would wake up the echoes of the damned—"Give me rum! Give me rum! Give me rum!" In the future world I do not believe that it will be the absence of God that will make the drunkard's sorrow. I do not believe that it will be the absence of light. I do not believe that it will be the absence of holiness. I think it will be the absence of rum. Oh, "look not upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright in the cup, for at the last it biteth like a serpent, and it stingeth like an adder."

It is about time that we have

like that which swept through Ohio ten or twelve years ago. With prayer and song the women went into the grogeries, and whole neighborhoods, towns, and cities were redeemed by their Christian heroics. Thirty women cleared out the rum traffic from a village of one thousand inhabitants. If thirty women, surcharged of the Holy Ghost, could renovate a town of a thousand, three thousand consecrated women, resolved to give themselves no peace until this crime was extirpated from this city, could in six months clear out three fourths of the grog-shops of Brooklyn. If there be three thousand women now in this city who will put their hands and their hearts to the work, I will take the contract for driving out all these moral nuisances from the city—at any rate, three fourths of them—in three months. If, when that host of three thousand consecrated women is marshalled, there be no one to lead them, then, as a minister of the Most High God, I will offer to take my position at the front of the host, and I will cry to them, "Come on, ye women of Christ, with your songs and your prayers! Some of you take the enemy's right wing and some the left wing. Forward! The Lord of Hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge! Down with the dram-shops!"

But not waiting for those mouths of hell to close, let me advise the working and the business classes, and all classes, to stop strong drink. While I declared some time ago that there was a point beyond which a man could not stop, I want to tell you that while a man cannot stop in his own strength, the Lord God by His grace can help him to stop at any time. I was in a room in New York where there were many men who had been reclaimed from drunkenness. I heard their testimony, and for the first time in my life there flashed out a truth I never understood. They said, "We were victims of strong drink. We tried to give it up, but always failed; but somehow since we gave our hearts to Christ, He has taken care of us." I believe that the time will soon come when the grace of God will show its power not only to save man's soul, but his body, and reconstruct, purify, elevate, and redeem it.

I verily believe that, although you feel grappling at the roots of your tongues an almost omnipotent thirst, if you will give your heart to God, He will help you by His grace to conquer. Try it. It is

YOUR LAST CHANCE.

I have looked off upon the desolation. Sitting in our religious assemblages there are a good many people in awful peril; and judging from ordinary circumstances, there is not one chance in five thousand that they will get clear of it. There are men in my congregation from Sabbath to Sabbath of whom I must make the remark, that if they do not change their course, within ten years they will, as to their bodies, lie down in drunkards' graves; and as to their souls, lie down in a drunkard's perdition. I know that is an awful thing to say, but I cannot help saying it.

Oh, beware! You have not yet been captured. Beware! Whether the beverage be poured in golden chalice or pewter mug, in the foam at the top, in white letters, let there be spelled out to your soul, "Beware!" When the books of Judgment are open, and ten million drunkards come up to get their doom, I want you to bear witness that I, this morning, in the fear of God and in the love for your soul, told you, with all affection and with all kindness, to beware of that which has already exerted its influence upon your family, blowing out some of its lights—a premonition of the blackness of darkness forever.

Oh, if you could only hear this morning Intemperance with drunkard's bones drumming on the head of the liquor cask the Dead March of immortal souls, methinks the very glance of a wine-cup would make you shudder, and the color of the liquor would make you think of the blood of the soul, and the foam on the top of the cup would remind you of the froth on the maniac's lip; and you would go home from this service and kneel down and pray God that, rather than your children should become captives of this evil habit, you would like to carry them out some bright spring day to the cemetery, and put them away to the last sleep, until at the call of the south wind the flowers would come up all over the grave—sweet prophecies of the resurrection! God has a balm for such a wound; but what flower of comfort ever grew on the blasted breath of a drunkard's sepulchre?

A LADY'S WORK IN CHINA.

How do lady missionaries in China spend their time? Much of their missionary work is done in this way: You hear of a family in which the mother and daughters are willing to receive a visit, and you set out to call upon them. At last the house is reached, and a cordial welcome given by its inmates. As they have so few changes, a visitor generally meets with a kind reception. Tea is handed to you, perhaps some doubtful-looking cakes, which you had better decline; and, should this be your first visit, you are plied with numerous questions as to your age, will you have a pipe? and so forth. By this time the news of your arrival has reached the neighboring houses, and their inmates hurry along, surrounding the door, apertures, or windows, and filling the room. Twenty or thirty women gather round, some now to hear the Gospel for the first time. Among your hearers there will be those who listen attentively; others, if you are good-natured enough to allow them, will be minutely examining the texture and quality of your dress, peering into your face, and rubbing your hands, all the time indulging in amusing remarks, and thoroughly gratifying their curiosity. You read and explain a short Bible story to them (the parables they thoroughly enjoy), then talk a little while, and persuade your hearers to memorize one single truth. Their attention may be also gained by the singing of suitable hymns. You leave with them a simple prayer in Chinese character, although in and around Ningpo not one woman in a hundred can read, and, in some parts of the empire, I am told, not one in five hundred; but there will be boys belonging to their families who can read it to them. You invite them to your house, and tell them the date of the following Sunday, for in the great and weary land of China there is no Sabbath, pressing them to come to chapel. Then they accompany you to the door, screaming after you: "Go slowly, go slowly, sit and go."

As to the results of the work, while many of the poor and ignorant have been brought to know and love a personal Saviour, the good news is penetrating the houses of the higher classes also. The wife of Prince Kung has been baptized into the true faith, and twelve or fifteen ladies in the emperor's palace have on Sundays a Christian service within its walls.

A FIENDISH SAMOAN TRANSFORMED.

THE power of the Gospel to regenerate a savage nature was never more signally proved than in the case of a chief on the Samoan Islands, who was simply tigerish in his ferocity, without pity for a woman's tears or suffering, and utterly without compunction. The same man under the influence of the Gospel preached by the missionaries became as gentle as a child, kind and lovable, and actually himself preached to his people. None who saw him thus engaged in his latter years could believe that as a young man he was brutal. Yet here is a horrible leaf from his early life:

Before the missionaries landed in Samoa there had been a terrible battle, and the inhabitants of one part had been conquered and many of them captured. The massacre was proceeding. A great hole had been scooped in the ground, a fire had been kindled, and wood was piled there for the purposes. The massacre was directed by the future preacher, then a young chief. Among the victims there was a family. The eldest daughter, a young woman in her teens, rushed forward, and, falling prostrate before that chief, embraced his feet, and piteously begged that he would spare not her, but her mother and the little babe. He ruthlessly kicked her away, and bade the men strike and stun her, and then cast her still living upon the burning pile. The next was similarly treated, and the next, until only the mother and babe remained. It was not necessary to stun that infant suckling; it was torn from its mother's fond embrace and cast upon the burning pile. The mother was struck, but not effectually stunned, and was thrown after it. With maternal instincts strong amid the agonies of such a horrible death, she scrambled down the pile, caught her burning babe, clasped it to her bosom, and mother and child died together. Is there any power beside the power of the Holy Spirit, known to man, that could transform such a nature as that?

THE ONE GREASE-SPOT ON THE COAT.

IN a recent sermon Sam Jones was urging his hearers to come to God just as they were, without waiting to reform and amend their ways first. He said:

The first thing you must do is to get in harmony with God. If you can do that best by crying, cry; if you can do it best by mourning, mourn; if by laughter, then laugh; or if by praying, pray. I won't prescribe the method by which you should get into harmony with God; but if the method you have been trying has proved a failure, then try something else—anything but the line you've been running on and failed. Go and give yourself to God just like you are. Get in harmony with yourself and with your God. It's the hardest work a man ever undertook in this world, giving himself to God just like he is; but you just give yourself to God as you are, and God will make you what you ought to be. It is not, Lord, what wilt Thou have me believe? but, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do? We always want to patch up and fix something first, and do a thousand things for ourselves—God wants you as you are.

I have often thought of an incident where a moral young man asked in the presence of his servant, who had been converted, "How is it that a miserable negro gets saved in an hour, while I have been praying for years?" The negro said, "Boss, when the Lord God came down to me, I saw I was ragged and dirty, and I couldn't 'shuck' off these ragged, dirty garments, but the Lord clothed me in garments of righteousness and purity. But, boss, you have been moral all your life, and as you've only had a little greasy spot on your coat, you are trying and trying to 'shuck' it off before you go to the Lord; but if you go to Him He'll put a new coat on you." The trouble is you want to do a great deal, but it's on the wrong line. Now, brethren, first give yourself.

THE OCCUPATION OF A DOUBLE HOUSE.

CYNICS tell us that in these days there is no such thing as true friendship, and that every man's hand, if it is not against every other man, like those of Ishmael's descendants, is fully occupied in taking care of himself and his own interests. That is true to a large extent, but there are exceptions to the rule, and one of them has come to light recently. It is a case in which each of two men made a sacrifice for the other in his time of need. As we admire the love which could prompt the sacrifice, we ask ourselves what must have been the love of Him who gave His very life for others, and that, too, when they were His enemies (Rom. 5: 7)!

The history of a double house in San Francisco is related in the Sacramento Bee. It states that it was built by one of two intimate friends who went to school together in New York State, and who migrated to California in 1850. When they arrived on the Pacific coast one opened a store and the other went to the mines. For ten years they did not meet. During one of the business panics the storekeeper was nearly ruined. He had to raise fifteen thousand dollars or go into bankruptcy. Having tried every resource he knew of, he was returning home in despair when he met his friend the miner. He told him his trouble, and the miner said: "I have the money, but it is all I have after my ten years' work. I meant to have left the mines, but you shall have it, and I'll take another turn at the pick and rocker." The storekeeper took the money and saved his business. In two years he had so prospered that he was able to repay his friend with interest, and sent it to him in the mountains. Five years afterward the miner had lost all he had, and was back in San Francisco looking for work. The storekeeper heard of it, and sent him an invitation to come and dine with him at his handsome new house in Powell Street. The miner came, bringing his wife and two children, clad in the shabbiest garments. "This is a double house," said the miner; "both yours?" "Yes," said the storekeeper; "it is furnished like this. I've let it, but the tenant is not in it yet; we'll go and look at it after dinner." When the two friends went into the adjoining house the miner was astonished to see in the hall his own trunks, which he had left in the dingy lodging-house, and still more amazed when the storekeeper thrust into his hand two deeds, one of which was a deed of the house, and the other a deed of partnership in his business. Both men are now prosperous merchants.

ONE HOUR OLD.

IN an interesting communication from the Rev. S. R. Brown, of the McAll Mission in France, is the following touching incident in the work:

One day last January I started to go to our small station at Versailles. The snow lay thick upon the ground. The cold was bitter, and I hugged my rug close to retain some warmth as I trod the silent avenue of Versailles, thinking I might find, say, six old women and two old men at the meeting. Who would venture out on such a night? On arriving there was a congregation of one; others came in late, and we had perhaps twenty people all told. The text was: "How old art thou?" and the answer: "Few and evil have been the days of my pilgrimage." I spoke of a new birth, and asked: "How old art thou?" Near the stove was a lady-like elderly female, and I had from her several nods of approval. We closed, and the people filed out. This lady had reached the door, when suddenly she turned round, came to me, and said: "I want to shake hands with you, and tell you I am one hour old; I was born while you were speaking." The persons who heard it looked amazed, and I shook hands with this babe just an hour old. We went out into the frosty air, on through the deserted streets. I hugged closer my rug to keep in some warmth, but the step was lighter and the heart brighter for the old lady's testimony: "Just one hour old."

A WIDOW'S SYMPATHY.

THERE is no sympathy so effectual or so acceptable as that which comes to a sufferer from one who has borne a similar affliction. It is this fact which encourages the tried and tempted believer to take his case to Him who "was made like unto His brethren, . . . for in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succor them that are tempted" (Heb. 2: 18). The Rev. G. O. Newport, a missionary in India, relates the following incident, illustrating the power of the sympathy that comes from a fellowship in suffering:

Ebenezer Lewis went to Travancore years ago. A noble missionary he was, and he had a not less noble wife. After a lingering illness here he died, and then his wife went straight back to India. She had been twelve years here nursing her husband, but during that time she had not forgotten the language of the people, or lost her love for the poor women of India. She spent the rest of her life in teaching them, and got access to the homes of these people in the city of Palacota. One day she heard sounds of lamentation and mourning; she went into the house from which they proceeded, and stretched out upon the floor was a poor woman, apparently in a swoon, and two or three women round her. Mrs. Lewis said: "What is the matter?" And they said: "She has just become a widow." Ah! Mrs. Lewis knew what that meant. She sat herself down by the side of the poor woman, and lifting her head, laid it on her own breast. She kissed her and said: "Oh, my sister, I am a widow, too! I know exactly how God has pierced your heart; I know exactly the kind of anguish that rests upon your spirit; I have passed through it all. I am a widow like yourself; you can put your confidence in me. Let me tell you how God has comforted me; let me tell you what blessed help He has given me; and then she began pouring into the ears of her sorrowing sister the Gospel of the grace of God—how God loved the widow, how He was a Husband to the widow; and the poor creature opened her eyes and looked into her sister's face wondering: "Was He really able to bless and help the widow?" "Yes," said Mrs. Lewis; "take my experience for it." From thenceforth that woman became a believer in Jesus Christ. That is what the Gospel is doing in hundreds of thousands of hearts and homes where the Zenana ladies are carrying on their work. In no other way could the ladies and girls of India be reached with the Gospel.

A HEARER IN HIDING.

A CLERGYMAN of Cape Town, South Africa, reports a remarkable conversion. He says: My church was situated in the midst of a very populous district; there were a number of Malays and a number of colored people, and among these I labored with a band of Christian workers gathered from the Church, and I may truly say that it was a blessed work. One day a lady told me of a poor family in which the husband and father was a drunken profligate. She had got an idea that if I were to speak to the man it might do him some good. Of course I called, but I did not find the man. The wife spoke to me about her miserable condition, and before parting from her I sat down and prayed with her, and I remembered her husband in the prayer. About two months later the lady, alluding to my visit, said to me: "That man has become a perfectly changed man since you were there." "How can that be?" I replied: "I never saw him." "No," she said; "on seeing you coming he rushed away, and there being no other way of escape, he hid himself under the bed, and while lying there he overheard the conversation and your prayer." The woman said that when he got up, after you had left, his countenance was suffused with tears. When I saw the wife again, three or four years after, she said that her husband had been steadfast and true to Christ ever since.

A MILLIONAIRE'S ADVICE.

AN incident related in connection with the recently deceased millionaire broker is an illustration of the fact that it is not always wise to obey the impulse to take advantage of an opportunity that appears to promise profit. Sometimes self-denial is the truest self-interest. A young man seeing worldly companions enjoy the pleasures of life may be tempted to feel himself aggrieved by a restraint which cuts him off from hilarity and conviviality. If he could see the end of these things he would not regret missing them. The time will come when he will rejoice that he cast in his lot with the people of God (Heb. 11: 24-26).

At the height of the Denver and Rio Grande speculative craze Mr. Woerishoffer used to be besieged daily by regiments of men for advice and "points." He was supposed to know all about the stock, and inquiries poured in upon him in floods. He could hardly turn without encountering somebody with questions. The speculative fever at that time was raging badly in the dry-goods district, and one of Mr. Woerishoffer's friends up there was staid old Merchant Fischer, who had made a fortune handling woollens. Fischer sought his friend's office with one hundred thousand dollars to invest. "Do you want to be always my friend?" asked Mr. Woerishoffer. Mr. Fischer said quickly that he did. "Then get out of Wall Street instant. Stick to your woollens, and a year from now, if you are sorry for what I tell you, come to see me, and I will pay you whatever you think my advice has cost you." Mr. Fischer rightly rated the counsel and departed. Not long after down fell Denver and Rio Grande prices, and a host of men in the dry-goods district were badly hurt, but Merchant Fischer was not with the fleeced ones. Poor Fischer is dead now, but nobody ever spoke of Woerishoffer in his presence but to prompt a panegyric.

THE NEW JERUSALEM IN THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard, Kan.

The Supreme Court of Appeal—Unequivocal Terms—The City as a Residence—Suspension not Explicitly Taught—Opposed to Natural Laws—A Literal City—The Lord to Reign There—Must be Seen by His Subjects—The Pillar of Fire—The Meeting in the Aerial Regions—The Mysteries of Prophecy—The Apparently Impossible Comes to Pass—Example of the Queen of Sheba.

IN a foot-note to an article from my pen in this journal of March 25th, page 182, the editor intimated that there were reasons for believing that the New Jerusalem of the Millennial Age will not be identical with the earthly Jerusalem, but will be suspended in the air, and not be actually on the earth until the close of the thousand years. I am desirous of offering a few remarks explaining why, in my opinion, that view cannot be accepted. I do so with confidence, because I recognize that those who hold it agree with me that there is but one standard of appeal for all who differ on these questions, and being sure that they equally with myself would bow to that authority and accept it as final. "To the law and the testimony" therefore let us go. We believe the same Spirit of Jesus spoke through the prophets as it did through the apostles.

DESCENDING NOT SUSPENDING.

The Holy Spirit has left no doubt about the meaning of the Greek words "ascending" and "descending." Since the time of Homer (see Liddell and Scott in loco) they have had the identical meaning of going up and coming down. In John 3: 13 we have a close comparison: "No man hath ascended up to heaven but He who came down [descended] from heaven, even the Son of man." Also in Eph. 4: 9, 10 and in 1 Thess. 4: 16. The same is stated about the Hebrew words (Gen. 28: 12, and quoted in John 1: 51), "and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." In Rev. 21: 2, 10 we have the same word, "descending out of heaven" (Isa. 2: 2, 3; 11: 10; Eph. 1: 10; Zech. 14: 16). The Psalmist sings in Ps. 47: 8, 9: "For God is the King of all the earth. God reigneth over the nations: God sitteth upon the throne of His holiness. The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham; for the shields of the earth belong unto God: He is greatly exalted."

A CITY HAVING FOUNDATIONS.

That such a city should remain suspended in the air during the Millennial period seems to be in opposition to the law of gravitation and to the natural laws belonging to the airy regions of our planet. New heaven will not be different with the airy regions which were in existence at the creation, when Jehovah pronounced them "very good" (Gen. 1: 31; 2: 1). If we deviate from an original city, we must come to the idea of an aerial city, and the consequence must be that we are entangled in a refined spiritualizing tendency, and that we have lost the literal exposition of the words of Rev. 21: 2, 10. We may imagine a camp, a rendezvous, a congregation gathered in the airy regions; but a descending city having foundations, as Jerusalem the Golden, is indeed a great problem to solve. The great question under consideration is, Will the New Jerusalem be indeed a city in the common acceptance of that word? We do not dare to curtail, "neither add to the words of the prophecy of this book" (Rev. 22: 18). We affirm that Jerusalem the Golden, predicted by the prophets and in the Revelation of John, is indeed a city.

We do not enter into the discussion how the city is built, of what materials the foundations, walls, and gates are constructed; neither what kind of stones, common or precious stones, will be used in the establishing of that city. We only maintain that it will be a place, a locality on earth during the Millennial era. It is plainly stated in Rev. 21: 26: "That the kings of the earth and nations do bring their glory and honor into it." Also verse 13 tells us the locality and names of the twelve gates having "messengers" as servants. Every idea mentioned leads us to a period in which kings and nations and the people of Israel shall be on earth. If the city shall remain suspended in the air we cannot see how those kings and nations ever can enter into it, and also what service those "messengers" attending at the gates can perform for the children of Israel below. In Rev. 22: 14 is spoken of "a right to the tree of life, and an entering in through the gates into the city," and also a prohibition and exclusion is proclaimed in verse 15: "For without are . . . whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." Such an exclusion will not be needed after the Millennial era (see 1 Cor. 15: 24, 25), and such a beatitude and right will then be common to all the people of Jesus.

PROBLEMS.

If the Lord shall reside during the Millennial era in the suspended city, we cannot see how the words found in Heb. 9: 28 must be understood, "that Christ shall appear the second time without sin ('sin-offering') unto salvation, unto them that look for Him." In such a case the comparison made in that verse is entirely lost. The second time means the same manifestation and appearance as in His first coming. How can the Jews see Jesus in the earthly Jerusalem and Canaan, as is promised to them (Zech. 12: 10; John 19: 34; Matt. 23: 37-39), if their Messiah will reside in an aerial city or in the air? If the resurrected saints shall remain in the suspended city during that period, we ask, How can they have rule over ten and over five cities (Luke 19: 17, 19), and how can the saints reign on the earth? (Rev. 5: 10; Ps. 110: 2, 3.) It must draw our attention that their new song ends in the words, "And we shall reign on the earth." The Greek says, "Reign as kings." Now, it is plain that in their delegated power they must have subjects who do belong to the earth, and they cannot reign over their subjects except they are visible to them.

It is beyond cavil that Israel's Messiah is the second Adam (1 Cor. 15: 45-50), and "that the nations are given to Him as His inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth as His possession" (Ps. 2: 8). It was on earth that the promise was given (Gen. 3: 5); it was on earth that the victory over Satan was achieved and where Jesus, as the second Adam, was crowned "with the crown of thorns" (John 19: 2), being condemned by the representative of the fourth-world dominion, and where He bore "the curse of the earth," being made "a curse" (Gal. 3: 13; 1 Pet. 2: 34). What place is more proper than this earth to see the coronation of the Lord of all? We say none (Rom. 8: 19). It is even without cavil that Jesus is the born King of the Jews (Matt. 2: 2); that "He must sit on the throne of David His father" (Luke 1: 32, 33). The throne of David was not in the airy regions; it was in Jerusalem (Ps. 110: 2). The Messiah must rule over the twelve tribes of Israel in their promised land (Luke 22: 29, 30). He was appointed by covenant, and has appointed His apostles also, saying: "That ye may eat and drink at My table in My kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19: 28). At that time shall the living "nations be summoned before Him" (Matt. 25: 31-46). In this connection He is also called "the Husband of Israel and the God of the whole earth" (Isa. 54: 5), and Jerusalem "Jehovah Shammah" (Ezek. 48: 35), and "the city of the Great King" (Matt. 5: 35). Considering all these texts quoted, we do not see one convincing reason why the New Jerusalem should remain suspended in the air during the Millennial period.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Step in the Right Direction was taken by the Senate on June 10th, when it passed a bill introduced by Senator Beck, of Kentucky, restricting the legal services of legislators. It declares that it shall be unlawful for any member of either House of Congress to accept employment as attorney-at-law or payment for services of any kind from any railroad company or any officer or agent thereof which obtained its charter or any grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States, and any person who violates this provision shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars and imprisoned not more than one year, in the discretion of the court. The bill passed by a vote of 37 to 11, and now goes to the House, where, it may be hoped, it will be received with similar favor. It will be better for all parties if Senators and Representatives are precluded from appearing as counsel in courts or in the Government departments. A Senator is out of place pleading before a judge whose nomination was confirmed by his help or in spite of his opposition in the Senate. That there is reason for such a bill is evident from the fact that a lawyer receives higher fees when he is in Congress than he would if he were not there. Rightly or wrongly, suitors are apt to think that the excess is paid for his influence in the Capitol.

The Nicaragua Canal Project will Receive all the assistance that can consistently be given to it by the Government if the bill is passed which has been prepared by Senator Edmunds and was introduced in the Senate last week. The published summary of its provisions indicates that the bill is a mere act of incorporation, prescribing the limits of capitalization and of charges, and giving the Government such control as may be provided by treaty, but leaving the projectors to raise their own capital and take their own risk of the financial success of their venture. It is right that citizens engaged in so prodigious an undertaking, and one that, if successful, will be of enormous advantage to their country, should have all the support and protection that their Government can secure for them by treaty; but the Government should not be asked to guarantee them from pecuniary loss or to become a partner with them in a business speculation.

An Effort to Defeat the Civil Service Law was frustrated last week in the House. Mr. Randall and Mr. Holman urged the withholding of the appropriation of $21,400 for the salaries of the Civil Service Commission until the rules had been altered. Their proposal was ruled out by the chairman of committee. A motion to strike out the appropriation altogether also failed. It is curious that these attacks on a law so conspicuously and emphatically indorsed by the people should continue. It was never supposed that the law would be popular with the politicians, but it was thought that when the people had approved it, the politicians would see that it would be to their interest to acquiesce.

The Oregon Election has Surprised Republican managers throughout the country, and they are now busy in trying to understand how it happens that a State which gave Mr. Blaine in 1884 a plurality of 2256 and an absolute majority of 988 has this year elected a Democratic governor by a majority estimated at 1500. It seems probable that machine methods have had something to do with producing the result. Indeed, the Portland Oregonian attributes it entirely to that cause, and says that the Republican Party in that State has fallen into the hands of rings, which must be placated by nominating unfit men to certain offices. It would appear, however, that another cause should not be overlooked in getting a true estimate of the situation. In 1884 the Prohibition vote in Oregon was 492; this year it is estimated at 2000. If, as is asserted, these Prohibitionists were formerly members of the Republican Party, their voting the Prohibition ticket this year alone would account for the result.

The Red American International Workingmen's Association is the name of a secret society unearthed in the investigation of the Grand Jury of Seattle, Wy. Terr. Full details of the society were not reported, but proof was obtained which satisfied the Grand Jury that its aim is the subversion of settled government, and that it has ramifications throughout the United States. The report was mentioned to a member of the Chicago Grand Jury, and he remarked, "I have no doubt that it is true. Similar evidence was given before our Grand Jury. The testimony went to show that there were Anarchist groups in many leading cities of the United States besides Chicago. A connection was established between the Chicago and the Milwaukee group. As far as we could make out, the Anarchist Society extends all over the country."

The British Parliament is to be Dissolved. The announcement was made by Mr. Gladstone to the House of Commons on Thursday last. It was generally expected as the result of the vote on the Home Rule bill, mentioned in these columns last week. Apparently the Premier thinks that the people are in accord with him on the Irish question rather than with the members of Parliament who voted against him on Monday night. In any case, the question is to be submitted to them for decision. If they are in favor of giving Ireland the power to legislate for herself they will elect men pledged to support Mr. Gladstone. The election is expected to take place early in July, and the result to be known by the middle of the month. Gigantic efforts are in preparation by both parties, and the struggle will be the most intense this generation of Englishmen has witnessed. Mr. Parnell will use his influence with the Irishmen who have votes in English constituencies in Mr. Gladstone's interest. Last year it was exerted in favor of the Conservatives. Mr. Parnell expects that the change will add forty votes to

Mr. Gladstone's party. The Conservatives, on the other hand, are confident that fifty seats now occupied by supporters of Mr. Gladstone will be filled, after the election, by men pledged to oppose Home Rule.

An Important Disclosure was Made by Mr. Parnell on the last night of the debate on the Home Rule Bill. It appears that prior to the election last year he received overtures from the Conservatives for his support. The Earl of Carnarvon, who at that time was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, sent for him, and Mr. Parnell went to see him. At the conference Lord Carnarvon told Mr. Parnell that he was in favor of giving Ireland a statutory Parliament, which should have the power, among other things, of protecting Irish industries. Carnarvon admitted that some of his colleagues were not prepared to go so far, but intimated that they would be persuaded to do so. The disclosure is somewhat embarrassing for the Conservatives, who are now endeavoring to convince the people that any statesman who advocates Home Rule is as dangerous in office as a madman or a traitor.

Fatal Riots are Reported from Belfast, Ireland. On Sunday, June 6th, a large funeral procession of Roman Catholics was attacked by Orangemen, and severe fighting ensued, which was with difficulty stopped by the police. Desultory fighting was renewed on Monday and Tuesday, and it culminated on Wednesday night in an organized riot. The mob attacked taverns owned by well-known Catholics, and sacked them. They drank the liquor, brought the furniture out and made a bonfire of it, and finally set fire to the buildings. The police charged the mob, but were beaten off. They then fired their carbines loaded with buckshot, before which the rioters fled, to collect again in other quarters and attack the dwellings of obnoxious Catholics. One hundred houses were wrecked in all and eight persons killed. The most severe fighting took place around the police station, where the police fled for shelter from the fury of the mob. A dense crowd assembled around it, and women pried up paving-stones and broke them into convenient size for the men to hurl at the windows of the station. Meanwhile the police were defending the place with their carbines. The arrival of two troops of dragoons and a regiment of infantry alarmed the rioters, and they fled. The soldiers then made a cordon around the police station. At the close of the week the city was said to be quiet, but a renewal of the outrages was impending. Lord Randolph Churchill was warned, when he spoke of the Protestants taking up arms, that his speeches might lead to bloodshed.

The Banishment of the Princes from France has been decreed by the Chamber of Deputies. On June 11th the question was submitted to the vote after a debate which had occupied several sessions, and the bill enforcing their expulsion was passed by an overwhelming majority. It declares that "the territory of the French Republic is and remains interdicted to the heads of families heretofore reigning over France, and to their direct heirs in the order of primogeniture; the Government is authorized to expel by decree the other members of these families." It also provides that "whoever, in violation of this interdiction, shall be found in France, in Algeria, or in the colonies shall be punished by imprisonment of from two to five years. At the expiration of the penalty he will be reconducted to the frontier." The violence of some of the speakers showed that Anarchist passions raged fiercely.

A Dynastic Crisis in Bavaria is Reported. The King of that country has been notorious for a long time for his eccentricities. He has displayed a remarkable disregard for his own dignity, and has been guilty of foolish freaks inconsistent with a sound mind. Prince Luitpold, the King's uncle, has now issued a proclamation declaring the King a lunatic, has assumed the duties of the Government as Regent, and has summoned the Landtag. A late cable dispatch states that the King has committed suicide by drowning.

An Encouraging Revival Extending through the State is reported from Alabama. At Troy Evangelist Porter has been preaching for ten days, and there have been large accessions to the churches. Thence he went to Tuskegee with similar results. At Tuscaloosa Evangelist Thomason has been laboring with many tokens of the Divine blessing. At Marion Dr. Davidson and Dr. Frost, of Selma, have been rejoiced by a great harvest from their united labors. Other towns have also been blessed by an outpouring of the Spirit.

The Convention of Christian Workers now in session in Chicago deserves the prayers of Christians of all denominations. Its object is to derive mutual assistance in practical work from consultation and a comparison of methods. The plan is to avoid long sermons, essays, and speeches, to encourage men actually engaged in evangelistic work to state the difficulties they have encountered, and to consider them and advise with each other on the best way of overcoming them. It is intended to make the meetings conferences in the true sense of the word, and to keep them steadily to practical questions. Men thoroughly in earnest for God and the cause of Christ cannot fail to bring away from such a gathering many valuable suggestions that will be helpful to them in their work.

The Work in Indianapolis Conducted by Rev. Sam Jones and Sam Small commenced on June 6th, with an enormous gathering in Tomlinson Hall. Fully three thousand persons were present. Mr. Small conducted the services, and Mr. M. J. Maxwell led the singing. The Presbyterian pastors of the city are co-operating with the Methodist pastors in the services. Some misunderstanding has arisen in regard to an utterance of Mr. Jones while in Cincinnati on the subject of baptism, and this has alienated the Baptists of Indianapolis. Mr. Jones has written an explanatory letter which, it may be hoped, will remove all obstacles to complete co-operation.

An Invitation to College Students has been issued by Mr. D. L. Moody. He is proposing to hold a College Students' Summer School during the entire month of July at his home in Northfield, Mass. The object of the school will be the study of the Bible and of such methods of Christian work as are adapted to college life. Mr. Moody, while himself conducting the meeting every day, will also bring to his aid men of wide experience in Bible study and Christian work. The regular exercises are not to exceed two hours a day, the balance of the time being devoted to such recreation as students need after the work of the college year. The entire cost of living is not to exceed five dollars a week, and there are no other expenses. The circular of invitation has been sent to all the colleges in the country, and preparations are made for the reception of, at least, two hundred students.

The Believers' Meeting for Bible Study Will be held at Niagara, Ont., July 22d-28th. This is the tenth annual meeting, and promises to equal its predecessors in attendance and influence. The circular of invitation is signed by Mr. W. J. Erdman, 193 West Springfield Street, Boston, Mass. The blessing of the Lord has so evidently been upon these meetings, their influence has been so far-reaching, such unexpected testimonies of their usefulness have come from year to year from all parts of the country, and in missionary stations in the ends of the earth; so many Christian workers ascribe either their first or later and more powerful impulse to holy service to the truth and testimony heard in these conferences, that special request is again made for earnest and unceasing prayer for still greater blessing this year.

An Evidence of Progress in Japan is Afforded by the fact that Miss Kin Kats, a graduate of the Normal School of Tokio, has been chosen by the Japanese Government to receive three years' training at the Government's expense at the Normal School of Salem, Mass., for the purpose of taking supervisory charge of the Normal Schools of Japan. She will be the first Japanese woman to be educated at the Government's expense in America.

A Prince under Discipline Experienced a disappointment last week. The booming of forty-two guns on June 6th in New York harbor announced the arrival of some distinguished visitor in the bay. It was Prince Leopoldo, the grandson of the Emperor of Brazil, who was on board the Brazilian war-ship Almirante Borroso. The young man wanted to go ashore immediately the ship anchored off Bedloe's Island, and the Brazilian Consul was prepared to give him a reception suitable to his exalted rank. But the Prince had dropped his royal character when he took service on the vessel, and was simply a midshipman under the captain's orders. It was contrary to rule for the midshipmen to go ashore at that time, and no exception was made in the Prince's case. He therefore remained on board, attending to his duties, and did not go ashore until the following day, when the other officers went. The fact is creditable to the Prince and the captain alike. The purpose for which the Prince entered the navy would not be served if his rank exempted him from the duties he had undertaken. It is to the loyalty of which this is a type that the world owes its redemption. Jesus, though the Son of God, was made in all things like unto His brethren, humbled Himself and became obedient, that He might save the world (Phil. 2:6-8).

A Curious Case of Inverted Vision is Described in a dispatch from Iowa to the Chicago Herald. It states that in Grant Township is a child ten years old, whose eyes are light blue, and in appearance like those of other children, but sees everything in reversed position that is placed within two feet of her. Beyond that distance objects appear to her as they do to others. She cannot read a book held in her hand, unless it is held upside down, though the lettering over the stores she reads easily. All her writing is done with inverted characters, and the lines commence on the right of the page. She is puzzled with vessels containing liquids which do not run out as she expects them to do, as the glass or cup seems to her bottom upward. Several prominent oculists are said to have examined her eyes, but they can detect no malformation in them. Specialists say that they have never heard before of a person having that defect in the physical eyesight. Defective spiritual vision is not at all uncommon, but it does not show itself as in the case of the child. The things near at hand—the things of this world appear as they are, but the things of God are wrongly seen. At first men are apt to think God more lenient than He is, but after they are awakened, it is difficult to get them to see Him as a God of mercy and love (Rom. 11:22).

A Limited Marriage was Applied for at the office of the justice of the peace in Jersey City, N. J., on June 9th. The applicant entered the room with a neatly-dressed young woman on his arm, and said, "We want to be married for three years." "I can't do that," said the squire, firmly; "it's against regulations." "Well, make it five years, then," pleaded the man. The young woman nodded acquiescence. "Can't do that, either," said the justice. "All marriages in New Jersey are for life, unlimited, and for better or worse." The man seemed greatly disappointed. There was a consultation, in which some friends who accompanied the couple participated. The man seemed inclined to abandon the project altogether rather than marriage without limitation, but he finally consented to the only contract which the justice would ratify, and the marriage ceremony was performed. The party were Poles, and they had probably been misled as to our laws by the proceedings of the divorce courts. Apart from the laws, however, a man has strangely misunderstood the true nature of the marriage relation who regards it as an experiment. No man ought to marry who is not certain that his wife will be dearer to him at the end of three or five years than she is at marriage. It is so with the relation of which marriage is a type. In a healthy Christian life the love of the soul to its Saviour increases from day to day, and the thought of separation would be worse than death (Rom. 8:38, 39).

A German Baron Died in the Poorhouse of Cleveland, O., on June 5th. He was sixty-five years old, and had been in this country seven years. His name was Constantine von Zacha, and his family is one of the oldest in Germany. Baron Eulenburg, the Prussian Secretary of State, is his brother-in-law. He served as captain in the Twelfth Uhlans in the wars of 1865 and 1870-71. In 1877 he lost his property through dissipation, and he came to America. He was well known, and earned a bare living by hard work. Last winter he fell and broke an arm. Unable to work, he went to the poorhouse, and, suddenly attacked by bronchitis, died. A melancholy feature of his case was that he was to have gone back to Europe this week, a reconciliation having been effected with his friends. The reconciliation which would have been such a boon to him once is of no benefit to him now. The only question in which he is concerned is whether he availed himself of the opportunity offered to him and all men of being reconciled to his God. If he did that, though he missed going to his earthly home, he has gone to the eternal mansion prepared for him (11 Cor. 5:1, 20).

How to make Faded Ink on Old Parchments legible has been a problem which many have attempted to solve. A scientific journal announces that success has been achieved by a new discovery. The process consists in moistening the paper with water, and then passing over the lines in writing a brush which has been wet in a solution of ammonia. The writing will immediately appear quite dark in color; and this color, in the case of parchment, it will preserve. On paper, however, the color gradually fades again; but it may be restored at pleasure by the application of the sulphide. The explanation of the action of this substance is very simple. The iron which enters into the composition of the ink is transformed by the reaction into the black sulphide. Antiquarians and historians will rejoice over this discovery; some men will take no interest in it. To them it would be gratifying to hear of the fading and complete obliteration of all writing, especially of that which records their own broken vows and their transgressions. That can never fade, though we know it will be blotted out by the blood of Christ when it is applied by faith (Isa. 43:25).

A Permanent Title for Mrs. Cleveland Has been found, according to a European journalist, who has probably more imagination than veracity. He states in a letter from Paris to his journal that while Miss Folsom was in Paris she was the guest on one occasion of the Duchess Lamotte. There was general recognition among the titled guests of the exalted position the young lady would have as the wife of a man at the head of a nation of fifty-five million people, but it seemed to them so unfortunate that she would have no title to distinguish her. One lady, the daughter-in-law of the Duchess de Permy, was especially distressed about it. "All would be well, only you will have no title," said she; "you will only be called Mrs. Cleveland." "The fair American's reply," says the journalist, "was, 'That name is only for strangers, the President has for intimacy conferred upon me a very particular title.' Everybody looked up curiously, and, blushing deeply, Miss Folsom added, 'He calls me—his darling. Can a wife desire a better title?' The hostess embraced her amiable guest, remarking, 'You are right, and you appear to me as if you would keep the title to the end of your life.'" If Miss Folsom had made the remark she would have been right; no wife need desire a better title than one denoting her husband's affection. It is so with the Christian who rightly appreciates his privileges. No earthly distinction compares with his title of the child of God (Rev. 2:17).

MYSTERIOUS MEAT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"In the mean while His disciples prayed Him, saying, Master, eat. But He said unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of. Therefore said the disciples one to another, Hath any man brought Him aught to eat? Jesus saith unto them, My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work," etc.—John 4 : 31-38.

The Careful Disciples—An Example for Imitation—Christ's Better Food—I. Refreshments Little Known—How Enjoyed—On a High Plane of Spirituality—By those who Sink Self—Who are in Harmony with God—The Weights and Scales Wrong—II. They Satisfied Jesus—The Chamois-Hunter's Forgetfulness—Converted in Hayti—III. Seek the Refreshment—Anticipate the Wages.

THE disciples had gone away into the city to buy meat, and for this they cannot be censured. It was necessary that food should be provided, and it naturally fell to their lot to perform that duty. Do not say that they were carnal or unspiritual because of this, for the most spiritual people must eat to live. When they came back from making their purchases, they found their Master sitting by the well, as they had left Him. They naturally expected that He would be as ready to partake of the provision as they were to offer it to Him; but He made no movement in that direction. Knowing how weary He had been when they left Him—so weary that He bade them go alone into the city—they were perplexed at His indifference to food, and perhaps judged that He was over-fatigued, and therefore they prayed Him to eat.

CHRIST'S REPRESENTATIVES.

I think the disciples did well to say: "Master, eat." What is more, I will hold them up to your imitation. Jesus has gone from you now in actual person, but His mystical body is still with you, and if you meet with any part of His body in need make it your earnest care. Still pray Him, saying: "Master, eat." If you know any of His people in poverty, ask them to partake of your abundance, lest haply your Lord should say to you at the last: "I was an hungered, and ye gave Me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave Me no drink." Our Lord's spirituality is not of that visionary sort which despises the feeding of hungry bodies. Look after His poor and needy ones. How can you be truly spiritual if you do not so?

Having done this justice to the twelve, let us do higher honor to the divine One about whom they gathered. His mind was at that time absorbed in spiritual objects; and, being so, He wished to lead them into that higher field wherein He Himself was so much at home, and therefore He transfigured their common words by giving them a higher meaning. "Ye pray Me to eat," said He; but "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." They did not comprehend what He meant: as the Samaritan woman did not understand Him when He spake of water, neither did His disciples when He spake of meat: but you see the Lord endeavored to use the lower expression as a ladder to something higher and more spiritual. In effect our Lord's reply to the request: "Master, eat," is this: "I have eaten in the best sense, and I wish you also to eat with Me."

I. First, there are refreshments which are

LITTLE KNOWN.

Generally men know enough about refreshments of the body. Those questions—What shall we eat, and what shall we drink?—have been long and carefully studied. It seems obvious to all men that if we are to be restored and lifted above fatigue or weakness it must be by corporeal food. Yet there is in the Word of God an intimation of another principle; as we read: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God shall man live." We are not so absolutely dependent upon the bread we eat as at first sight seems; food is but the vehicle of sustenance; God could sustain us without it. Now, brethren, our Lord Jesus Christ found for Himself a sustenance other than that of food; a food superior to the ordinary meat of men. But these refreshments were not known to His disciples. The common ruck of mankind have no idea of spiritual food; but the disciples were not of the common ruck; they were chosen out of the world, and they had been with their Lord for some little time, and yet they had not grasped the idea of a man being fed and strengthened by an influence upon his spiritual nature which could raise him above the down-dragging of his bodily needs. They could not yet enter into their Lord's secret; He had a meat to eat which even they knew not of.

THE SPIRIT RULING.

The reason for His knowing what they knew not was in part the fact that this nourishment was enjoyed upon a higher plane than these servants of Christ had yet reached. They were spiritual men in some degree; but they were not highly spiritual; they were mere babes in grace, though men in physical development. They had not yet reached to the height of letting their spirits rule the rest of their nature, nor had they yet learned the proper occupation of their spirits. Further, these refreshments were unknown to the apostles as yet, because they implied a greater sinking of self than they as yet knew. "My meat," said Jesus, "is to do the will of Him that sent Me." How condescendingly does our Lord sink Himself in this expression! He does not even say: "My meat is to do My Father's will." He takes a lower position than that of sonship, and dwells chiefly upon His mission, its service, and the absorption in the will of God which it involved. He finds His refreshment in being the commissioned officer of God, and in carrying out that commission. Oh, believer, hast thou ever tried thy Lord's plan? Hast thou taken thy Lord's yoke upon thee, and learned of Him? Thus it is that thou shalt find rest unto thy soul. Not in self, but in self-surrender, is there fulness for the heart.

Further, our Lord not only lived on a higher plane, and felt a greater sinking of self, but He was in fuller harmony with God than His disciples. He says: "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work." God's will was His will, not only passively, but actively, so that He wished to do it; God's work was His work completely, so that He wished to finish it. He longed to go all the length of God's eternal purpose, and carry it out as far as that purpose concerned Himself. Now, when a man feels: "My one desire is that I may do God's will; I have but His will; my will has fallen into God's will as a brook falls into a river"—then he is at peace. It is a blessed thing to rejoice in being crossed in our own purpose, in order that the purpose of the Lord may be more completely fulfilled. He that serves God in body, soul, and spirit, to the utmost of his power, finds new power given to him hour by hour, for God opens to him fresh springs. Perhaps you do not see this truth; but if you have ever experienced what it is to lay your whole soul on the altar, and feel that for Christ you live and for Christ you would die, why then you will know by experience that I speak the truth. When your will is God's will, you will have your will; when your will rings out in harmony with the will of God, there must be sweetest music all around your steps.

Once more: our dear Saviour was sustained by these secret refreshments, because He understood the art of seeing much in little. Our Master had been feasting. He had partaken of a more than royal banquet. How? He had been made a blessing to a woman—an ill-famed, much sinning woman. It was not an oration that He delivered; He had not even preached a sermon which would command admiration as a masterpiece of eloquence, and yet His whole soul was absorbed in what He had done. It was only a talk such as a city-missionary would have at any door, or such as would naturally fall from a Bible-woman in her calls from room to room; yet our divine Exemplar saw so much in one soul, and so much valued one opportunity of enlightening it, that He felt a sacred satisfaction in His simple conversation. He saw in the woman the seed-corn of a harvest, and therefore drew a large refreshment from her conversion.

FAITHFUL IN LITTLE.

We do not usually measure things rightly; I am persuaded that our weights and scales are out of order. We think we are doing a great deal when we get into a big controversy, or write an article that is read all over the nation, or create a sensation which startles thousands. But, indeed, it is not so. The Lord is not in the wind, nor in the tempest; we must go on with the still small voice of loving instruction and persuasion. You must go on talking with your little children in your classes; you must go on speaking to the few sick persons you are able to visit; you must try and preach Jesus Christ in little rooms, or to dozens and scores in the street corner or on the village green.

It is the old-fashioned, quiet personal work which is effectual. If we get to think that everything must be big to be good, we shall get into a sorry state of mind. In the little bit of work thoroughly well done God is glorified, much more than in the great scheme that is scamped. That word scamped gives a true description of very much Christian work nowadays. We want real work, not noisy work; work done in the centre of the soul of man, such as Jesus did upon the well. This sort of work will bring refreshment to our spirit, and any other will end in bitter disappointment.

II. Advance with me, dear friends, to our second theme: these secret refreshments

SATISFIED OUR LORD.

I bring this forward to remind you that where He found refreshment we also should find it. Why did it satisfy our Lord to be doing the will of Him that sent Him, and to be finishing His work? Well, first, because He had so long hungered to be at it. He longed to be at work saving men; He hungered to perform His chosen deeds of mercy. Read in the second chapter of John at the seventeenth verse. He went into the temple and He purged it; and then we read: "His disciples remembered that it was written of Him, the zeal of Thine house hath eaten me up." That was before He had told them that it was His meat to do the will of Him that sent Him. Our Lord was full of such zeal to be serving God and blessing men that when He did get at it, He was so joyful that everything else fell into the background as if it were not worth a thought. If you and I felt our Lord's anxiety to be serving God and winning souls, we should find refreshment in the service itself, even as He did.

When our Lord did get at His work He gave Himself wholly up to it; He went in for soul-winning heart and soul. There was a wonderful concentration of purpose about our Saviour. His face is always steadfastly set to His work; He is instant and constant in it;

HE IS ALL THERE,
